Not only was the mission of Jesus grand in design, and vast in extent, but its internal operation is delightfully beautiful. It is the spiritual reign of the kingdom of heaven in the soul. Its seat is the heart, and its rule is over the affections.—Making our devotion the rendering unto God the "living sacrifice" of a pure and honest heart, "in spirit and in truth," and our morality, "loving our neighbor as ourselves." These are noble and sublime, yet simple and glorious truths.—They are not only the precepts of Jesus, they are principles of eternal justice, and everlasting righteousness. And they will be recognized as the only proper rule of moral action, so long as the sun and the moon shall shine upon the earth, and proclaim the resplendant glories of the great Creator—yea, and as long as Jehovah shall sit upon the throne of the universe, and intelligent beings shall be subject to his moral government. And they will continue to roll on in their spiritualizing, purifying, and renovating influence, in moral power, till every rational creature of earth shall know and feel that his neighbor is the suffering man, whether he be found upon the rugged and dangerous road from Jerusalem to Jericho, or beneath the intense heat of the torrid zone, or amid the barren plains and parched sands of Afric's desert climes, or upon the cold and cheerless mountains of Lapland, or the dreary icebergs of the Northern Sea, and till the common sympathies of his nature shall constrain him to exercise the feelings of a brother's heart, and pour the oil of joy and the wine of consolation into the bosom of the disconsolate and sorrow-stricken mourner: till every human soul shall know and feel that his greatest good and highest happiness is to serve God with his spirit in the Gospel of his Son; that the best way we can love ourselves is by loving others; that we best love God by doing good to his children, and that "by loving our neighbor as ourselves," we work out his benefit and our own salvation—secure our own interest, and promote God's glory.

Thus do we perceive the beauty of the internal operation, and the glory of the onward progress of the mission of Jesus. It must continue to operate upon the heart, and exercise its moral power over the soul, till every enemy of truth and goodness shall be destroyed; till the degrading power of fear shall yield to the heavenly influences of Divine love; and till the galling chains of error, and the fetters of superstition, and the shackles of bigotry shall fall before the touch of truth, the blaze of Gospel light, and the glory of Christian liberty; till every thing that moves or disturbs the peaceful reign of righteousness in Mount Zion shall be banished from the moral world, and the river of salvation, flowing from the throne of the Eternal, shall make glad the heart of every child of humanity in "the city of the living God."

And then shall the grandeur, the vastness, the beauty, and the glory merge into, and be swallowed up in the sublime felicities of the final result! Grace shall superabound over all sin. Death, the last enemy, will be swallowed up in victory. All will be made alive in Christ, and the mission of Jesus will close with the joining of all voices in the blissful chorus of endless love, to the song of salvation!

THE LAW OF KINDNESS.

"Overcome evil with good."—ROMANS xii: 21.

It is not often remembered, that society as composed of individuals, is frequently actuated by revenge, and that much of the evil which exists in it, may be clearly traced to its neglect of the law of kindness. Society, or a community, or a nation, becomes unkind, when it gives no heed to the education of the poor; when it raises such walls of distinction as to discourage and shut out from notice the humble in life, however worthy and virtuous; when it makes a god of riches and fashion, to frown upon even the industrious and to set them aside like worthless weeds, because they can not shine in silks and revel in luxury; when it crushes the feeble person for the least deviation from the path of rectitude, chasing him or her to desperation with unrelenting severity, while, at the same time, it will receive with open arms the rich villain into its highest circles; when its laws are oppressive, cruel, and without a tendency to reform the criminal; when its legislation becomes encumbered with volumes of useless laws, so enveloping justice with technicalities, and forms, and multiplied modes of procedure, that if justice is obtained, in many cases the costs eat up the proceeds; when the rich and influential practice such conduct as leads the poor and lowly into vice; and when established custom sanctions sin in a variety of its forms, thus leading multitudes on to ruin; in all these, and in many other things, a nation or a community may be unkind, and walk contrary to the Christian law, "overcome evil with good." What is it but the unkindness of community, which suffers an unnatural speculation to raise provisions above the price of labor, grinding the laboring classes in poverty and sorrow, and through absolute want, driving many of them to beggary and theft? What is it but the unkindness of community, that takes from multitudes of the poorer people, all hope of rising in prosperity, and by condemning them to perpetual drudgery, causes many of them, through mere despair, to become thieves and prostitutes? What is it but the unkindness of community, that, because an individual female has made one mis-step, she is driven deeper and deeper into the foulest dens of vice, even when exhibiting an earnest repentance and a strong desire to return to virtue? What is it but the unkindness of community, that winks and smiles at the wickedness, vice, and dissipation of the rich knave, a known gambler, seducer, and oppressor of the weak; yet on whose arm females will lean in confidence at their parties, and whose money gets him notice, even when an individual in humble life, though rich in virtue and knowledge, will be unnoticed by what are called the great? Oh, there is so much misery to be traced directly to the customs and fashions of society, that many a poor man may date his ruin at the door of society, pressed into vice by the follies, examples and oppression of those who always owe to the poor a good example.

I was much impressed with the following extract from Mr. Ainsworth's new work, entitled "Jack Shepard." A benevolent individual urged upon a woman cast in the lowest dregs of life, and whose husband had been hung for house-breaking, to give him her infant. She refused; and when she saw that he was angry at her refusal, she said:—"Don't be angry with me, Sir," cried the widow, sobbing bitterly, "pray don't. I know I am undeserving of your bounty; but if I were to tell you what hardships I have undergone—to what frightful extremities I have been reduced—and to what infamy I have submitted, to earn a scanty subsistence for this child's sake—if you could feel what it is to stand alone in the world as I do, bereft of all who ever loved me, and shunned by all who have ever known me, except the worthless and the wretched—if you knew (and Heaven grant that you may be spared the knowledge!) how much affliction sharpens love, and how much more dear to me my child has become for every sacrifice I have made for him—if you were told all this, you would, I am sure, pity rather than reproach me, because I can not at once consent to a separation, which I feel would break my heart." Many a female, like the one here represented, has been plunged deeper and deeper in infamy, because society has had no smile to win the wanderer from sin, but rather has frowned her away from repentance.

How vividly the following extract portrays some of the ruin caused by the modern arrangements of society. It is in the same conversation between the same individuals, from which the foregoing extract was taken:—"Let me advise you on no account, (said Wood,) to fly to strong waters for consolation, Joan. One nail drives out another, it's true; but the worst nail you can employ is a coffin nail. Gin Lane's the nearest road to the churchyard."

"It may be, but if it shortens the distance, and lightens the journey, I care not," retorted the widow, who seemed by this reproach to be roused into sudden eloquence. 'To those who, like me, have never been able to get out of the dark and dreary paths of life, the grave is indeed a refuge, and the sooner they reach it the better. The spirit I drink may be poison—it may kill me—perhaps it is killing me:—but so would hunger, cold, misery—so would my own thoughts. I should have gone mad without it. Gin is the poor man's friend—his whole set off against the rich man's luxury. It comforts him when he is most forlorn. It may be treacherous, it may lay up a store of future woe; but it insures present happiness and that is sufficient. When I have traversed the streets a houseless wanderer, driven with curses from every door where I have solicited alms, and with blows from every gateway where I have sought shelter—when I have crept into some deserted building, and stretched my wearied limbs upon a bulk, in the vain hope of repose—or, worse than all, when frenzied with want, I have yielded to horrible temptation, and earned a meal in the only way I could earn one—when I have felt, at times like these, my heart sink within me, I have drunk of this drink, I have at once forgotten my cares, my poverty, my guilt. Old thoughts, old feelings, old faces, and old scenes have returned to me, and I have fancied myself happy—as happy as I am now.' And she burst into a wild hysterical laugh."

"'Poor creature!' ejaculated Wood. 'Do you call this frantic glee happiness?'"

"'It's all the happiness I have known for years,' returned the widow, becoming suddenly calm, 'and it's short-lived enough, as you perceive. I tell you what, Mr. Wood,' added she in a hollow voice and with a ghastly look, 'gin may bring ruin; but as long as poverty, vice, and ill-usage exist, it will be drunk.'"

How many a poor creature, frowned on by the world, driven from all chance of repentance, without one friendly voice to say as the Saviour said, "go, and sin no more," have reasoned as this woman reasoned, and gone to destruction while attempting to drown their guilt and sorrow in the bowl of intoxication. It is in vain to disguise the fact, that the largest share of the squalor and filth, the poverty and intemperance, the prostitution and fraud, which exist in every community, may be fairly charged to the follies, unnatural rules, vicious fashions, and demoralizing examples of society. Think of it and talk of it as we may, it is solemn truth, that most of the poor and the wretched owe their degradation to that wicked state of society which consigns them to drudgery, and shuts them out from all hope of rising to better things by making them "hewers of wood and drawers of water." Can any person deem that state of society kind, (thank God, it is passing away!) which sanctioned the laws that tore the poor and honest debtor from his family, to place him in a hopeless imprisonment, where, without the possibility of obtaining means to pay his debt, he would be left to rot into his grave with despair, while his wife and children sunk into unpitying poverty, and perhaps to crimes that would make the heart creep with horror? Well did an English author represent a poor debtor in Fleet Prison answering a man who spoke to him of friends.—"Friends!" interposed the man, in a voice which rattled in his throat; (he was sick.) "If I lay dead at the bottom of the deepest mine in the world, tight screwed down and soldered in my coffin, rotting in the dark and filthy ditch that drags its slime along beneath the foundation of this prison, I could not be more forgotten or unheeded than I am here. I am a dead man—dead to society, without the pity they bestow on those whose souls have passed" away. "Friends to see me! My God! I have sunk from the prime of life into old age in this place, and there is not one to raise his hand above my bed, when I lie dead upon it, and say, 'it is a blessing he is gone.'" The philanthropists, the prisoner's friends, have risen up and indignantly rebuked community for its cruelty on this subject, and the time has come, when an honest man, for a little pittance, which he would soon pay, if let alone, can not be consigned to a prison, to have age prematurely creep upon him, and twenty long years of confinement to file down and sharpen his bones for the grave.

The ways in which society or a nation can practice the law of kindness, are full as many as those in which they can be unkind. And, oh! how much more glorious; and how fraught with choice blessings to the poor, the ignorant and the sinful! A nation practices the law of kindness, when it uses every means to settle amicably difficulties with other nations; when it has no craving to seize the territory of another, by military conquest; but, in all its transactions with the world, pursues a course of conciliation, integrity and high-mindedness; and especially, when, with noble effort, it induces two nations on the eve of war, to arrange the subject of contention without bloodshed. A community practices the law of kindness, when it avoids all sanguinary laws; when its laws are based on a philanthropy which seeks not only to protect society and deter others from crime, but also aims to reform the offender and restore him to sound moral health. Because a man is a criminal, it does not argue that he is incapable of becoming a better man, or that he is devoid of feeling. A judge in central New-York, whose head is whitened with the coming frosts of age, and who has long sat on the bench of justice, said to me—"In the whole course of my experience as a judge, I have never yet had a criminal before me for sentence, but whose feelings I could touch, and whose heart I could subdue, by referring to the mother who watched over and sustained him, or by kindly and affectionately describing to him the evil which he had brought upon himself." A community practices the law of kindness, when it places men over its prisons, who are qualified for their duty, by a thorough acquaintance with human nature, by the most extensive and earnest Christian benevolence, joined with the most prudent firmness, and by a deep conviction that criminals are morally sick, and are deprived of their liberty only that moral medicine may be applied to them to restore them to sound moral health. Harshness and cruelty are very far from being the characteristics necessary to fit a man as manager of prison discipline.—I am aware of an instance of a convict who was governed entirely with the lash for years, yet who was only hardened into sullen disobedience by such treatment.—And I am also aware, that when another individual became his agent, and met him in a friendly manner with kind advice, the prisoner was melted into tears, changed his conduct, and was ever after a good convict.

A nation practices the law of kindness, when its energies are directed to the advancement of education in reference to each and every one of its members. Especially, when its attention is directed to the education of the poor children which may now be found in every community, growing up in ignorance, theft and crime of all kinds, to fill jails and prisons, and at last to form a debased rabble, subject to the nod of any demagogue who may use them to destroy our government. The kindness consists in preparing them by knowledge to become good citizens and defenders of the American Constitution, as well as lovers of religion and virtue.—A nation or community practices the law of kindness, when it stretches the broad hand of its protection over the poor as well as the rich, and seeks to raise the condition of the lowly and degraded—when it aims to remove poverty and distress, by encouraging industry, by compelling the idle to be active, by removing the causes of crime, and by holding out encouragement to the weak and the feeble. In these, and in many other ways, a nation or a community may practice the law of kindness. And I have no hesitation in saying, that a nation or community practicing it, would become the abode of truth, virtue, peace, justice, temperance and love towards God and man. G. W. M.

CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES—NO. VII.

THE REAL TREASURES.

"But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven."—Matt. vi: 20.

I am aware that I shall be found guilty of triteness, in discoursing of the mutability of earthly things; but the passage in our Lord's sermon upon the mount, from which the above words are taken, contains such an important truth, and such a persuasive reason, and is, withal, so little heeded practically, that I deem it proper, and I hope it may prove beneficial, to devote a brief portion of time and space to its consideration.

The points contained in these verses,* are—the changeable and frail nature of earthly treasures, the durability of heavenly riches the devotion of the heart to that which occupies and sways the mind, and a reason, drawn from these facts, why we should lay up heavenly instead of earthly treasures. These we will consider in the course in which I have presented them.

In the first place, then, of the mutability and uncertainty of earthly treasures. No profound reasoning is needed to maintain this point. We require only the philosophy of common sense and common observation. The nature of every physical existence is frail and changeable. It is not only the spring-flower or the rainbow, that arises in beauty to our vision, and then fades away. "The great globe itself"—its vast mountains and wide-spread hills, its vallies and sheeting waters, are changing, changing. The germ changes in the bosom of earth—it opens, and sends forth the tiny shoot that springs up through the yielding soil, and fanning in the breeze and expanding in the sunshine, nodding in the storm and imbibing life in the shower, it rises and spreads from the slender sapling to the goodly tree, and swells, and strengthens, and gnarls its knotted arms, until its broad branches shadow a wide portion of the forest, and "the old oak" of a hundred years, towers proudly and aloft. But change is still at work. The subtle influences of decay are slowly eating towards its heart, and, anon, when we pass by that way, we behold its fallen trunk, and its blighted glories sere and scattered around it. But change is still at work. Slowly, yet surely, does that huge organization moulder and crumble away, until every vestige is mingled and lost in the soil, and, perhaps, another germ springs up through the rich, soft mould, to arise, and flourish, and change in its stead!

We go down among the strata of earth, and there are forms of once-existing things—strange plants, unique animals, curious shells, bones and petrifactions. All these have had a being. That huge Mastodon has once been clothed with flesh, and animated, and has prowled, and sported, and shaken the earth with his treadings.—That rare and forgotten plant once flared gorgeously in the sun, or danced to the sprinkling rain-drops. Those bones have given power, perhaps mighty action—have been knit and moulded in forms of glorious symmetry—have been hardened to toil, or have moved to and fro in the ranks of the battle or the chase. But change came upon all these. They perished in the doom of earthly things, and men, eagerly prying them up, and gazing upon them with perplexed looks, curiously wonder what manner of things they were.

Go, stand in some old banquet-hall, where move the owl, and the night-hawk, and the "lonely wing" of the "wind." There have been high revelry and busy tumult there, in days gone by. The festal board has groaned with luxury, and vessels of gold have glistened in the torch-light. Bright eyes of love have flashed above the ruby wine, and bold brows of manly beauty have blended with dark and girlish tresses. Music has thrilled those old, damp banners that now thrill to the night-breeze, and the merry heart of the dancer has throbbed under the corselets that rust upon the wall.—But where now are the brightness, the garlands and the beauty? Grey hairs have sprung up where dark locks flowed—proud forms went down among the spears and glaives of battle—and there were broken hearts and tearful eyes in years that came, among those who joyed here in the festal time. And then death swept them all away, and you can not find their tombs, or you read their memories dimly upon the mouldering stone.

"Those lights have fled—those garlands, dead," and all have departed!

The pyramids, the tall, proud pyramids—they may be pointed out to us, as defying time and resisting change. But they will crumble. Where are the gates of Thebes, the sculptured glories of Balbec? And as they stand, they are eloquent monitors of change and frailty, for who were they who reared them? Where are they who shouted when their top-stones were laid and completed. Where are they who exulted as the first silvery star-beam rested upon their summits—who saw the sun ray which first struck music from Memnon? Go down into their depths and read the fate of monarchs and of mighty ones! Where are the kingly Pharaohs, the priesthood of Isis and the mysteries of the Osirian worship? Where are the hands that reared and the arts that shaped these massy piles? Where are the old multitudes that gathered, and laughed, and wept, and toiled, and sung, and schemed around their bases?

The stars that

"————— wink and listen, While Heaven's eternal melodie roll"—

even they are not exempt from change. How many since the creation, have come down nearer to us to cast their "sweet influences" upon the earth? In what sphere, beyond belted Orion and dim Georgian Sidus, hymns the lost Pleiad?

Empires, thrones and dominions—the mighty, the glory and the beauty of the earth—have passed, are passing, and will pass away, while time casts a shadow upon humanity. Truly says an eloquent writer*—"We can almost catch the sound of universal wasting, and hear the work of desolation going on busily around us..... The face of the world is changing daily and hourly. All animated things grow old and die. The rocks crumble, the trees fall, the leaves fade and the grass withers.—The clouds are flying, and the waters are flowing from us."

I am aware, reader, that much of this refers to the physical world around us, and even were that all which changed, there would be an argument against laying up our only treasures upon earth, from the fact that these treasures must share the fate of all physical existences. Did we possess the boon of eternal existence in this sphere—were we to stand up amid this "universal wasting," unmoved—our treasures would glide from us like the bright streams that flow by to the ocean; and dearly loved objects, upon which we rested our hearts, would fall, or wither and moulder to nought, giving us—although we might engage in renewed pursuits—giving us continual pangs of grief and disappointment. But we are not exempt from change—nay, these physical objects around us, frequently survive us, and live long ages after those who were once their possessors have gone to the tomb. In and upon us is change, working sorrow and weakness of faculties, and disease, and pain and death. We pass from ruddy infancy to buoyant youth, sober manhood and decrepit old age, almost without feeling that we move, and when we are girding up to journey on with new energy, lo! we stand at the gate of the grave, and our pilgrim staff is broken. We must be separated from our earthly treasures—we can not carry them with us through the tomb, and if we build our all upon them we must weep our loss. But the passage under consideration may more especially refer to those accidents and contingences which happen in life, than to the effects of the natural and unavoidable course of things. We will enquire, in our next, what are earthly treasures, or, at least, some of them.

Conversion in the Ministry.—Rev. Lorenzo Chase, an open communion Baptist, of Stephentown, this State, has been converted to the faith of universal salvation, and commenced openly proclaiming it. Br. W. Wilcox, of Cheshire, Mass., in giving us the information, says Br. Chase is a man of good talents, and unblemished Christian character. God speed him in enlarging the faith of his brethren who are yet in darkness.

Br. J. G. McAdam, who has been laboring in this this vicinity for nearly two years past, to general acceptance, has finally concluded to leave the ministry and enter the legal profession. He has accordingly sent his letter of fellowship to the Standing Clerk of the Chenango Association, (from which he received it,) and closed his labors in the ministry of reconciliation. This news will astonish some of his friends in this section, as it is but a few weeks since that he avowed a different determination. His faith is undiminished in the doctrine he so lately preached. He has our good wishes for his success. A. B. G.

BEAUTY AND TIME.

Time met beauty one day in her garden,
Where roses were blooming fair;
Time and Beauty were never good friends,
So she wondered what brought him there.
Poor Beauty exclaimed, with a sorrowful air,
I request father Time, my sweet roses you'll spare—
For Time was going to mow them all down;
While Beauty exclaimed with her prettiest frown,
Fie, father Time! Fie, father Time!
Oh, what a crime! Fie, father Time!

Well, said Time, at least let me gather
A few of your roses here;
'Tis part of my pride to be always supplied
With roses the whole of the year.
Poor Beauty consented, though half in despair,
And Time, as he went, asked a lock of her hair;
And as he stole the soft ringlet so bright,
He vowed 'twas for love, but she knew 'twas for spite.

Time went on and left beauty in tears—
'Tis a tale the world well knows;
So he boasted to all, of the lady's fair fall,
And showed the lost ringlet and rose.
So shocked was poor Beauty to find that her fame
Was ruined, though she was in no wise to blame,
That she drooped like some flower that's torn from its clime,
And her friends all mysteriously said—it was Time.

[From the Cincinnati Journal.]

I gazed upon the tattered garb
Of one who stood a list'ner by;
The hand of misery pressed him hard,
And tears of sorrow swell'd his eye.

I gazed upon his pallid cheek,
And asked him how his cares begun—
He sighed, and thus essay'd to speak;
"The cause of all my grief is RUM!"

I watched a maniac through the gate,
Whose ravings shock'd me to the soul;
I asked what sealed his wretched fate,
The answer was—the cursed bowl!

I asked a convict in his chains
While tears along his cheek did roll,
What devil urged him on to crimes—
His answer was—the cursed bowl!

RAMBLINGS IN ROME.

"To the studio of Thorwaldsen," said I.

My cicerone led the way, and in a few minutes we were in the workshop of the greatest living sculptor.—He was not himself present. He has given up hard or constant labor: old age forbids it. Now and then he gives some finishing strokes. By his pupils a statue or a group is carried up almost to the point of life. It is there left by them, and the chisel of the master comes. The pupils sculpture it for the multitude; Thorwaldsen, with a few touches, then finishes it for the connoisseurs, and for immortality. I was much interested in wandering through his five or six rooms. They were crowded with artistical objects in curious forms. In one apartment were several clay models. These are the first visible manifestations of the sculptor. They are the immediate imbodiments of conception, and demand the highest efforts of genius. All subsequent labor is quite mechanical, or bordering on it. After the model comes a mould, bearing its impression. Then from this mould is fashioned the cast, which is ever present to the artist's eye while chiseling. Scattered about, were many marble blocks just from the quarry; and many others but rudely wrought—an arm shadowed out here, and a leg there. In this, the form was faintly beaming forth into expression; in that, it had come forth into its nearest proximity to life. I was attracted by a statue of Christ. The features were indeed heavenly. Before me, to be sure, was earthly marble; but all else earthly had been purged therefrom. The figure is gently bending; its countenance is in repose; the eyes are downward turned; and the whole expression is of humility, but the humility of a celestial being. Fastening the eye upon it for a long time, the beholder seems advanced into the presence of high heaven-born qualities. These every-day schemes and pursuits have for a little while relaxed their hold upon his heart. He is amazed at those mysterious powers of Art, which can so vividly and impressively make a block of marble the visible home of noble and spiritual affections. How near may the creature approximate to the Creator! He may go quite up to that mysterious line, that separates life from that which is just below, just less than life. He can endow the stone with an intellect and a heart. He can enliven it with thoughts and with passions. He can make it meditate, and love, and fear, and hope, and hate. He can only not make it breathe.

In an adjacent room was a statute of a Russian princess, and one of the most beautiful works of the kind which I have lately seen. It was also completely cleansed of every thing material. Never was there more admirable skill of artist. How delicately and dexterously were intellect and feeling with each other interwrought, and there interminglied!

Among a hundred other objects of interest, was the bust of Thorwaldsen. It reminded me of the features of Franklin. It had their philosophic calmness; their kind, manly, honest expression. It represents the artist at the age of sixty. Covered with years and fame, Thorwaldsen is about to retire to Copenhagen, the place of his nativity: the city may well rejoice, as indeed she has often done, in the fame of this illustrious son.

Leaving the studio, I reflected upon my next move. It was a warm, hazy, dream-like day, fit for cogitations among its ruins. It had already killed the chief lions of Rome; palaces—churches—antiquities. One, however, remained. We passed to it;—the Column and Forum of Trajan;—Trajan, a virtuous emperor, in an age when virtue was little more than an empty name. After the lapse of near two thousand years, "still we Trajan's name adore." This column," began my guide, "is one hundred and thirty-two feet high. It is historic. Those bassi relievi—twenty-three of which are spirals, and twenty-five hundred figures—represent the Dacian victories of that Emperor. The top was formerly surmounted by his bronze statue, in whose hands was a golden urn containing his ashes. They are gone! That you see above, is the statue of St. Peter." At last the brazen image of the saint has got the better of that mighty heathen, though the great original, living, could hardly stand against the imperial idolator of his day.—Well may the faithful esteem this an emblem of the all-victorious spirit of Catholic Christianity. Its foot is on the neck, not only of its relentless foes, but of their very statues. And this column is historic. A happy thought to perpetuate heroic deeds; not in volumes prisoned up in libraries inaccessible save to the literary few; but in marble or in brass, that shall stand broadly, openly, readably, out to the eyes of all, and through their eyes, appealing to their understandings and their hearts.—Doubtless there was much in these ever-present embodiers of stirring events, to create and keep alive a patriotic ambition among the citizens of Rome. And here stood the Forum of the Emperor. This was one of the most magnificent structures in Rome. It was designed by Apollodorus, the Athenian. Yonder was a splendid palace. Upon this side was a beautiful marble temple, dedicated to the emperor. Upon that were a gymnasium, a library, a triumphal arch, and porticoes; and above and beneath were equestrian statues, and numerous sculptured forms of Rome's most illustrious citizens. This was regarded as a wonder, even when that city was in its glory. "Its gigantic edifices," says Ammianus Marcellinus, "it is impossible to describe, or for any mortals to conceive." When the Emperor Constans entered Rome, he was struck with astonishment and admiration at the magnitude and beauty of this work. He despaired of executing any thing equal to it, and said the only object he would, or could imitate, was the horse whereon the bronze statue of Trajan was seated. Where now is that equestrian group? Vanished! I stand upon the spot where it stood. Long has it been crumbled to fragments with those wherein are the bones of the prince who wished to imitate it. And where is the statue that looked abroad triumphantly from yonder summit? A certain cardinal has its head—that was not long since dug up from amongst the rubbish at the foot of the column—stowed away in his closet. And where is the gilded urn, which, holding the dust of the departed emperor, rested in the statue's right hand? You may see it, as you ascend the Capitol, upon an old Roman mile-stone. And where is the Forum? I see before me a large open space, cleared up by French curiosity. Yonder are halves of some twenty enormous granite columns, still standing, and strewed around. I behold fragments of capitals and friezes—the arm of one statue and the leg of another. These, however, are only the relics of a little part. Remains on a grander scale lie fifteen feet under the earth's surface, beneath those churches and that palace. The curiosity of some coming age may perhaps dig them up.

Truly, a most thorough desolation did those Northern Barbarians make in their destroying enterprizes! Not one of those immense columns remains whole. With what fiendish and eager zeal must they have gone on, heaping destruction on destruction! For a moment you may seem to see as in some dream, the beautiful porticoes, the sacred temple, the triumphal arch, on whose top is a car drawn by four marble steeds, standing out with chiseled distinctness in the clear sky. The vision changes, and lo! savage forms with fire and sword, are desecrating the heathen fane, and you hear their exulting shouts, as the statue of the emperor tumbles from that far height headlong to the ground. That vision swiftly fades. Temple and tower have gone down. The cries of vanquisher and vanquished have ceased. A thousand years pass away, and before you is nothing but this melancholy rubbish!

I should like to drink with you, said a person to a Quaker friend, as they entered a hotel in New-York. "I shall be happy to," replied the Quaker. "Waiter," said the gentleman, "bring two glasses of brandy."—They were brought. "Your health," said he, pouring down the poison. The Quaker bowed, took an empty glass, filled it with cold water, and said, "Friend, thou hast done me the favor to wish my health—I return the compliment; but I can do it as well and as sincerely with pure water as with strong liquor."

DEATHS.

In Athens, June 3d, Mr. ABNER MURRAY, aged 66 years. In this dispensation, a devoted companion, who stood by him in his expiring moments, is for the second time in her life, left to mourn in the gloomy pilgrimage of widowhood. Three children are deprived of a faithful father, two sisters and a brother of an affable friend. He died in the triumphs of the Gospel of love. Sermon on the 5th, by
G. S. AMES.

July 9th, Mrs. BETSEY WATKINS, wife of John Watkins, aged 46 years. Leaving a husband and a large family of children to mourn her departure. Sermon by G. S. A.

In Camillus, June 17th, of inflammation in the bowels, Capt. WM. B. CAMPBELL, aged 35 years. The deceased was a firm believer in the restitution, a good man, and much respected by his neighbors, as the numerous congregations at his funeral testified. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." May the consolations of the Gospel be experienced by his mourning family.
G. W. M.

In Sempronius, April 2d, of cancer, Miss SYBIL WHITWOOD, aged 56 years. The deceased died a believer in the Restitution, which, notwithstanding a distressing illness, gave her peace and comfort. May consolation be given to the mourning relatives and friends. G. W. M.

In Rushford, June 5th, FRANCIS HELEN, daughter of Calvin G. and Mary P. Leavens, aged 3 years, 11 months, and 22 days. Funeral on the 6th, by the writer.
I. B. SHARP.

In Port Huron, St. Clair county, Mich., on the 10th ult., Mrs. JULIA A., consort of Dr. A. E. Noble, in the 32d year of her age.

In Russelsburg, Pa., July 8th, Mrs. RACHEL, wife of Eben Vicory, and daughter of Lemuel and Polly Barnes, in the 32d year of her age, leaving a companion and six children to mourn their loss. Sermon by Br. S. Adams.
G. S. G.

In Cooperstown, on the 29th ult., Mrs. SEMANTHA, consort of Mr. Joseph Bennett, in the 30th year of her age.—Her last sickness, which was protracted and painful, she endured with Christian fortitude, leaving a practical illustration of the power of illimitable grace, not only in life but in death. Seldom has it fallen to our lot to record the death of one in whom were combined a greater number of excellent traits of character. In the relation of wife, child, sister, neighbor, and in the society of which she was a worthy member, in all the above relations, her loss will be deeply felt. Sister Bennett was a practical Universalist. Previous to her death, she made request to be laid by the side of her father, and made choice of the writer of this to preach a funeral discourse to her friends, and with a hope full of immortality she fell asleep in Jesus.

May the consolations of the Gospel be the portion of all that are called to mourn by reason of the above dispensation.

SERMON.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

With much pleasure we copy the following Extracts from the Richmond (Va.) Compiler, of July 23d. The Editor of the Compiler thus introduces the Extracts:

"PUBLIC BLESSINGS AND PUBLIC DUTIES."

This is the subject of a Discourse delivered by the Rev. E. H. Chapin, pastor of the Universalist church in this city, before his congregation and a large number of citizens, on Sunday, the 7th day of July. The Discourse was greatly admired by all who heard it, and many have expressed a desire to see it in print. With the permission of Mr. C. we have selected some extracts for publication, (the whole being too long for our space,) which we are sure will be acceptable to our readers.—We present to-day extracts from the first branch of the subject, "Public Blessings," and shall offer a few from that of "Public Duties" hereafter. These extracts abound in rich imagery: and the reader will agree with us that they breathe a wholesome and fervid patriotism, inculcate a proper sense of obligation to the Dispenser of Blessings, and set forth salutary precepts relative to the "public duties" of citizens. The following are the appropriate texts of the Discourse:

"He hath not dealt so with any nation."—PSALM cxlvii: 20.
"What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits to me?" PSALM cxvi: 12.

OUR PHYSICAL ADVANTAGES.

But there is another consideration respecting our physical advantages. Look at our land through all its length and breadth. Behold how happily we are situated beneath the influences of various climates! We have in our domain, the products of the hardy North—it gives us the live oak of the forest that shall form the solid frame work of our gallant vessels, and lie in their massy keels, when their "——— home is on the mountain-wave,

And their march is o'er the deep,'

We have the grateful staples and nourishing fruits of the South, pouring wealth into our treasuries and storing our garners with glittering sheaves. Our sons are here, in the East, where the eagle

"——————— dips
His sounding pinions in the sun's first gush," and where commerce and intelligence pour in swiftly and fresh from the olden realm, and yet away in the distant prairies of the West, where the Pacific shouts along its shores, are children of our own blood and kindred—denizens of the same free government with ourselves. The star-spangled banner catches, upon turret and mountain-peak, the first ray of the rising orb of morning, and the star-spangled banner in remote Oregon, through openings which the axe has cleft in "the dark, old woods," glows with his setting beam as he sinks to his ocean rest! And, then, our health-giving mountains, our noble rivers coursing through the land, our broad lakes sleeping like mysteries among the hills and beneath the glittering stars, and all our facilities for enterprize and wealth! —— Oh, God hath placed us in a glorious clime, and given us a fitting dwelling place for freedom! Here are no gilded tombs and time-worn hatchments of departed kings—here are no ivy wreathed and frowning castles of pampered, and titled, and oppressive nobility!—Here are no regal neighbors to sweep us down with locust-legions, or to trample us beneath the iron ranks of invasion. By the fiat of Him who made the worlds, it has, as it were, sprung from the bosom of the sea, with its tall and sunlit mountains, and its green vallies fresh with morning dews, to be the glorious abode of our liberty. It is the land we love, wherever we may roam, wherever our feet may rest—it is the land where our mothers sung above our cradle-beds, and where our grey-haired sires sleep in their honored tombs—it is the "Land of the forest and the rock—

Of dark blue lake and mighty river—
Of mountains reared aloft to mock
The storm's career—the lightning's shock—
Our own green land forever!"

And this land, I say, God hath given us, my hearers, to be our heritage and our own free dwelling place. Truly, may we exclaim—"he hath not dealt so with any nation!"

VIRGINIA.

Think you that Newport and Smith, when they passed up your winding river and gazed upon the royal-residence of the forest-king—twelve wigwams just below the site of Richmond*—when the feathered and painted savage leaped forth to meet them—think you that they dreamed of such a time as this? Go ask the shores where the voice of the stranger for the first time echoed! Speak to the crumbling walls of yon ruin,† the remains of their first monument of civilization! True, they thought "that heaven and earth seem never to have agreed better to form a place for man's commodious and delightful habitation"‡—but did they ever dream of such an hour as this? Would we, who now gaze without wonder upon the results of their immigration, would we then have foreboded and seen them in the distant futurity. But from those who were on the search for mines and clods of "glittering earth"—among whom, to use the language of Smith,§ "there was now no talk, no hope, no work, but dig gold, wash gold, refine gold, load gold"—from such aspirations as these, upon this very soil, were to go forth high thoughts of liberty richer than mines of wealth, and from a starved and famine-smitten colony, were to flow out broad seas of shining harvest, and to arise the tall spires and countless dwellings of populous and busy marts. ——— Says the historian‖—"not an element of popular liberty was introduced into the form of government." This was dark, and who, standing under that thick cloud, would have seen the day-spring of the future? Yet that day-spring broke forth and ushered in the glorious morning! The elements of liberty were not found in the form of government, yet they lived in circumstances.—They lived, as it were, in the soil, and breathed in the very air of the Old Dominion. Although principles belonging to the mother-country were respected by her, yet she was free "from the burdens of forest laws, and military tenures, courts of words and star-chambers."¶ She was separated from England by three thousand miles of heaving waters. The planter nourished liberty by his streams and in his forests—it kindled in the rebellion of Bacon—it lived in hearts, like the prepared fuel, waiting but the moment of ignition. "Tyranny was impossible," says Bancroft, "it had no powerful instruments. Despotism sought in vain to establish itself in Virginia; when the prerogative of the Governor was at its height, he was still too feeble to oppress the colony. Virginia was always A LAND OF LIBERTY." "Opinions were coming into life; and the plastic effort of modern political being was blindly, but effectually at work." And these opinions broke forth when the spirit of revolution swept through the land. Its kindling impulses were felt in the "Give me liberty, or give me death!" which burst from eloquent and burning lips, and the descendants of those who were here in feebleness and peril—of those of the dark and early time—were among the first to gather around that table, and to sign, as it were, with their blood, that great CHARTER, which was sealed by victory and bequeathed to their children, and which, we trust, is never to be blotted by tyranny or torn by disunion.

THE PILGRIMS.

Let us turn from one great field of the early history of our country to another. The Puritans of England, stern in their independence, and conscientious in their non-conformity, "harrassed by imprisonments, search warrants, trivial persecutions, and the various malice of intolerance," first turned their pilgrim feet to the shores of Holland. They landed in Amsterdam and dwelt in Leyden. Would you have told me at that time that from the sterile and ice-bound shores of New-England, there should go forth an influence pouring light upon the world—destroying mitres and convulsing thrones? What turned the feet of the pilgrim from Holland? What put it into his heart to take up the ark of religious liberty and bear it across the stormy Atlantic, and to kindle its spark in the forest where the red man dwelt? In Holland, says the historian which we have before quoted—"they were restless from the consciousness of ability to act a more important part upon the theatre of the world." Did not He who moves the springs of mind, create the suggestion, and was it not natural that, in their anxious thought, their eyes should be turned to the new world? Its rocks would make their everlasting altars; its forests their broad free temples; its hills and its vallies their homes, which should be heritages of liberty, whence their principles should go forth to triumph and enlighten, and where their children should rear up their banners, and worship at their shrines forever. "Out of small beginnings," said Bradford,* "great ends have been produced, and as one small candle may light a thousand, so the light here kindled hath shown to many." "I charge you," said Robinson† in his farewell, "before God and his blessed angels, that you follow me no farther than you have seen me follow the Lord Jesus Christ. The Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of his holy word. I can not sufficiently bewail the condition of the reformed churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go at present no further than the instruments of their reformation. Luther and Calvin were great and shining lights in their times, yet they penetrated not into the whole counsel of God. I beseech you, remember it, 'tis an article of your church covenant, that you be ready to receive whatever truth shall be made known to you from the written word of God."

Such were the great hopes, the dauntless energies, the lofty principles, which Bradford, Standish and Winslow bore with them into the wilderness. Such were the causes that nerved them on amid the icy wave and the Winter sleet—that made the strong prayer to ascend, and the song of praise to swell out from that feeble, storm-tossed bark, going up amid the wild waste of waters to the high Heaven and the omnipotent God, who was their guide and shield! These were the influences that made the snow-clad earth, and the naked forest, and the ice-hung rocks, bleak as they were, to brighten to their vision, who landed upon the shore of Plymouth, on the eleventh of December, 1620.

*As quoted by Bancroft. †Ibid.

OUR PRIVILEGES AND BLESSINGS.

Again; as appropriate to our subject, I would speak of our present condition, and our free institutions. It will be, I know, employing a trite strain of remark, to speak of the freedom of the American people, and the blessings which we enjoy. But, like our individual mercies, as well aware of them as we may be, we are apt to forget them, or to realize feebly the amount of good which we enjoy in them. But to fully appreciate the circumstances under which we live, we have only to turn to other lands and other ages, and draw the contrast. Where, then, in all the empires of the past, will you find a nation enjoying the blessings which we possess at the present day? Is it any of those which composed the image of clay, and brass, and iron? Do you find them in the realm of the Chaldee, the domain of the rich Lydian, the empire of the fierce Mede, the voluptuous Persian, the mighty and glorious Greek, the kingly and triumphant Roman? Under the grey and frowning walls of antiquity, can you find the relics of such pillars as these, which stand up in their massive strength and support our temple of freedom? In the worm-eaten codes and mouldering archives which lie under the dust and rubbish of ages, can you decipher such free and glorious principles of government? If you do find them, can you read in the record which history has snatched with trembling hand from time as he winged his happy flight, that they were ever reared with such an expansive firmness, or that they were ever so successfully tested?

And where is our parallel among our contemporaries? Do you find it in Russia? Do the blessings of freedom bloom among its everlasting snows, or in the royal atmosphere of Petersburg or Moscow? Is it with the Turk, who this very day, perhaps, draws his glittering blade and rushes into deadly conflict with his brother of Egypt? Do you find it beneath the shadow of prisons, and under the influence of despotic edicts, in Austria? Is it in enervated Italy? In poor and crushed Spain? Among the Vesuvius revolutions which agitate France? Do you see it in sorrowing Greece, as she rises up among her tombs and temples, and shakes the dust of long ages from her garments? Do you behold it in those new republics of the south, where the just-risen constellation of liberty sparkles above the Andes? Is it even in England, proud and happy as she is? Would you exchange with one or with all these, your condition and your home? Would you, for much treasure, barter away your blood-bought privileges, and give up your free institutions, and move your household gods, and plant your vines and fig-trees, and take your abode under the laws and customs of a stranger? No, not one of you! And this, not only because you love your land with the natural affection of patriotism, but because you have palpable and glowing demonstrations all around you that it is the happiest of all.

Americans, what is your condition this very day—upon this Sabbath of our God? Look around you. The scythe and the sickle lie idle in the yellow harvest-field because the reaper has gone up to his worship; to-morrow, over thousands of broad acres, they will glitter among the plumy grain, and on a thousand hill-sides he will sing among his sheaves. The sails lie furled at all your wharves, and the blessed stillness of the day has fallen upon them—to-morrow they will be spread out like white wings of peace to the breezes of Heaven, and glisten in the sun, and be scattered over the sea towards every port of the known world! The quiet that reigns so profound in your shops and marts, and sunny streets, marks the deep respect to the civil law, and to order that exists, if not a regard to a higher and holier principle. The intelligent countenances that beam in the many congregations which are assembled together, in all our land, to hear the word of life, show us the benefits of a wide-spread and useful education. The sects of every name that worship at their respective altars, peaceably and unmolested, with no inquisitor at their doors, and no martyr's death-shriek ringing in their ears, tell us that here is religious liberty, tolerating all within its broad and ample domain, and lighting its shrines from fires that were kindled here of old, amid blood, and tears, and prayer!

Pause, then, upon this blessed Sabbath, pause and look around you, and as each blessing glows out before you, let your hearts be filled with a grateful realization of what you enjoy. He who rules the nation hath given us these, hath opened his liberal hand and poured mercies upon your path. Think deeply of this I beseech you. The annual day of remembrance has passed by. You welcomed it in with the voice of "the thunder-gun" and with shouting. Your starry banner was unfurled from every pinnacle, and from every mast-head. The roar of ordnance, and the echo of free hearts thrilled through every valley, and away into the deep forests of our land. There were the banquet, the oration, and the song.—But oh! say, amid all these, did there go up the sweet incense of gratitude gushing from the soul? Was God remembered for the mercies which he has wrought for us? How much of our thanksgiving does He claim! In the light of all his benefits which cluster around us, how freely should we offer that thanksgiving! How forcibly do the words of the text present themselves as applying to our case! "HE HATH NOT DEALT SO WITH ANY NATION."

LETTER FROM BR. SANFORD.

Deerfield, Livingston county, Mich., June 20th, 1839.

Br. GROSH:—

I have so long held my peace, that I have no doubt but you, and others of my friends at the East, are ready to conclude that I have hung my harp upon the willows, and retired in solitude from the part assigned me to act in the great and good cause of a world's emancipation; and the object of this letter is, to correct that idea, if it has obtained in the minds of my friends, and I believe it has, for I frequently hear of the inquiry, "Where is Br. Sanford?" or "What is he doing"? Believing that an answer to the above inquiries would be gratifying to many of your readers, I submit the following to your consideration, and if you are of the same opinion you may lay it before them.

I am permanently settled in the township of Deerfield, in the county of Livingston; one of the most healthful, delightsome and excellent portions of the infant, yet beautiful and promising State of Michigan—on a beautiful farm of a fertile soil; well watered, and every way calculated to repay the toil and sweat of its husbandman; and I am anticipating great pleasure in the enjoyment of this world's goods; but this is a minor consideration, compared with the more weighty objects which present themselves before me.

I came to this country about a year ago, under rather embarrassing circumstances. I owned this small farm, it is true; but was almost pennyless; and in addition to that, my health was greatly impaired, and, what was still worse, I knew no one to whom I could express my religious sentiments without receiving a sneer, or some cold expression of dislike. But here I was, and here I must remain; for my home was here, and my family must have a place of residence, and a shelter from the storm when I am called away. The state of my health was such, that I felt myself admonished to set my house in order, and prepare for my exit to that world from which no traveller returns. I disposed of a part of my property, which enabled me to make some small improvements upon my farm, and erect a small frame house, which makes us a comfortable home, to which I would respectfully invite all of the Abrahamic faith, especially brethren in the ministry, who may chance to pass through this region of "the beautiful West." My health began to improve, and I soon enjoyed better health than I had before in severa years.

About the first of January last, I commenced my ministerial career in this county, and since then I have found multitudes who rejoice in the hope of a world's salvation.

I am under stated engagements for every Sabbath in the year, in four different places in this county, to wit, Oceola, Deerfield and Oceola, Iosco and Marion, and Putnam. In all of these places the probability is, societies or churches will be organized during the year. In Iosco and Marion a society is to be organized in about two weeks. The good cause is in its infancy here, but it is astonishingly prosperous. Only one circumstance has taken place in this region which we have reason to regret; and that causes the most disagreeable sensations. My pen almost shrinks from the task of recording it, and my abilities are wholly incompetent to describe my feelings while I reflect upon the scene. When I engaged to preach to the people of Iosco and Marion, the zeal of our opponents became aroused—a protracted meeting was immediately held, and a few converts were obtained; among whom was a man of the name of Bevin, a native of England, near the city of London, of rather feeble powers of mind, who, in the heat of the excitement, has become a raving maniac. I visited him last Saturday morning—found him with a Bible in his hand, looking over its pages with great anxiety, and when he would discover a passage which he thought favored him, he would read it aloud, which indicated that he thought himself greatly afflicted; and indeed he is afflicted in the highest degree. He had eaten but little for twenty-four hours, and then refused his breakfast; was very taciturn, and is in a hopeless condition.

THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF MICHIGAN, met pursuant to previous notice, and it was resolved that the minutes be published in pamphlet form; and not knowing that any one else will give an account of it to our periodicals, I submit these brief remarks for the satisfaction of our ftiends at the East in particular.

We had one of the most comfortable times I ever witnessed. The only circumstance to be regretted was, our house was too small. Many could not gain admittance. Harmony and peace prevailed in our council, and the "still small voice" of immutable love proclaimed that God was in our midst. Seven preachers were present and as many discourses delivered. Three by Br. H. Roberts of Rochester, N. Y., two by the writer of this, one by Br. T. Wheeler, and one by our venerable and worthy father in Israel, N. Stacy. Three newly organized churches were received into fellowship, and the cheering intelligence received from all points of the compass, would seem to tell that ere long the doctrine of the "restitution" will be the prevailing religious sentiment. And when we become acquainted with the fact, that the believers in this region are generally Universalists indeed, we can reasonably look for no other result. Such at least were the impressions of the delegates and congregation of our Association. The services were truly impressive, and we trust long to be remembered by all who were present. At 5 P. M. of the first day, a social conference was held, in which many and especially hoary headed fathers, expresse their feelings in the most pathetic and humble manner; while many a grateful tear moistened the cheeks of the youth, as well as those of riper years. On the last day the eucharist was celebrated in the most joyful and solemn manner, under the direction of our worthy father, N. Stacy, while many a heart rejoiced, and many a soul was glad, in the commemoration of a Saviour's dying love. Surely thought I, "this is the house of God and the gate of heaven;" and this was the visible expression of every countenance. One circumstance which we had forgotten in its proper place, we must beg to mention here, it was one of deep commiseration and regret. Our much esteemed father, A. H. Curtis, on his way to the Association, was overturned in the stage coach, and broke one of his arms, and of course was hindered from being with us.

LETTERS—REVS. MESSRS. MANLEY AND HOYT.

GAINESVILLE, June 21, 1839.

Br. GROSH:—

The following letters will speak for themselves, and are sent you in hopes that you will give them an insertion for the benefit of the public, and especially the members of the Methodist church and society in this place. Yours,

W. E. MANLEY.

TO REV. MR. HOYT.

Mr. HOYT—I have a few things to submit to your consideration, relative to your character as a man of veracity, concerning which I wish you to offer an explanation for my satisfaction, and that of the community in which you live. You occupy the place of minister of the Gospel; and surely no station involves greater responsibilities, and none should be held more sacred. It becomes preachers in a special manner to give heed to their ways, lest they should become a reproach to their profession, and cause the religion of the Gospel to be an object of abhorrence to unbelievers. I fear you have not been as deeply impressed with these facts as you should be, especially considering the place you occupy and the responsibilities that rest upon you. When you came to this place, the first impressions that the community seem generally to have received respecting you, were quite favorable to your character. At least, I inferred this to be the case from remarks that I heard from various individuals; but by this time, such favorable impressions must, I think, have become quite obliterated. It is probably the fact, as remarked to me by a friend not long since, that when you came to this place, you came "with the big wheels forward;" but you were not here long, before your (moral) carriage was wheeled about; or perhaps I should say, that you have laid aside the big wheels entirely, and now use none but the small ones, and those of the most diminutive kind.

You are hereby called upon to explain and refute if you can, the following charges, which stand decidedly against your moral character.

1. Soon after you came to this place, you made an appointment to preach in the school house where our meetings are usually held, and gave notice that you were going to preach to the Universalists. That notice was communicated to me, with the request that I inform my congregation. I gave the notice accordingly, and presented my personal solicitations that they would attend.

The impression conveyed by your notice, was, that you were going to preach to the Universalists particularly—that your discourse was designed to have special reference to us. And there can be no doubt that such was the impression of all who heard the notice. You presented yourself at the meeting, and, instead of complying with your promise to preach to the Universalists, your remarks were of a general character, and the utmost care was observed, apparently, not to touch upon any points of difference between us and other denominations. In explaining the reasons of this procedure, in your introductory remarks, you observed that you had indeed given notice that you were going to preach to the Universalists, but that it was not with the intention of preaching to them particularly, and that why you happened to give the notice in that way, you knew not. But subsequently you have said, that you gave the notice you did in order to get a congregation, and justified yourself in taking that course. How do these statements harmonize? It is plain, first, that you intentionally deceived the people by giving the notice as you did—secondly, that you told an absolute falsehood when you said you knew not why you happened to give the notice in that way—and thirdly that you confess your deception and justify yourself in it.

2. At the Abolitionist discussion in Warsaw, you made use of very abusive language, with obvious reference to me. And when I replied to what you had said, intimating that you had referred to me, you arose and said, that in your remarks you had no reference to me. Subsequently, however, you confess you referred to me, and affirm that you did not deny having such reference.

These statements, which it can be proved you made, involve you in a direct contradiction—and how you will extricate yourself from it remains to be seen. To these charges of falsehood and deception, others might be added, but it would be time uselessly employed till you vindicate your character from those already preferred.

I shall expect to hear from you soon by letter, as, in the course of a few weeks, it is my intention to bring the subject before the public, unless you can satisfy me of your innocence.

Yours with all due respect,

Rev. Mr. Hoyt. W. E. MANLEY.

MR. HOYT TO MR. MANLEY.

GAINESVILLE, June 11th, 1839.

MY VERY DEAR SIR—I hasten to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 5th instant, which has just come to hand. I would be truly gratified that a friend should attempt to "stir up my mind by way of remembrance," though I can by no means give Mr. Manley credit for new or more forcible impressions. In relation to the information and some thoughts and inferences of your own, contained in your second paragraph, I have just to say, it and they belong to a class of things which I have long since learned to treat with perfect indifference. In a part of your statements in your third paragraph, you have spoken the truth, and in a part of them, permit me to say, not that you have lied, or even told a falsehood, but that you are mistaken. Lastly, you intend to bring the subject before the public. For myself I have been before the public these six years, and the things of which you complain were not done in a corner. Yours with no concern,

Rev. W. E. Manley. D. G. B. HOYT.

REMARKS.

What I have affirmed respecting Mr. Hoyt, as being capable of proof, is attested by a goodly number of witnesses, whose testimony he will hardly be able to impeach. They have given their testimony in writing, and will doubtless do it in the form of an affidavit if necessary. I omit their written statements and names for sake of brevity, as I am aware that our publishers are not pleased with long communications of this kind.

As to Mr. Hoyt's reply to my letter, I may remark that he has virtually admitted his character to be not only as bad as I have represented it, but altogether worse. My charges, he says, "belong to a class of things which he has long since learned to treat with perfect indifference. It appears from this, that I am not the first one that has charged him with deception and falsehood. He has long been the subject of such charges, so that they make up, it would seem, a pretty respectable "class of things." I was in hopes that he had not been so long guilty as he seems to have been, and that a few plain rebukes would tend to check him in his deceptive career; but in this I am mistaken. He has been so long guilty, that my charges and admonitions do not produce any "new or forcible impressions." That man who feels no "new or forcible impressions" when charged with deception and falsehood, must not only have been a long time guilty, but must be exceedingly far gone in transgression.

He has "learned to treat such things with perfect indifference:" accumulated testimony from his own pen, that his character is what I have represented it to be. For no innocent man, occupying his station, especially, would be insensible or indifferent when such charges are preferred against him. Such can only be the case with the hardened sinner.

But on the whole, Mr. Hoyt probably pursues the most politic course. He well knows he can not rebut the charges that have been preferred; and hence he thinks best to shield his polluted character under the cloak of affected contempt. It may be, however, that the public scrutiny will see through the covering, and regard them in the light of his true character. W. E. MANLEY.

JESUS "HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL."—NO. III.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

Most truly may it be said in relation to the mission of Jesus, "he hath done all things well." His commission from the Father, was one of mercy, benevolence, and boundless love to man. And most faithfully did he labor in the work God had given him to do. By night and by day, by sea and by land, in every condition of human life, did he labor, and toil, and strive, and suffer for the good of all—for the promotion of the great object of his mission. He endured and resisted temptation; he waded through trials, and sufferings, and persecutions; he experienced revilings, and murmurings, and buffetings from his enemies. Truly he was "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." And yet his course was onward, and only onward to the performance and finishing of the work which was before him—the great work of emancipating the world from the bondage of sin and moral death.

At one time, passing through the coast of Decapolis, by the sea of Galilee, they brought unto him one that was both deaf and dumb. And he, in accordance with the merciful designs of his mission, opened his ears to hear the sweet and thrilling music of nature's unnumbered songsters, and the glad news of salvation, redeeming peace, and dying love, and loosed his tongue, that he might join in the blissful and harmonious strains of the song of angels—"glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men." This benevolent act of our blessed Redeemer, so surprised, astonished and delighted the wondering spectators, that in the rapture of the moment, and the height of their admiration, they exclaimed, "he hath done all things well." Never, never was there uttered a sentiment more true, in the most extensive sense of the phrase. And it is only equalled by the following.—On a certain occasion, some of the officers of the Sanhedrim were sent to take Jesus and bring him before the council. They departed to execute their commission. It was on "the last day, that great day of the feast," and they found him teaching in the temple. But after listening to his sweet and heavenly voice, and spirit-stirring eloquence, they could not lay their hands upon him, but returned "to the chief priests and Pharisees," with this glorious tribute of praise to the great Redeemer of the world—"Never man spake like this man." Most glorious truth! most blessed testimony! made by the officers, and before the supreme power of the Jewish nation. Being themselves enemies to the despised son of the Nazarene carpenter, and dreading the vengeance of their superiors in power, it must have been no common argument, it could have been no common strain of eloquence, that drew from them this memorable, this ever-blessed response, "Never man spake like this man." No—it was the eloquence of eternal truth, the majesty of the beloved Son of God proclaiming assurances of pardoning love, and precepts of everlasting righteousness, and they were unable to resist it. Despite their superstitions, their prejudices and their fears, they uttered this glorious confirmation to the truth of our text, "he hath done all things well."

LOVE TO GOD AND MAN—NO. I.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

Supreme love to God, and love to all subordinate intelligences, comprise the whole duty of man. All the diversified actions by which happiness is diffused among rational creatures, our Saviour summed up in the glorious and sublime principle, Love. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."

In the prosecution of our subject, we shall, in the first place, notice the chief commandment, endeavor to show its reasonableness and propriety, and point out a few of the many ways in which love to God may be displayed.

Were we to take a survey of the character and perfections of Deity, as they are shown forth in the open volume of nature, and in the holy oracles of divine truth, we would need no other stimulus to incite us to love him "with all our heart, and with all our mind, and with all our strength." When we take into consideration the fact, that God is our Father, and we his children—that he has given us an existence, and crowned it with the richest of blessings—that he is a kind and merciful parent, who continually watches over his vast family, and who has provided every thing necessary for the satisfying of every rational desire, and the gratification of every reasonable wish of the human heart, we must surrender up unto him, the mind's purest and holiest affections. When you look around you, and see what a kind earthly parent has done to administer to your comfort and happiness, you regard him with filial tenderness and love. Then cast your eyes abroad, and behold what parental solicitude and regard your affectionate Father in heaven has exhibited toward you, to render your pilgrimage on earth a delightful and a joyous one, and to make your existence a blessing, even amidst the trials and disappointments which sometimes embitter the cup of human life.

It is because God is good that you are to love him with all your mind, might and strength. It is because he first loved you, that you are to love him. If his character was dark with malignity—if he was filled with wrath and indignation—if he had no good design in the creation of man, and was not interested in his present and future welfare, I would ask no one to love him—I would ask no one to surrender up unto him the holiest affection of his heart; for, constituted as mankind now are, I should be asking an impossibility. No, reader—were I persuaded that our Creator was mutable, that he loved at one time and hated at another, that he smiled propitiously on man to-day and to-morrow was angry with him, I would not plead with you to give him your hearts, and trust in him as your Father and Friend. And were I to do so, all I could say would be of no avail. You could not love supremely a being who hated you, and who had no benevolent end in view in your creation. I might, possibly, by addressing myself wholly to your fears, cause you to profess great love toward God, but your professions would be as false as perjury! I might tell you what an awful being God is—that he is continually angry with the prodigal wanderer from his house; and thus cause you to bow down before him in slavish fear, but you could no more love him with all the heart, and with all the soul, than you could place your whole affection on an individual who was ever seeking to do you an injury, or on one who had forever blasted the reputation of your family, and hushed at the fireside the sweetest voice in infamy!

But when I tell you that God is your Father, and that he had a benevolent end in view when he created you, I present an adequate inducement for you to give him your heart, and even to trust in him with a confidence which nothing can shake. And then, too, I should be uttering the truth, and asserting only what nature, in all her works, will tell us, and what the Scriptures given by divine inspiration, declare.

"God is Love." This is what the Bible says of the Great Creator. Not love to-day and hatred to-morrow, but love, immutable as eternity's foundations; love, infinite and undying; LOVE, that will ultimately rescue a world from the dominion and power of sin, and crown it with endless bliss and rejoicing!

And with how many glorious manifestations of the goodness and love of the infinite Parent have we ever been surrounded! From the very earliest moments of our being, to the present time, God has been with us. His parental arm has upheld us in many an hour of darkness and peril, and guided us through many dangers in safety. He has ever watched over us with an undimmed and an unwearied eye. We may have changed, but God has not changed. He has ever been our affectionate Father in heaven. He has remained our Friend, even when we have turned from his counsels, and slighted the continual calls of his love, and turned aside from the doing of his pleasure, and left his house, where there are "living streams and living bread," and wandered to the far-off country of sin. Yes, God has ever been our Friend, and he will never forsake us. He will continue to watch over us, as he ever has done. Whether we wander among the perpetual snows of the north, or parch beneath the burning influence of southern skies, God will be with us. We may shut our eyes to the glory of his presence, but he will not forsake us. We may turn with hard and unfeeling hearts from the cheering invitations of his mercy, but we shall not break up the deep fount of his affections. We may bring a fearful change over ourselves, but we can not change Him who is of "one mind." He has declared himself to be our Father, and nothing shall be able to separate us from his love. We may wander from him now, but a time will come when we shall be reconciled and brought home to himself. We may turn a deaf ear to the calls of his goodness now, but a period will arrive, when our hard and obdurate hearts will be softened and subdued, and when we shall love him supremely who has first loved us.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER SIX.

DEUTERONOMY.—This book had its name from its consisting, in a great measure, of the repetition of laws and injunctions contained in the former books. It was written in the last period of Moses' life.

Deut. xi: 7.—"But your eyes have seen all the great acts of the Lord which he did." This is an appeal to eye witnesses, and it could never have been received and respected as it has been, if the facts alluded to, had not been well known to be true.

Deut. xvii: 18.—"And it shall be when he (the king) sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write a copy of this law in a book, out of that which is before the priests, the Levites." This was an excellent provision for making the king well acquainted with the law. And from this it appears, that there was an authentic copy of the law kept in the sanctuary. From this, and from no other, the king was to make his copy.

Deut. xxviii.—In this chapter we find a clear prediction of what would befal the Jewish nation in case of their disobedience, all of which has been literally fulfilled. These predictions were made by Moses, almost 1500 years before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, at which time some of the calamities here foretold, befel them.

Deut. xxx.—In this chapter is contained a clear prediction of the final restoration of the Jewish nation to the favor of God, and to the possession of their own country, after their dispersion among all nations and to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Deut. xxxi: 9—"And Moses wrote this law, and delivered it to the priests, the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and to all the people of Israel." This was probably all that he had written of the Pentateuch.—And a more authentic publication was never made of any writing, or public act of any kind. It could not but be well known at that time, and consequently ever after, that such a work had been committed to the custody of the priests; and not for their private use only, but for that of all the people.—See verses 11, 12, 13. Had any book containing a set of laws, been produced in after times, as what had been given to them before, and that not to a single person, but to the people at large; but which had not been known to them before, the falsehood of the pretension must have been notorious. And as these books contained institutions to which the people in general were much averse, the imposture could not but have been detected, and exposed with the greatest indignation and contempt. In verses 24, 25 and 26, we have an account of Moses' finishing the book, and delivering it to the Levites, to be placed in the ark of the covenant. There were, no doubt, many other copies kept by the priests, and it could only have been on very extraordinary occasions that they had recourse to this most authentic copy.

Deut. xxxvii.—This chapter can not be supposed to have been written by Moses, though it was naturally added by some other person to what he had written, and probably by Joshua, or by his direction.

For proof that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, and that he did not borrow his institutions, either civil or religious, from the Heathen, but must have been directed by the Supreme Being in all that he did, see Priestley's "Dissertation on the Originality and Superior Excellence of the Mosaic Institutions," contained in his Notes on the Bible, volume i. page 373.

HOMAGE TO GOD.

BY MISS ANN BARTLETT.

"Unto thee, O God, do we give thanks, unto thee do we give thanks, for that thy name is near thy wondrous works declare."
PSALMS.

In all climes and ages, whenever man has recognised his Maker through the medium of his works, the sentiment here contained has invariably been the language and affections of his soul. From his very nature and constitution, it is utterly impossible, let him be circumstanced as he may, whether he be Jew or Gentile, bond or free, to "look through nature up to nature's God," without being constrained to acknowledge that praise and thanksgiving belongeth to him who rules and sustains all things by the word of his power. The author of this beautiful and soul-inspiring orison, lived in a land where superstition and idolatry prevailed, in all its multifarious forms; yet so exalted was his conceptions of the wisdom, power and goodness of the Deity, from the short surveys he was able to take of the order and beauty by which he was surrounded, that he exhorted all to give thanks to the great Architect, because his works affirmed that he was near. And are the works of God less worthy of admiration than when this exhortation was made?—All nature answers, no! The same purling stream that was then so grateful to the faint and weary traveller, still pursues its onward course, its bosom teeming with life and animation, and all speaking forth joy and gladness for the inestimable blessing of existence. The mighty ocean that rolled its waters to the main, still moves in awful grandeur with its waters oft lifted to the sky, where golden sunbeams glitter in its spray. The seasons are still marked with the peculiarities each succeeding the other, and in turn dispensing their blessings on all around. Spring, like the morning of life still appears decked in robes of transcendent beauty, inspiring man with a firm confidence in his Creator, and causing a thrill of joy to run through every avenue of the soul. At that smiling season, when all nature is warmed and reanimated by the vivifying influence of the great dispenser of light and heat, every leaf and blossom is viewed by the contemplative mind as a mirror in which to behold our "Father and our God." Yea, all appears as new and lovely as when it first emanated from the hand of the Creator. Summer and Autumn retain their charms, and are felt to be the crowning period of the laborer's fondest expectations. The earth is still watered and renovated by the falling shower, and fanned by the gentle zephyrs of heaven. The heavens are as replete with beauty and sublimity, as they have ever been since the first morn of creation. Those sparkling gems that bedeck the vault of heaven, shedding their heavenly influence on all below, causing man to lift his heart and voice in praise and adoration to the "Father of all mercies," have rose and set alternately for near six thousand years, without the least diminution of their pristine beauty. The silver queen of night presents the same phases, shines with the same heavenly radiance, as when the Creator first launched it into space. Yon golden sun, like a ministering angel, still sheds its orient beams impartially on all, proclaiming in the mild accents of love, that God is not only near, "but that he is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all the works of his hand." Yes, all nature responds that God is all in all. The heavens declare it, and the earth withholds not her testimony.

If we look back to the time when a superficial knowledge of the works of the Deity, could fill the mind with such ecstacy and delight, and call forth exclamations of praise, gratitude and thanksgiving, what might reasonably be anticipated would be the language and emotions of those who live in a land and age when a knowledge of the works of nature have attained a higher eminence than at any former period? But in addition to that, we enjoy the rich boon of the Gospel. Was there ever a time since the "morning stars sang together," when man had greater incentives to call forth all the latent energies of the soul, to aid in ascribing praise and thanksgiving to the "Judge of all the earth," than at the present? The time has arrived when the inquiry is on the wing, to know whether all mankind belong to God, or not; and the reverberations are constantly returning the answer in heavenly accents to their astonished minds, "all that I have made is mine, saith the Lord of hosts." The partition wall that has been an inseparable barrier from time immemorial, between man and his fellow-man, is fast resolving into its simple elements; but we trust when it is again reorganized, it will assume a more lovely form. The bonds of brotherhood that have long been severed by unrelenting bigotry and pharisaical righteousness, are fast uniting; and we trust they will soon be made firm by the silken cords of love. Where sorrow and despair once clouded the brow, sunshine and blessedness have wove and entwined a garland of flowers. Where the brier and the thorn once grew and flourished, we now see the myrtle and the rose. A large portion of mankind no longer look upon God as their enemy, clothed in unforbidding robes of terror and dismay, but view him as their "Father and their Friend." They no longer bow in servile homage to their Maker, with a view of changing his designs, but, as dependent children, with hearts flowing with gratitude for past mercies, and a firm confidence in the final holiness and happiness of the whole human family, feel it not only a duty they owe, but a source of the highest enjoyment, to bow before that Being whose mercy and goodness are as illimitable and boundless as the fountain from whence they flow. Oh,

"'Tis sweet to bend the mortal knee,
Set thought's long prison'd currents free;
Implore that kind protecting Power,
That shielded sleeps defenceless hour,
To guard from every danger spread,
Along the daily path we tread;
To keep the soul's ethereal sky,
Bright with the day-spring from on high."

ORTHODOX CONSISTENCY.

To me it appears very strange, but it is no more strange than true, that the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind should be regarded with so much horror by many people, and meet with such violent opposition. The grand difference between Universalists and Limitarians is this—the former believe certain sentiments which the latter desire and pray may prove true, but do not believe they will. Now, if they would bestow one moment's candid attention to the subject, they would readily perceive that they are guilty of great inconsistency. They will admit, many of them at any rate, that the idea of universal reconciliation to God, is congenial to all the best and holiest desires of the human heart; yet will pour out all the vials of their mighty wrath upon the heads of those who believe it—denounce them as infidels and madmen, and withhold from them no epithets within the scope of their powers of invention. They tell us, moreover, with much apparent sincerity, that they desire the salvation of all, and hope and pray that all may be saved. They desire, then, that this doctrine, which they look upon with so much horror, and against which they declaim so zealously, may at last prove true! Now, is there any more criminality in believing that a certain effect will follow a certain cause, than there is in desiring and hoping for the same? Suppose, for illustration, that I believe that A, having a grudge against B, would inflict an injury upon him; would I be more criminal than my Limitarian friend, who desires and hopes that he would inflict that injury? Surely if any guilt can justly be attached to either, it must belong to the latter.

In praying that our doctrine may prove true, do not our opposers virtually pray that their own may prove false? As they contend that the doctrine of endless misery is taught in the Scriptures, and is a part of the Gospel of Christ, do they not, in effect, pray that the Scriptures may be proved to teach a false doctrine? What joy and consolation must a belief in such sentiments afford! Did our Saviour or his apostles preach doctrines which they hoped were untrue? But the fact is, a man can not hope for the salvation of all, and at the same time believe in endless misery. As "faith is the substance of things hoped for," he can not hope for what he does not have faith in, and as he does not desire endless misery, he can not have hope in the truth of it, and therefore has not true faith. In order, then, that our opposers may be consistent, they must either become believers in universal salvation, or cease praying for it. J. M. D.

EARTHLY AND SPIRITUAL.

It is admitted, I believe, on all hands, that imagination alone is not a safe guide either in matters of opinion or of action. It may lead us right, if the object or circumstance which operates upon it, is exalted above it, and of a stable, permanent and pure character. But it must lead us wrong, if the object from which it takes its action is fickle and degraded. So often, however, are unworthy and debasing ends fixed upon as objects of excitement to the imagination, that we feel constrained to say it is a dangerous guide. And there are those who claim this position as an assumption against the Christian religion. They tell us that that religion exists only in the vagaries of the imagination.

But the ipse dixit of the unbeliever can not avail against the experience of the Christian. We say that our hope has nothing to do with the imagination, if it be true that the latter goes beyond its province when it leaves materiality. Our hope is purer than such an imagination could ever make it, brighter than earth, and more durable than the boastings of the pretended anti-religionist, or the real anti-christian. It rests not with earth, springs not from it, but soars, while in, above it, and holds loftiest communion with that which is evidence of a brighter, purer state. Alas! were it not so, we might well despair. Bring it down from that perfect image of the mind, which the God of eternity has impressed upon it, and call it the image of materiality, an earthly fancy, a reflection of that blind, insentient mass which constitutes the Pantheist's god, and what do we know? All we call intelligence, must in this case, proceed from that which has no intelligence; all our judgment and all our perception, from that which possesses no knowledge, no perception of its own existence. All is changeable—all is perishable for aught we know; for even that knowledge exists only in, and emanates from, that which has none. Earth is beautiful to-day, to-morrow it is clothed in gloom. Man has nothing but what is in common with it. Yesterday he supposed himself happy, to-day he is miserable. What then can we know of our origin or nature? Are we not continually deceived? Does the material mass around us prove that we are senseless, like our origin; or do our perceptive faculties prove that matter is spiritual? Do we argue most reasonably, from uncreated matter, that man and all he is, springs from the unknowing, unthinking clod; from the mysterious identity of man, that the earth originated in him; or from the unlike and incomparable changes of both, that each is eternally independent of the other? Does our misery to-day, prove the state of yesterday unreal, or does that happiness evince, that to day we have lost our connexion with matter?

I say, then, that even depriving our religion of its spirituality, it is not so grovelling, so visionary, so baseless, as the imagination of him who rejects our hope and our religion. Ours holds communion with that which is purer and loftier than itself, his with that which is beneath itself—ours with spiritual love and prescience, his with insensibility. But when we view our religion in its true light, not as a child of sensual imagination, but as the effort of mind raising itself up to the fountain of intelligence, of spirituality sustained by immateriality, of judgment under the dictates of real wisdom, we discover that it is not the effect, but the purifier of the imagination. And when we feel and know that through this, and this only, are the beauties of earth and nature revealed, the consistency of her laws made known, and the impressions of the mind confirmed—when we know that after all else has failed to give us peace, this stands by us, and buoys us above the darkness of uncertainty, and even imagined nonentity, and that, when our transitory existence does light up a ray of joy in the human heart it is the spiritual which makes it substantial and enduring, it is then that we know how to prize our advantages, and smile at the efforts of him who would, either in theory or practice, drag man from his intellectual and moral summit, down to a mere sensual existence. Let us take heed to our ways, and see that we adorn our faith by a well ordered life and godly conversation.

CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES.....NO VIII.

THE REAL TREASURES.

"But lay up for yourselve treasures in heaven."—Matt. vi: 20.

We would mention among earthly treasures in the first place, gold and silver, and those things which are usually denominated wealth. This is a great object in the eyes of man, and he strives much and does much for it. He erects his glittering wants, sends out his winged ships and ponderous vehicles, sets up wondrous machinery, and toils and wearies himself in exhausting action and in various ways. Up early and late, beneath the bright sun and in the close counting-room—here and there and every where, from the depths of the flashing mines to the summits of the mountains, and from the far pole to the distant isles of the sea—he is acting and striving continually for wealth. Now we do not say that competence is not desirable, that wealth works no good and leaves no benefits nor monuments worthy of preservation. Far from it. But of this, and of all earthly treasure, we now speak as being those things which man makes his chief object, and in which he absorbs and wastes his heart. We say, then, that this wealth is liable to be corrupted by the moth and the rust, when it has been obtained, and that thieves will break through and steal. The flame, the wind, the flood, the arts of man, the uncertainties of enterprize, are all at work upon wealth, and he who trusts his happiness on this, rests upon a frail and mutable foundation. This is a truth for the many who are seeking wealth, that is not to be slighted or put aside, because it is a trite one. It is true, and therefore let them beware how they base their all upon this tottering foundation. It can not be put aside by those who would act as wise men and cultivate their own happiness and peace!

We may, secondly, call Fame an earthly treasure.—There may be a desire to possess the respect of man, and to live in their remembrance when we are dead, which we are not prepared to censure—there may be much good influence exerted by one who possesses such a reputation. But, in this instance, or in that already mentioned in the other exception, it is not the all-absorbing object of the soul. That fame which is an earthly treasure and which we allude to here, is that which is plucked or won by an all devoting attention to it, as an end, by hands that sweep skilfully the lyre, and by brows that are "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought"—the fame that floats on the breath of the multitude, and so often glitters in the circlet of renown. Oh, how easy may the moth and the rust corrupt this, and thieves break through and steal! The tongue of slander will blight the greenest laurel, and the arm of violence can shatter thrones. Consider, too, if this treasure goes down with you to the grave and endures even beyond death, how mutable, after all, it is. How many are there of the illustrious sons of antiquity, whose memories live among men?—how many who are known beyond the circle of a certain few and the lore of the scholar? Consider how difficult it is for us to go back among the moulder-ing relics of antiquity, and decypher its worn records—still more to rescue the memories of the mighty from their oblivion. What uncertainties are thrown around the history of the past! What perplexing questions arise upon it! Did Homer write all the poems commonly ascribed to him, or are they the productions of more than one mind?

"—— at the cannon's mouth,"

"To whom shall we assign the sphinx's fame?"
War Cheops or Cephrenes architect
Of either pyramid that bears his name?"

Or if, from the fact of the existence of a greater conserative power than those old times enjoyed, we may hope to escape the spell of oblivion which has fallen upon so many, I would remark, how few are they of one generation who are admired by another?—how few who keep their point and brightness in the firmament, and beam with noted lustre to all ages!—how many who are forgotten and neglected in a few years, and called not again by any power, from their obscurity! And if we should succeed in attaining fame, how few are there who acquire an enviable reputation! Think, too, of the anguish, the disappointment, the wounded hearts, that so many have felt in this pursuit—how it has given no charm of life at last, nor smoothed the dying pillow. Oh, think of thieves, the moth and the rust!

We will not specify any other earthly treasures.—Wealth and fame embrace a great portion of them. But we say that all which is not eternal in its nature—which can not give us changeless happiness—which we must part with at the hour of death—all these are treasures which men lay up here below, and which are mutable and perishing.

We come now to consider the durability of heavenly riches. Were earth man's only abiding place—were he to be a denizen of this sphere forever, or to know none other when he leaves it, it would be right for him then, perhaps, to look here for his only gratification.

But this is not the case. He has a high and immortal nature, and those things upon which it can safely and immutably depend for its welfare, must be immortal also. And these are the riches which he lays up in heaven. They are pure and spiritual treasures, and the power of men can not rob us of them, nor death destroy. They are liable to no physical accidents—the flame, nor the wind, nor the flood, nor the arts of men, nor the disappointments of enterprize, which are so ruinous to earthly wealth. The moth and the rust can not corrupt them, nor thieves break through and steal. For, what are some of the heavenly treasures? There is the principle of doing right. The joy which flows from the possession of this principle, is a treasure to us. It is not needed here only—although great is the present reward which it bestows—but it is a principle which is to live hereafter, and is to move the soul forever. The angels have it; they move in their bright circles by its guidance, and worship by its dictates. The saints feel it, when they wave their palm branches, and cast down their "starry crowns." It is not a circumstance of this sphere only, then. He, therefore, who adopts this principle as a possession, has an eternal one. And oh, what a delicious, what a free reward, has this principle bestowed! Men whose limbs have been loaded with chains, and their flesh torn by cruel stripes, have felt a richer joy than all earth's wealth, thrice-heaped, could give alone. It has borne up bruised hearts, stoutly, against the pelting and crushing weight of cares and sorrows. It has given the philanthropist boldness to stand before kings, and furnished the naked martyr with a panoply of steel. It is a blessed principle—this one of doing right—a treasure that can not fail us. It comprehends, strictly, all others that might be named, but we will specify another.

There is, then, the principle of love—love to God and man—the requirements of the moral law. This, also, is an eternal treasure. It is a principle which makes radiant the universe. There is not a quivering leaf which is not influenced by it, nor a star. It prompts to the performance of good for its own sake, and we move by it in the path to heaven. We shall carry that, too, beyond death, and wear it with our immortality, when we roam —

"—— beside the crystal waters."

We may defy earth's changes to rob us of it, if we fix it within and guard it aright, and it will expand and glow, when mountains topple into chaos and orbs are shattered upon their radiant axles. It is as eternal as the Throne, and binds all God's hosts together, soul with soul.

Faith, hope, charity, and principles like those which we have named, are heavenly treasures, and when they are "laid up," moth and rust can not corrupt them, nor thieves break through and steal. The contrast they afford to earthly wealth, is like the difference displayed between mind and matter—the latter changeable and uncertain, the other, eternal, lofty, triumphant. The one treasure-house, is earth, the other, heaven. One of these bestows upon us those treasures which can only benefit us here—the other, those which are of incalculable profit in the present existence, and which will remain with us amid the glory, the joy and the eternity of another.

Another difference which exists between the two classes of treasures, is this. The one we may not attain. We know that wealth, or fame, or whatever object of the kind may be before our mind's eye, is not always reached by us, after all our endeavors. They are fickle and subtle, and elude our hands, perhaps, in the very moment of grasping. How many have delved, and dug, and struggled, and labored heavily, and found their toil all come to nought?—or have just reached the object of desire, and ere reaping any of its anticipated benefits, have died and left them to others? It is not certain, then, that we shall reach these treasures, or if we do, that we shall have an opportunity to enjoy them.

But the other treasures are sure upon the seeking.—They are privileges of no one rank or clime. The poor man may acquire them equally with the rich, and the beggar with the king. Exposed to none of the contingences of earthly things, they can not, like earthly things, fail us. The way to them is open and easy. We hazard nothing in striving to obtain them, as we do, often, in temporal enterprizes. They are around us in the air, and upon our path in the sunlight—they meet our eyes in all we see, and come to us with eloquent invitation. They will never elude the hand that reaches out to them. They are sure—they are of heaven! E. H. C.

THE RECORD.

Conventions.—The Maine Convention met in Norridgewock, "on Tuesday evening," [probably June 11th, though the minutes do not state when.] Appointed Geo. Bates, Moderator; E. B. Averill, Clerk; J. T. Gilman, Assistant Clerk; D. Forbes, Standing Clerk; W. A. Drew, F. A. Hodsdon, Z. Thompson, standing committee on fellowship, ordination and discipline; D. Forbes, to preach the next occasional sermon; Brs. Gardner, Forbes and Bates a committee to communicate with the friends, and urge renewed efforts to sustain the "Gospel Banner;" and G. W. Quinby to prepare the minutes and circular. Resolved, that we cherish in fond regard the names of Brs. Harris and Sneathen, deceased during the past year—that the brethren at large be urged, and the Convention pledge itself, to aid the "Gospel Banner," edited by Br. Drew—"that if any ministering brother connected with this Convention, be guilty of any immoral or unchristian conduct, and should remove to any other place, within the limits of any other Convention connected with the General Convention of Universalists of the United States, it is the duty of the committee of discipline appointed by this Convention, to inform the Standing Clerk of the Convention within whose limits he may have removed, of all the facts in the case;—and that the committees of discipline organized by other similar bodies, be requested to discharge the same duty towards us."—Accepted reports of committee on fellowship, granting license to L. Hussey, R. Fales, H. J. Bartlett, and A. S. Dudley, and ordination on A. Moore, J. M. Dennis, O. H. Johnson, W. C. George, during the recess of Convention, and that it had been conferred on F. W. Baxter. Adjourned to meet in Albion, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1840. Preachers present, 31—lay delegates, 40, from 5 Associations.

The Massachusetts Convention met June 5th and 6th, in Hingham. Moses Black, Moderator; J. M. Spear and J. H. Willis, Clerks; O. A. Skinner, T. Whittemore, and J. H. Willis, committee on fellowship and ordination; J. H. Willis, R. S. Pope, and G. Hastings, on inquiry; H. Ballou, L. Willis and L. R. Paige, on dispcipline; A. Moore to preach the next occasional sermon—R. Tomlinson, substitute; T. Whittemore and others a committee to report at next session the best measures to establish a theological school in Massachusetts. Petitions on the subject of slavery, referred to a committee, who reported inexpediency of action. The report of the committee of discipline, (which involved charges against Br. M. H. Smith, and the settlement of which, if settled, seems very dissatisfactory to some of our Massachusetts brethren,) is not even named nor alluded to in the minutes! Br. Whittemore will have one string in his harp, (the cloaking of ministers' crimes by Partialists—the Avery case of the Methodists,) rendered so tender, by such a process in his own Convention, that he will not be able to touch it often after this! Adjourned to meet in New-Bedford on the first Wednesday in June, 1840.

The New-Hampshire Convention met in Nashua, June 18th and 19th. J. Lord, Moderator; J. P. Atkinson, Clerk; M. Ballou, Standing Clerk; M. Ballou, C. Woodhouse, J. Moore, committee on fellowship and ordination; R. O. Williams, J. Barber, J. Moore, on discipline; M. Ballou to preach the occasional, and R. O. Williams to preach the communion sermon; Clerk to prepare the minutes, etc. Resolutions were passed in favor of observing the Lord's Supper; to encourage destitute societies to support preaching; to support liberal seminaries of learning; to organize Sunday schools and Bible classes; and to elevate the character of common schools. Fellowship was granted to Brs. B. B. Bunker and A. A. Miner, and ordination to Br. Bunker, during the past year. Adjourned to meet in Weare, on the third Wednesday in June, 1840. The Lord's Supper was celebrated on this occasion, and baptism by immersion performed by Br. W. S. Balch, on Br. A. A. Minor, and the wife of Br. J. W. Bailey.

"The Green Mountain Evangelist, and Universalist Watchman."—Such is the title under which our old friend, the Universalist Watchman, comes to us, (the first number, of a new volume and a new series,) enlarged in form, (the folio being assumed instead of the quarto,) and dressed in new type; with Brs. R. Streeter and W. Skinner, as Editors of the Evangelist; J. E. Palmer and J. W. Wright, Editors of the Watchman; and W. Bell, J. Moore, J. Gregory and J. Ward, Corresponding Editors—8 in all! N. Packard, Publisher and Proprietor. Terms, $1.50 in advance; $2.00 if paid in 6 months; $2.50 if paid within the year; $3.00 if delayed till the expiration of the year; to which 25 cents will be added for every succeeding quarter that payment is delayed.

This paper is the result of a disagreement noticed some weeks ago, and a subsequent reconciliation of the parties. Br. Packard assumes the debt in which Br. Palmer was innocently involved by the former proprietors of the Watchman, and Br. Palmer merges the Evangelist and his interest and influence in the Watchman, in consideration thereof. We rejoice at the result—for the multiplication of papers only increases the burdens of publishers, and lessens their real value, while it benefits none to a corresponding extent. God grant our Vermont brethren success in this union—may our brethren and friends in that region second their efforts by securing enough prompt paying subscriptions, and all strive to keep the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace. THE COMPANION TO THE REGISTER.

We have sent a few copies, untrimmed, to some of our ministering, and to all our Editorial brethren, for their examination, that they may approve or condemn as they think it merits. It is not all that we desired to make it—nor even what we could now make it, had we the publishing of it to do over again; but we believe that it is well worth the sixpence that is asked for it by retail, and, if properly used, will do more than a sixpence worth of good to each one that reads it. Hence we offer it for sale, and ask that the limited edition we have printed, may be taken up by our friends. If our Editorial brethren think as we do, they will much oblige us by noticing it, and stating that orders for the Companion and Register united, should be sent in immediately—also, orders for the Companion alone, and for the Register containing the Almanac calculations for the Eastern States; as the type for the Companion has been distributed, and that for the Eastern Almanac must be, as soon as a number sufficient to supply orders, has been printed. All orders for these particular copies, therefore, can not be supplied after what we print now are sold. The second Edition will contain Almanac calculations for the Middle and Western States, only.—Both are in press, and will be got ready to send off as soon as possible. Want of room, and a consequent necessity of abridging some of the reports, even after they had been placed in type, have delayed us a week longer than we had expected. A. B. G.

August 2, 1839. T. Clowes, Principal.

Br. Jesse Bushnell.—This brother, though fondly remembered by all who knew and loved him in this region, has nevertheless been remembered as one scalod for death. For nearly four years he has been prostrated by a nervous disease, inducing general debility, accompanied with the loss of his voice, and latterly of sight.—Judge then our joyous surprise at hearing that he had recovered his voice and his sight again, and that there was a reasonable prospect of his recovery! We could scarcely believe it for joy. But our informant had it from Br. B's brother. God grant that the fruition of the hopes of his many friends, may be the reward of their sympathy and their sorrow on his account.

POETRY.

[From the Lynchburg Virginian.]

THE CHURCH OF OUR FATHERS.

Half screened by its trees, in the Sabbath's calm smile,
The church of our Fathers, how meekly it stands;
O! villagers gaze on the old hallowed pile—
It was dear to their hearts—it was raised by their hands.
Who loves not the place where they worshipped their God?
Who loves not the ground where their ashes repose?
Dear even the daisy that blooms in the sod,
For dear is the dust out of which it arose.

Then say, shall the Temple our Forefathers built,
Which the storms of past ages have battered in vain,
Abandoned by us from supineness or guilt,
O, say, shall it fall by the rash and profane?
No! perish the impious hand that would take
One shred from its altar—one stone from its towers—
The pure blood of martyrs hath flowed for its sake,
And its fall—if it fall—shall be reddened by ours.

BROKEN TIES.

BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

The broken ties of happier days,
How often do they seem
To come before our mental gaze,
Like a remembered dream.
Around us each dissevered chain
In sparkling ruins lies;
And earthly hand can ne'er again
Unite those broken ties.

The parent of our youthful home,
The kindred that we loved,
Far from our arms perchance may roam,
To desert seas removed.
Or we have watched their parting breath,
And closed their weary eyes;
And sighed to think how sadly death
Can sever human ties.

The friends, the loved ones of our youth,
They too are gone, or changed,
Or, worse than all, their love and truth,
Is darkened or estranged.
They met us in the glittering throng,
With cold averted eyes,
And wonder that we weep their wrong,
And mourn our broken ties.

Oh! who in such a world as this,
Could hear their lot of pain;
Did not one radiant hope of bliss
Unclouded yet remain?
That hope the sovereign Lord has given,
Who reigns above the skies,
Hope that unites our souls to Heaven,
By faith's enduring ties.

Each care, each ill of mortal birth,
Is sent in pitying love,
To lift the lingering heart from earth,
And speed its flight above.
And every pang that wrings the breast,
And every joy that dies,
Tell us to seek a purer rest,
And trust to holier ties.

TREATMENT OF SISTERS.

Every young man ought to feel that his honor is involved in the character and dignity of his sisters. There is no insult which he should sooner rebuke, than one offered to them. But if you would have others esteem and honor them, you must esteem and honor them yourself.

Treat them with far less reserve, but with no less delicacy than you would to the most gentle stranger. Nothing in the family strikes the eye of the visitor with more delight than to see brothers treat their sisters with kindness, civility, attention and love. On the contrary, nothing is more offensive, or speaks worse of the honor of a family, than that coarse, rude, unkind manner, which brothers sometimes exhibit.

Beware how you speak of your sisters. Even gold is tarnished by much handling. If you speak in their praise—of their beauty, learning, manners, wit or attention, you will subject them to talk and ridicule; if you say any thing against them, you will bring reproach upon yourself, and them too. If you have occasion to speak of them, do it with modesty and with few words. Let others do all the praising, and yourself enjoy it. I hope you will always have reason to be proud of your sisters.

If you are separated from them, maintain with them a correspondence. This will do yourself good as well as them. Do not neglect this duty, nor grow remiss in it. Give your friendly advice, and seek theirs in return. As they mingle intimately with their sex, they can enlighten your mind respecting many particulars relating to the female character, important for you to know; and on the other hand, you have the same opportunity to do them a similar service. However long or widely separated from them, keep up your fraternal affection and intercourse. It is ominous of evil when a young man forgets his sisters.

PHILOSOPHY IN THE COMMON USE OF THINGS.

King Hiero, of Syracuse, two hundred and fifty years before Christ, when he had reason to suspect that his crown had been alloyed more than it should be, by mixing a larger quantity of silver with the gold than was according to the standard, sent for Archimedes to examine into and ascertain the respective quantities. The mathematician was puzzled, and for a long time could not invent any method of solving the question; till one day he got into a tub of water to bathe, and observing the water run out of the vessel as he entered it, he conceived that the quantity of water displaced by his body would be equal to it in bulk. From this idea he thus reasoned:—If the crown is immersed in a vessel full of water, it will cause as much water to run out as is equal to it in bulk. If, then, I immerse in like manner a piece of pure gold of the same weight, and of pure silver of the same weight, I shall have a quantity of water equal in bulk to each respectively; and thus having the relative bulks of gold, silver, and the crown, I can find the relative gravity of each; for that must be inversely the ratio of their bulks; and having the specific gravity of one, I have the specific gravity of each. These specific gravities are found to be accordingly—the gold as 19 to 1, the silver as 11, the crown as 16. Thence the philosopher ascertains the proportion of the metals used in compounding the crown, by the following rule. As the difference of the specific gravity of the compound and the lighter metal—that is 5—is to the difference of the specific gravity of the compound and the heavier metal, or 3, so is the bulk of the gold to that of the silver used. That is the gold constitutes 5 parts, the silver 3 parts of the crown bulk. And if this proportion of each metal be multiplied by its specific gravity, the product will show the relative weight of gold and silver.—Thus 5 times 19 gives 95, and 3 times 11 gives 33, which express the relative weight of the two metals in the compound.—American Magazine.

THE HOPE OF FUTURE LIFE.

Few think of all the lofty and divine hopes that the belief of immortality opens to us. One of the purest of these, is the expectation of a more entire intelligence—of the great gift of conversing with all who lived before us—of questioning the past ages, and unravelling their dark wisdom. How much in every man's heart dies away unuttered! How little of what the sage knows, does the sage promulgate! How many chords of the lyre within the poet's heart have been dumb to the world's ear! All this untold, uncommunicated, unheard-of hoard of wisdom and harmony, it may be the privilege of our immortality to learn. The best part of genius the world knows not—the Plato buries much of his lore within his caves—and this, the High Unknown, is our heritage. With these thoughts, you see how easy it is for the parting soul to beautify and adorn death! With how many garlands we can hang the tomb! Nay, if we begin betimes, we can learn to make the prospects of the grave the most seductive of human visions—by little and little, we wean from its contemplation all that is gloomy and abhorrent—by little and little, we have therein all the most pleasing of our dreams. As the neglected genius whispers to his muse, "Posterity shall know thee, and thou shalt live when I am no more;" so we find in this hallowed and all-promising future, a recompense for every mortification, for every disappointment in the present. It is the belief of the Arabs, that to the earliest places of human worship, there clings a guardian sanctity—there the wild bird rests not, there the wild beast may not wander; it is the blest spot on which the eye of God dwells, and which man's best memories preserve. As with the earliest place of worship, so it is with the last haven of repose—as with the spot where our first imperfect adoration was offered up, our first glimpse of divinity indulged, so should it be with that where our full knowledge of the First Cause begins, and we can pour forth our gratitude, no longer clouded by the troubles and cares of earth. Surely, if any spot in the world be sacred, it is that in which grief ceases, and from which, if the harmonies of creation, if the voice within our hearts, if the impulse which made man so easy a believer in revelation: if these mock and fool us not with an everlasting lie, we spring up on the untiring wings of a pangless and seraphic life—those whom we loved, around us; the aspirings that we nursed, fulfilled; our nature, universal intelligence; our atmosphere, eternal love!—E. L. Bulwer

RELIGIOUS SPECULATION.

We can not sink too low in humility, nor yet rise too high in heavenly mindedness; but we may soon be lost in the wilderness of needless speculation. Such as are sober minded will keep within their depth, and when the Lord directs us to launch forth, we may do it with safety. If we are wise according as it is written, we shall be profitably wise; but if we want to be wise beyond what is written, we shall smart for our folly.—Rowland Hill.

MARRIAGES.

In Salina, June 17th, by Rev. Mr. Taylor, Mr. NELSON I. BARTHOLOMEW, to Miss MINERVA BAILEY, both of Oran.

In Pompey, July 25th, by Rev. Wm. M. Delong, Mr. WARNER EARLLS, of Wisconsin, formerly of Van Buren, Onondaga county, to Miss CORNELIA ANN SCOVILLE, of Pompey.

DEATHS.

In De Ruyter, June 29th, Mrs. ELIZABETH, wife of Tertullus Crosby, aged 63 years. Cheered by the hopes of the Gospel, she bore a long and painful sickness with the resignation of a true and warm hearted Christian; and when the period arrived which, sooner or later will test the joy blighting, or peace giving influence of the doctrine we have imbibed, she composedly yielded up her spirit, rejoicing in the prospect of heaven and happiness for all mankind. To the same fountain may the mourning husband and children resort, and find the healing waters which will cure the wound that death has inflicted. On the first Sunday in July her funeral was attended at the Union meeting house in De Ruyter, and a discourse delivered by the writer.

W. M. DELONG.

In New-Berlin, April 24th, Mrs. CYNTHIA ANGEL, wife of Daniel Angel, aged 61 years. Sister Angel professed faith in a world's redemption through a risen Saviour. She cherished the temper and exhibited the virtues which the Gospel enjoins, in her daily walk and intercourse with her family and the world around her. Her moral worth endeared her to an extensive circle of relatives and acquaintances, and led them the more deeply to deplore their loss. A firm and abiding conviction that she should share with all the ransomed children of her Heavenly Father, in an unfading inheritance, reserved for her and them in heaven, afforded her joy and peace in life, and sustained and consoled her in death. May the same precious hope calm and reconcile the afflicted under their bereavement, and give them the blissful and hallowed anticipations of everlasting rest. N. D.

In the town of Plymouth, April 27th, of consumption, BETSEY JOHNSON, daughter of Amos and Betsey Johnson, aged 16 years. Thus in the brief space of four years, our afflicted brother and sister have consigned to the silent tomb three daughters. It was their fervent desire that the subject of this notice—the youngest and the last remaining one—might be spared to cheer and comfort them by her filial affection, in their declining years; but death had marked her for his prey, and no human arm could save. Her soul was the seat of purity and virtue; her conversation and her thoughts were in heaven. As the time of her departure drew near, the grave became divested of its terrors, and the end of life temporal she contemplated as an introduction to life everlasting, and joys eternal. May the hope of the final redemption of all the offspring of God, which was the happiness and portion of their child, be the solace and support of the bereaved parents; and enable them to realize, that although some of the Divine dispensations may appear dark and mysterious while here, yet in the end they shall be able to say, "Our Father in heaven hath done all things well."

PUBLIC DUTIES.

We give below the extracts we promised from the concluding division of Mr. Chapin's Discourse—

"What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits to me?" PSALM cxvi: 12.

NATIONAL DUTIES.

As with individuals, in this instance, so with associations. That nation which has been blessed and prospered is bound to make, as if it were only one man, its inquiry—"What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?"—and, as if it had but one heart, and one mind, and one giant pair of arms, to employ all its energies and its agencies in performing its duties. This remark applies with double force to the American people. The people and the nation, using the latter term to imply the active political body, may, sometimes, be separated.—The Grand Sultan may be the nation, or the Council of Ten, or the Pope. But, in these free and United States, the people and the nation are one. The people rule here, their powerful hands bear right on the engines of government—and I have seen no reason, as yet, but to thank God that it is so. Construe the principles of the Constitution as narrowly as you can—centralize power as much as they will possibly allow—still the ruler and the magistrate, the organs and agents of law and national acts, stand immediately before the people; their voice is right in their ears and must be obeyed—the sanctions of their tribunal are all around them, and will crush the disobedient one. And I say I have, as yet, seen no reason but to thank God that it is so. True, there have been derelictions from right and from duty. There have been dark clouds in the horizon, filled with ominous mutterings, and sending out fearful flashes, still they were but clouds—the broad, calm sky was all above and around, undarkened and clear, and they soon passed away, while the sun of our freedom and our glory goes on up into the zenith. There have been evils, but give me the government that possesses the united wisdom of many minds, and the power to remedy those evils existing in the vital interests of the law-makers themselves—give me such a government, far sooner than the rule of one mind, which, darkened and corrupt in itself, possesses no good counsellor to rectify the effects of its bad passions or its perverted vision; or of the few, who, having no interest or sympathy with the masses, make laws which shall add to their own aggrandizement, while, at the same time, they crush as with wheels of iron the holiest rights and the dearest privileges of those over whom they are swayed.

The American people, then, compose the American nation. Its acts are the acts of the people—its errors and evil deeds, the errors and evil deeds of American citizens—its good works, the good works of the same. To that portion of my countrymen who hear me at this time, as to so much of the nation, the following remarks are presented for consideration: Fellow-citizens;—it behooves us to ask, in view of those mercies which we have received, and some of which have been presented to your attention, it behooves us to ask, as if speaking from the heart and with the voice of our nation: "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?" Behold, "He hath not dealt so with any nation!" This blood-bought heritage which we possess, with its goodly soil, and its rocky barriers rising from the sea—the privileges which we enjoy as citizens in the land—that prosperous and upward course in which we are pressing on—all these things, on account of which the song and the shout have just gone forth from ocean to ocean, on account of which the banquet-board was spread, the cannon discharged, and the memories of the past stirred by thrilling eloquence—all these things bid us to look above, to recognize the hand of God in all our mercies, and to exclaim: "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?" We answer this question by saying, that we should, as far as we are able, manifest our gratitude as a nation, and thus, in one sense, and in some degree, render unto the Lord a return for his mercies. And this leads me to speak upon the main subject of this discourse—the duties of American citizens.

OUR LAWS AND INSTITUTIONS.

I would mention, as one duty of American citizens, that of guarding our righteous laws and good institutions. I use distinctive epithets here—our righteous laws, our good institutions—because I am not prepared to say that we have no laws and no institutions which may be modified or exchanged for the better. Laws and institutions are sometimes adapted to the circumstances of one age and one state of things, which will not do under the circumstances of another. Righteous and good, then, so long as they were well adapted, they become unrighteous and wrong, when the light and progress of the governed, (for we will not speak of any retrograde movement,) become powerful and onward. Martial law is a code which may well obtain in war, perchance, but it is certainly unjust when it assumes the civic seat, and issues its dictates in the time of peace. You will apply the illustration:—Laws and institutions are sometimes the creatures of momentary and injudicious impulses, of ignorance, or of undue and evil influences. I do not say, then, that in every thing of the kind it is right for us to remain stationary. But, I repeat, our righteous laws and our good institutions it is our duty to guard and to cherish. Let not the mere fact, my hearers, that some of these are ancient, the productions of a former generation, be the only reason why we condemn and abolish them. In so far as they contain good principles, they are of God, and by that nation which would serve Him and render a return for His benefits, they should be jealously watched over and protected—kept as eternal foundation pillars of government—pillars which, although moulded and reared far back amid primeval and crude formations, will stand, polished and stately, among all the glories of the most perfect fabric—amid all the beauty and the symmetry which other generations, aided by better knowledge, shall discover and build up. They are laws which our fathers framed—they are the offspring of minds that stirred with the great idea of freedom, and wrought its accomplishment—they are institutions which sprung up even in battle and peril, the walls of which were cemented with patriot blood and went up amid patriot prayers. Be careful, solemnly careful, then, how you lay rude hands upon one jot or tittle of an existing law, upon one stone of a living institution!—Weigh well the consequences! And strike off, as you would strike off the mailed grasp of the invader, the sacrilegious hand that would take the laws under its own keeping and employ them illegitimately to work out its own private gratification. Beware of invading the awful sphere of the magistrate, and of giving the sanction of justice to the passion-blinded perceptions and disturbed judgment of the mob! Stand up for the law, my hearers, as you would stand up for life and its dearest privileges! The condition of republicans is your's. Your own interests rest upon the preservation of righteous institutions. Toiling in your dark and dusty workshop, or laboring in sweat and poverty for your daily bread, the law is vital to you. It is as your very air of life. Stand tamely by and see it usurped and perverted, or participate in these foul acts, and you are as if looking on while some one should be drawing its blessed influence from you, or as if you were engaged in infecting, with miasms and pestilence, that which should go forth and bring death to your own household and to yourself. Stand by the laws, the good old laws, under which our fathers lived! Support those righteous principles which were to them as a shield and as impenetrable armor, when they leaned upon no outward aid but the arm of God! They are a portion of those blessings for which we are to be thankful to the Almighty—which in goodness he has given us—and we can not, without, I may say, grievous insult and vile ingratitude, turn around and sweep them away, or suffer others to tamper with and peril them.

There is a lesson "in the book of time," which almost every succeeding moralist, it is probable, has referred to, which you have often had presented before you, and with which you are familiar; but it is such a vivid and solemn lesson, written so clearly there, as if with the finger of God himself, as a warning to all coming ages and nations, that it can not be too often referred to in a discourse like the present. Need I say that I allude to the French Revolution? In that period, grand in its terror, like a palpable fulfilment of some of the awful visions of the Apocalypse, when "Death went abroad, and hell followed with him," when the shower of blood and the storm of hail were upon the land, the law was trodden under foot, and the alarm-cry was the abolishment of old institutions. Remember that—the subversion of the law and the overthrow of time-honored institutions! On the evening of the 10th of August, 1792, the battle-cry was—"Cease to appeal to the laws and legislators—to arms! to arms!"* Soon the cannon wheels creaked and the tocsin boomed through the streets of devoted Paris, the king fled the palace, and massacre strewed the way with its crushed and mangled victims. On the 2d and 3d of September, blood flowed again from beneath the hand of assassination. The king himself was brought to the fatal block, and by the keen instrument of death poured out his life to gratify this Moloch, whose feet were upon the laws, and whose arm was lifted against the best and holiest institutions. But why specify the deeds of this bloody "Reign of Terror?" Why speak of the horrid edicts of that revolutionary tribunal which has been well styled "The ante-chamber of death and the very threshold of the grave?"† Why show all the horrors of that time, when in the language of the poet, in those confines

> "Ate ——————— hot from hell
> [Cried] havoc and let slip the dogs of war?"

It is enough for our purpose that we allude to it. At last, blood-surfeited and burning with malice against every form of just law and every principle of good, the Christian religion itself—the source and life of all pure principles of government—was attacked and insulted. Its external profession was abolished by public decree, and pseudo reason, and wild anarchy, robed in the bloody garments of murdered freedom, were raised to the pedestals of worship. Darkness fell upon France. The star of that only hope which can guide man unchangingly through life, glowed palely upon her shrines and monuments through the bloody horizon that hung above her destinies. The prisons were glutted with the doomed, and, throughout that hideous night, the clanking of fetters, and the quick flashes of the guillotine, told that death, and vengeance, and brutal outlawry were awfully at work.

Enough of this. Let young America beware how she follows her example. Let her children revere righteous laws and honor good institutions. Let their pure principles dwell in our temple of liberty forever. Let them be guarded, as with a sword of fire, from all unhallowed intrusion. Let our countrymen bring their sheaves, and their sickles, and their implements of industry, and all their sacred privileges, and place them beneath their safe and guardian shadow, and stand ever ready to support and defend them.

OUR FREE PRINCIPLES.

We are in danger of mistaking this latter principle [anarchy] for true liberty. We must remember that freedom of government sprung from the people, from all the people, and that individual exemption from its restraint is not the liberty of the people, but a transgression of the laws, which a majority, in sober and deliberate judgment have made—it is a rebellion against the people. The name of liberty may be frightfully perverted, and assumed by the most cruel and bloody tyranny. The statue of liberty in "the Reign of Terror" was placed near that awful guillotine which was, at the same time, the instrument of the most savage despotism that ever wielded power. Let us beware, when we would throw off restraint, how we assume the baton of liberty in mockery, for, like some wand of fearful power, we may summon up by it a demon-host that will not heed our voice when we would stay them in their course of evil. Guard liberty, then, upon this side, from the encroachments of its professed friends. See to it that the hand which is laid upon the charter does not rend it. See to it, as individuals, that neither in thought, word or deed, you injure it, nor countenance others in doing so.

But, again, we must guard liberty from being repressed or contracted upon any point. See to it well that we build up no tyranny among us in politics, society or religion. And here let me speak, as pertaining to the welfare of my country, although, perhaps, somewhat of a digression from the point under remark—let me speak concerning the cherishing of a love for the great principles of republicanism. We are divided into parties, my hearers, in the political field—we are, each one of us, it is quite likely, wrong in some things and in some things right. But we are all Republicans. I believe we all wish to see the pure principles of republicanism flourish and grow strong. I say, then, let us beware how we blind ourselves with the mists of party. He who occupies the pulpit, although not an uninterested spectator, is still, in one sense, above the field of political controversy. He must utter, in his official capacity, the opinions of no one political sect, but of great principles he may freely speak—it is his duty to do so. I say, then, that we are too apt I fear, to lose sight of principles in our desires after party triumph and party elevation. Neither of the two contending hosts in our country is free from this. We must look to it that we strive for principle, all. We may do this, without on the one hand, employing insult and misrepresentation, or, on the other, clinging to every principle put forth by our sect, be that principle right or wrong, beneficial or injurious.

Let us be careful, I proceed to say, of liberty politics. As we would resist the invader, who should come to abolish our free government and put a yoke upon our necks, so let us resist every encroachment upon our political rights. Let us guard them as the outworks of our nation. Let us keep them pure at the fountain head, and in all the tributary streams, that that which flows so widely and so vitally among us may be pure also.

Again, let us beware of an infringement of liberty in the social state. Let us look to it that birth and wealth do not acquire claims to honor when the true title to that boon is wanting, and that they do not create distinctions as odious, and far more inconsistent, than the titles of nobility in other lands. On the contrary, beware of any attempt upon false grounds, to array the poor against the rich, and vice versa. Preserve the true standard. Honor to whom honor is due. No fawning to wealth, merely as such, although it roll by in godlen chariots—no servile respect for birth, when its true title to nobility has died with the original possessor. But honor, I repeat, to whom honor is due. Obedience to magistrates and laws, respect to respectability and virtue, wherever they are found, as much under the rough countenance and humble garb of the laborer, as the wealthy and illustrious. Preserve freedom from all fetters in this respect.

Once more, preserve and protect religious liberty. Look to it that the principles which our fathers bore here in tears and peril, and founded amid strife and blood, perish not with their children. See to it that every sect and every name flourishes unmolested beneath the roof of its temple, upon our soil. Never let our green earth be blackened by the smoke of persecution-fires—never let our bright heavens be darkened by the towers of an inquisition—never let our free breezes bear the groans and shrieks of the sufferer at the rack for conscience sake! Beware of all insidious attempts towards fettering this freedom. Beware of partial and unconstitutional laws.—Beware when the voice of any man is uplifted in the halls of legislation, for any measure that would contract and injure the freedom, and happiness, and reputation, of his neighbor of another faith.

Guard well, then, and perpetuate, as another duty of Americans, liberty in all its forms and in all its measures. Oh, guard it! The past cries out for it—the tombs of its mighty martyrs cry out for it—the voices that were uttered in the council and echoed "in the thunders of victorious battle," cry out for it. Preserve it from the first attempt at encroachment, or our temple falls, our shrines become desolate, and upon our ruined portals will be written in deep and mournful characters—"Ichabod! Glory departed!"

RELIGION, THE GREAT DUTY.

Finally;—I would mention, as a duty incumbent upon the American people, the practice and diffusion of the principles of the Gospel. This, my hearers, comprehends the whole matter. The assurance that all the other duties binding upon us will be observed, can only spring from the performance of this. The blessing may be presented, the appeal made, the duties urged; but unless the deep and vital spirit of religion works in the heart and impresses the subject, all is in vain. As I have already said, that a nation is like the individual as it respects its use of its blessings, so I would carry out the remark to the subject of moral advancement, and would say, that as this perfection should be his highest aim and end, so should it be the highest aim and end of a nation. My hearers, we can have no loftier elevation than this. Failing this, we have failed after all, and disappointed and fallen short of those high hopes which clustered around and brightened our early morning. Oh! is it not for this that God raised us up and is to distinguish us from all the nations that have gone by or that live hoary with age? What greater honor than this could we have?—Wealth may come in upon us with its power and its splendor, intelligence may gush through our land like sunlight, but better than all these things would be the distinction of having poured moral light and borne the agents of salvation to the desolate and the benighted—of having broken the shackles of moral slavery—of having raised up from degradation the moral man. Oh, to shed abroad these great truths should be the chief employment of our people. May our country stand, reflecting from all its palaces the glory and the beauty of holiness, until the whole earth shall behold and catch its light, and live and rejoice in it forever! From America may those pure laws, those great and just principles, those perfect examples, go forth, which shall hasten on the triumph of truth over error, and holiness over sin!

To this end it behooves us to eradicate vice, and to crush corruption in the bud—to preserve all the barriers of virtue, and to improve all the means of moral advancement. And need I say, my hearers, that these duties must be performed by each individual? The nation is composed of individuals—as its parts are, so will be the whole—where one is corrupt, in so much will the American nation be corrupt. How deep and solemn the responsibility, then, which rests upon each individual! He can not sit by idly and expect to see his country, like some abstract existence, becoming pure and great under the influence of a mysterious principle; he is a part of that country, and his own labors with himself and those agencies which God has established working within him, are to be the means of producing that result. As well may he expect to see his body restored to health when one of the members is diseased. He is a member, composing an actual part of that great body, his country. How deep and solemn, I repeat, then, are his responsibilities. These duties are all for each man, and this duty of cultivating his moral nature is incumbent upon each man. In your ears, hearer, American hearer, comes the precept—"Repent of your sins, turn from iniquity, strive to walk in the ways of life, render your heart and soul as a tribute to God for all his benefits towards you!" Listen to it, remember it, act upon it.

Hearer, that nation of whom in days of old, the words were spoken—"He hath not dealt so with any nation"—has felt his judgments and is scattered abroad. There is now for her, in the land of her ancient habitation, no triumphant miracle and no exulting psalm—the sound of the timbrels and the dancers is heard no more by her flowing waters, and silence rests upon scathed and awful Sinai. The glory of the Shekinah has departed, and the temple of the unbeliever stands where the ploughshare of the Roman went over her holy places. Her harps are not even upon the willows of Babylon, but rent and shattered, they vibrate with mournful music, in all the corners of the earth, to every breeze that floats under heaven. And can we hope, if we disregard his precepts and forsake his ways, that we shall stand while his peculiar people have fallen? Let us beware, lest he withdraw the light of his countenance from us, and with all our high privileges and our glorious hopes, we go down darkly and perish from among the nations. Oh, let us act upon those principles and fulfil those duties, which shall cause us to be like the nation spoken of by the Prophet* and the Psalmist.† Then, in the far light of a thousand years, we may hope to stand in triumph and in joy. Our annual jubilee will go up from grateful hearts above our ancient graves. We see it as it will be then. Upon all our hills is peace and in all our vallies plenty.—Waters that we have never seen are dotted over with barks, and cities to be built, arise with shining strength. Around are monuments of the olden time, bearing the names of the illustrious patriots whom we honor. Mild laws and pure principles diffuse their steady radiance abroad, and in their light, with joyful hearts and tokens of prosperity, to the temples of our God in all the land, millions are coming up to keep the jubilee of freedom, and holding on, with their strong right hands, to the heritage, purchased with the blood of their forefathers!—"Happy is that people that is in such a case: yea, happy is that people whose God is the Lord!"

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. R. GUILD.

NUMBER SEVEN.

JOSHUA.—This book was written by Joshua, or by his direction. Like the books of Moses and those of all the ancients, it is written in the third person; and a few circumstances have, as was natural, been added by those who copied it afterwards. It contains the history of the Israelites, from the death of Moses to that of Joshua, a period, it is supposed, of nearly 30 years.

Josh. x: 13.—"And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed until the people had avenged themselves on their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher?" "The meaning here, (says Dr. Priestley,) I take to be, not that the sun or moon actually stood still, but that the day, or the light was prolonged in that particular place. Though God, the author of nature, can not be denied the power of suspending the laws of nature." There is no mention made of this greatest of all miracles in the book of Psalms, where almost all the other miracles in favor of the Jewish nation are enumerated or referred to.

The book of Jasher here mentioned, seems to have been a miscellaneous collection of poems; since David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan was in it. See 2 Samuel i: 18. By whom it was written, is not known.

Josh. xv: 8.—"And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom," etc. We here find the first mention of the valley of Hinnom. This was a place near Jerusalem, and probably had its name from one Hinnom having been the owner of it. In after times in was called Gehinnom, and was a very celebrated place.

From the 63d verse of this chapter, we learn that the Jebusites had not been conquered when the book of Joshua was written; and hence, that it must have been written before the time of David, who finally succeeded in conquering that people.

Josh. xxiv: 26.—"And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of the Lord," etc. It is evident from this, that Joshua was writer as well as Moses, and he no doubt wrote the greatest part of this book. It is generally thought that Samuel wrote an addition to it, as Joshua did to the books of Moses.

TRUE HAPPINESS.

BY REV. J. B. DODS.

That true happiness can be found only in the religion of our Savior, is the principal topic of the ministry, and the peculiar and distinguishing characteristic of the doctrine of universal grace and salvation; while it is the too strongly marked characteristic of the doctrine of endless misery, to teach that its duties are trials and crosses, and the ways of sin pleasurable. But that the Christian course is one of trial and gloom, is a libel, a malicious slander on the cause of Christ, and a foul blot on the spotless escutcheon of his character. He says, "my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." And thousands of the weary and heavy-laden, under the iron yoke of sin, have thrown off their load, burst their bondage, and found his declarations true. The ways of religion are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.

My friends, you are all seeking for happiness, and if you are dreaming to find it in sin, or even in riches and honors, independent of the religion of Christ, you are irresistibly doomed to be fatally disappointed, even should you gain your anticipated wealth or station; and doubly disappointed should you fail; and that failure is very probable, for honors and wealth are obtained but by few. A competence is all you need for yourselves and children. To labor to amass a fortune for them, is doing more than your part. It is but laboring to keep them in idleness; and such a bequest too often proves a curse rather than a blessing. Let me recommend to you to seek for happiness in an object all may attain, and one which will yield you permanent felicity, and that is, in the religion of Jesus Christ. It is free to all classes and conditions of men, as the crystal streams that flow down from a thousand hills. All you have to do, is, to "come and partake of the waters of life freely, without money and without price." Then you may go on, and seek for wealth and fame, directed by the hallowed voice of religion; and whatever you may obtain, under her guidance and instruction, may be enjoyed in peace.—"Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

But be not deceived. If you reject her kind offers to partake at her fountains—if you spurn her from your presence, your days must be days of darkness; and never will you obtain, in the land of the living, that happiness you so fondly anticipate. Perplexity, darkness, anxiety and pain will fill your cup, and you will breathe your last in sorrow and regret.

How important, then, my friendly readers, that we should obey the Gospel, partake of its rich feast, and make this happiness our portion! By our indifference to the voice of heavenly mercy—by our disregard of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, we rob ourselves of the only solid happiness that earth can impart.

We are continually in pursuit of felicity, and striving to obtain it in the momentary objects of this fleeting existence. Some seek for it in riches; some, in stations of office and honor; some, in the dazzling walks of science; some, in the bursting flame of eloquence; some, in the ephemeral breath of fame; some seek it in deeds of valor in fields of carnage and war, and some on the thundering battle-ship that proudly rides the ocean. But riches are perishable; stations of honor must soon be resigned; the tongue of eloquence must be stilled in silence; fame, like beauty, must soon be laid in the cold grave, and proud laurels plucked from fields of war, or won in grandeur on the ocean, must fade—and all the cares and anxieties that pervade the bosom, or distress the mind, must be hushed forever!

But that happiness which the Gospel of Jesus Christ imparts, in the contemplation of its supreme and universal reign in every heart, shall never fade, nor pass off from our cherished remembrance like the visions of a dream! It shall cheer us through life, and beat the last feeble pulse of mortal joy, and benignly brighten our longing hope for a future world, as the dark shadows of death are gathering around us! This happiness is an antepast of heaven! It shall wrap around us a drapery not of earth, and through a resurrection, introduce us into heaven, its native home, and shall be the companion of our bosom to the never-ending ages of eternity! It is imperishable as that God from whom it emanates. It shall live when the grandeur of earth is no more! It shall flourish when sublunary beauty decays! It shall roll on in immortal triumph, when globes are stopped in their mighty course! It shall be felt and remembered when all we once valued and pursued on earth, is forgotten! It shall shine with increasing lustre and glory, when the sun shall sleep in his clouds, and when the stars, that burn like embers on heaven's broad hearth, are extinguished in night! It shall live immortal when death itself shall die, and be no more! Embrace, then, in a Christian faith, this happiness.

QUESTIONS FOR PARTIALISTS.

1. Is the serpent, mentioned in Genesis iii: 15, destined to live eternally with his bruised head, or will he ultimately be exterminated by the bruiser?

2. If there is a personal devil who can attend to millions of eyes, on the different quarters of the globe, all at once, is he not omnipresent?

3. If the devil is omnipresent and also eternal in duration, does he not possess at least two of the attributes of the Everlasting God?

4. We learn from Ezekiel xvi: 53–55, that God will bring again the captivity of Jerusalem; but that Sodom and Samaria shall both be brought in first. Does the promise embrace those Sodomites who had passed through temporal death before the promise was revealed?

5. If men are not saved by universal grace, nor by partial grace, nor yet by works of righteousness which they have done, how are they saved?

6. Was it any more an act of arbitrary mercy for God to produce a scheme by which to save the whole of a ruined world without its advice, than it was to bring it into being without its consent?

7. Why should Christ console his disciples, by saying that God could save even a rich man, for with him all things are possible, if he knew that infinite goodness would fail to put that power into exercise?

8. Is it likely that St. Paul thought, after God had saved him, the chief of sinners, that he would eternally damn millions of his fellow-beings for being half as great sinners as their chief?

EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.

"And Jesus said unto him, foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." LUKE ix: 58.

This passage is commonly supposed to contain a representation of the utterly destitute and friendless condition of Jesus Christ; and is made the basis of much pathetic declamation on the subject. We have no disposition to underrate the privations and sufferings of the Saviour; but we can not consider the above passage in the light in which it is commonly viewed. We think it was not spoken in reference to the whole life of our Saviour; but in reference to the particular time in which it was uttered. By the previous connexion it will be seen, that the inhabitants of a certain village of Samaria had refused him and his disciples, lodgings, because he was going up to Jerusalem. They were going there to attend a religious celebration; and this excited the enmity of the Samaritans, who accordingly refused him entertainments. It was therefore in reference to this place, and this time, that our Saviour said that he had no where to lay his head. That he did not intend to take his whole life into consideration, is evident from the fact, that the language is not true in relation to his whole ministry. He had friends in many places, in which he preached and performed miracles, whose friendship and hospitalities he enjoyed. W. E. M.

GENEVA COLLEGE.

We happened to be present at the yearly commencement of this institution on Wednesday the 7th inst., and were much pleased with the high character of the exercises. The young gentlemen who then bid adieu to the consecrated walls of their Alma Mater, if we may form an estimate from their efforts on that day, are calculated to occupy no medium stations in the active scenes of life. The Baccalaureate Address of President Hale, and the Address of Gen. John A. Dix, before the literary societies, were all that an enlightened community anticipated, and were well worthy their high reputation for scholarship. We rejoiced to see that the honorary degree of D. D. was conferred upon Rev. P. A. Proal, of this city, and upon Prof. Yates, of Schenectada. The exercises we are told exceeded the highest expectations of the friends of the institution, and gave evidence of increased usefulness in the thorough education of our young men. The public should know that this college, situated on the banks of the Seneca lake, in one of the most beautiful and healthy villages of our State, has an able and thorough faculty, and affords advantages for literary and scientific culture scarcely rivalled by any institution of the kind in our country. THE RAINBOW.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

"The sun went down last evening in a rain-storm—but through a slight lift in the clouds, on the verge of the western horizon, the rich beams of the retiring luminary were poured out upon the earth and clouds in all their fulness. A splendid rainbow spanned the heavens, full in its form, and perfect in its colors. It was a lovely sight—and as we gazed upon the "sign," we felt something of that awe which the ancient patriarch must of known, when the finger of the Almighty pointed to that "bow in the clouds," as a token of anger passed away, and of judgments forever postponed.

How exquisite the thought, that He whom we may call "our Father," makes the tokens of his interference with man, the emblems of his greatness—the signs of his mercy are the gorgeous decorations of his majesty, for "there was a rainbow round about his throne."

J. R. CHANDLER.

The sun looked through its watery veil,
Beneath the cloudy pile,
And gave the weeping face of earth
A glory and a smile;
While, on the bosom of the storm,
An arch of brightness shone,
And fancy's lifted eye beheld
"A rainbow round the throne."

So, when from off the deluged earth
Had passed the sweeping flood—
And sloping vale and lofty mount
In light and beauty stood—
To the old patriarch's glistening eye,
Upraised with love divine,
Of judgment ceased and mercy given,
A RAINBOW was the sign.

So, when the nations in the gloom
Of darksome ages stood—
When atlas flamed with baleful fires
And glowed with streaming blood—
The GOSPEL-HOPE, on brooding clouds,
Appeared—a radiant form—
An arch whose brightness spanned the grave—
A RAINBOW through the storm.

So, when care's chilling rain-drops fall,
And fears and doubts dismay—
When hopes lie strewn like withered flowers
Upon our earthly way—
Oh! may we look far on, far up,
Beyond our dark despair,
And through our gushing tears, behold
A RAINBOW streaming there.

And so, O Father, may the gloom
Of sin and death depart,
That heaven, and joy, and life, and love,
May flow to every heart—
That every soul, with starry robes,
May in thy courts be known,
And form in Mercy's beaming arc
"A RAINBOW ROUND THE THRONE."

THOUGHTS FOR THE THINKING....NO. III.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Let such as know little of the feverish and longing anxieties, the bitter and heart-burning desires, and the constant and slow consuming fires of disappointed hopes, which are the perpetual and never failing attendants of those who yield themselves, the cringing sycophantics for popular applause, be cautious lest they barter away the quiet and happiness of life—the peace and gladness of hearts which are true to themselves, for the uncertain fame of the toilers for public favor. It is a path, lighted only by the fickle, inconstant and ever varying tapers of popular opinion, which often—full often—conducts its followers to a dismal goal, leaving him to what are found to be bitterness of soul and brokenness of heart. And it is a sound which has lured many a victim from the quietness of life, into the windings of vanity, whose end is vexation and remorse, either to mock them with the hollowness of their wishes when attained, or to hurl them from hope's highest pinnacle into the yawning gulf of despair, from which ever come the moans of those who contend hopelessly with its engulfing waves.

Let him who would be a follower of the principles and precepts of the Redeemer, think not that they consist in abstraction—in ideality—exciting the brain, but leaving the heart untouched—in kindling the fires of imagination which burn, till they melt from the eye a tear for some fancied and nameless misery, while they immediately cease to glow, to warm the heart and moisten the cheek, when fancy no longer feeds the flame—in weeping over the calamities of the human race, without offering to relieve them—in affecting to drop the tear of sympathy for the poor and the needy, the widow and the fatherless, while they forget to minister to their suffering condition, and relieve their wants and necessities—in bowing the knee and performing all the external manifestations of devotion, while the heart remains unmoved and unwarmed by its holy flame—and in yielding themselves to feelings of excitement, or the overflowings of awakened sensibilities which make them weep over the fancy drawn picture of human wo, but remains unaffected and unmoved by realities. All these, nay, even more, may exist, and still religion be wanting; and religion may exist where more of these are found. But it consists in active benevolence, flowing from pure and holy motives, and affecting the object whereunto it is directed—in charity which "thinketh no evil," hoping all things for the best, and rejoicing in what it performs—in love, flowing pure from the soul, which throws its embrace around every child of humanity—in comparison, gushing like a river of goodness from a fountain pure and holy, yielding its benefits to all alike, spreading righteousness, holiness and blessedness, wherever it flows, giving newborn hopes, joys and pleasures to all around—causing the desolate heart to rejoice with the fulness of joy, and making the bosoms of sorrow respond to the accents of delight—in loftiness of mind and thought which envy not the proud and the rich—and in humility and meekness of heart which despise not the poor and humble. In short, it consists in all that is pure, holy, just, perfect, supreme goodness, superior excellence, and most exalted and infinite love, being a transcript of him who went about doing good—and being the spirit of God, living with the pure and holy in heart.

QUESTIONS.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

1. If man was created to "glorify God and enjoy him forever," will the Deity ever permit an enemy to thwart his intention, and make that existence a curse, which he designed to be a blessing?

2. Could he have created man for that purpose, and yet ultimately doom him to endless pain, without changing his mind?

3. If God has but one mind and changes not, will he ever have a purpose, concerning any, different from that which he had in giving them being?

4. Could he have created man to enjoy his happifying presence forever, knowing at the time, that man's final state would be diametrically opposite to this?

5. And if the object of creation was the happiness of the created, can the Deity inflict endless pain, without changing his purpose?

6. If principalities, nor powers, etc., "nor any other creature can separate us from the love of God," will not his love be eternally exercised towards us?

7. And can the devices of satan—will the powers of the enemy—destroy his affection or annihilate his love?

THE MOTHER'S LAMENT.

And thou hast left me, my daughter. No more can I listen to thy cheerful voice—no more can I gaze upon thy sweet countenance—no more can I clasp thee to my heart, and rejoice that thou art mine—for death has taken thee! I have tenderly watched thee from thy infancy, and have witnessed the development of every budding beauty. When a few years had fallen upon thy brow, thou wert lovely as the fairest of earth's children. Thy spirit was pure and spotless as the snow flake, and thy mind was a garden, in which naught but the most beautiful and fragrant flowers flourished. My daughter, thou wert the pride of my heart, the object upon which all a mother's hopes and affections were centered. But oh! I did not dream that thou wert mortal! Death has hushed the gentle accents that were used to fall from thy lips, and were such music to my ear; he has dimmed the lustre of thine eye, he has stiffened thy graceful form, and has touched thy warm cheek, leaving an icy coldness! To make my bereavement more severe, he gave me no warning that I was about to lose thee; for like the evening dews before the morning sunshine, didst thou pass away, my child, and I am alone! Who shall supply thy place? To whom shall I now turn for support, since thou who I fondly hoped would smooth my journey to the tomb, art thyself covered by the cold earth?

Hark! I hear a low whisper—it is the monitor within—the still small voice that speaketh comfort to my soul. I will obey it, for it tells me to cease my complaint—that I have yet a Friend—my Saviour is not dead. And through his atoning grace my beloved is happy. Why then should I mourn as one without hope? For but a little time will elapse ere we shall meet, where there shall be no more death nor sin—where the parting hand is never extended, and where farewell is a word forgotten.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN TWO NEIGHBORS.

UNIVERSALIST. Good morning, neighbor A.; I saw you at our meeting yesterday, and as you seemed very attentive and much interested in the discourse, I hope you will allow me to ask what you thought of the sermon—of its practical bearings, and the particular illustrations the speaker gave of Scripture truths?

PARTIALIST. Why, yes, I was there, and I did listen attentively, but my astonishment held me mute; and it was not so much from edification as wonder that the speaker dare thus stand up before high Heaven, and so pervert the truths of the everlasting Gospel—that he dare say with such a text before him, that the most plain doctrine of the Bible was a false one—yes, the only doctrine that can make man virtuous and happy while passing through his toilsome pilgrimage on earth—the only thing that can sustain him in the dark and trying hour of death, and carry him without fear up to the judgment bar of his Creator!

U. Well, neighbor A., I will not affect to misunderstand you; the text I also remember perfectly well: "I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh."—Prov. i: 26. I suppose by the doctrine to which you refer, as the great and important one of the Scriptures, is meant that of endless punishment for sin after death; and the misrepresenations of which you suppose the speaker guilty, are his stating that the text had no reference to such a doctrine, nor even with any thing connected to a future state of existence. Am I right neighbor?

P. Yes; I meant the belief of that great truth in connexion with repentance and the second birth.

U. As regards what you have said, let me then answer you. The speaker did not represent any doctrine of the Bible as false; he only said what all Universalists believe, that the doctrine of endless punishment for sin was not taught in the Scriptures. The Bible teaches (and so we receive it) that he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong he doeth, that God is no respecter of persons, that though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished; and if you will read the whole chapter from which the text was drawn, and the sequel, I feel certain you will be constrained to acknowledge, that all the benefits to accure from following wisdom, and all the practices for rejecting her counsels, are to be visited upon man, in this stage of existence; and that no allusion to a future state is there to be found; and allow me still farther to tell you (and challenge you to prove the contrary) that the doctrine of an immortal existence, is not even revealed in the Old Testament; for life and immortality, you know, were brought to light by the preaching of the Gospel.

P. But Universalists reject the idea of the second birth, and ridicule the notion of repentance.

U. Sir, allow me to correct your error. Universalists deny no doctrine of the Bible. They believe in all the second birth that the Scriptures teach. They do not of course admit the sudden and miraculous change, which alters, in an instant, the whole disposition of the man, and brings him at once from a state of entire corruption, (and, as some have it, of total depravity,) to one of entire perfection. They believe it is his highest interest, and would yield him the brightest enjoyment, to "cease to do evil and learn to do well;" to follow the laws of his inward man—of his intellectual nature, and by so doing follow the laws of the second man, his Lord from heaven, who is not of the earth, earthy.

P. But let me interrupt you to say, you have not yet told me what you understand by being born again. I wish to hear what Universalists make of that?

U. I will answer you for myself, and, I think, for a majority of my Universalist brethren. We believe the second birth, takes place at the morning of the resurrection, when the dead shall be raised incorruptible; when that which is sown in weakness, shall be raised in power; when that sown in dishonor shall be raised in glory. Then we shall be changed, and then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory; O! death, where is thy sting? O, grave, where is thy victory?"

P. All this may sound very well, in your sophistical mode of treating the truths of the Bible; but these sophistries let me solemnly warn you, will not sustain you when you come to lie down on your last bed of pain, to yield up your immortal soul to the king of terrors, and go to meet your God at his awful tribunal bar. And you know, too, that as "the tree falls, so it shall lie," and "as death leaves us, so shall judgment find us."

U. You accuse me of dealing in sophistries. I might retort on you the false quotations of Scripture which you have just made; (I will not believe wilfully;) but will you allow me to change the mode of our conversation by asking a few questions, to which I may expect your candid answers?

P. Yes, certainly! Why not?

U. Well, then, do you believe that God was and is the Creator of all things?

P. I do, for the Bible declares it.

U. Do you believe that the Creator has all power to order all things—every transaction—after the counsels of his own will?

P. I believe he is omnipotent, consequently holds all power in heaven, and on the earth.

U. Do you believe that "known unto God are all his ways from the beginning," and that he knew before creating the human race, what would be the end and aim of each individual of the species?

P. I dare not deny that he did. But I see where you are coming, you intend to destroy free agency.

U. Never mind agency just at the present. I wish you to answer a few more quetions candidly, will you do so?

P. Certainly!

U. Do you believe he is a just, merciful and benevolent God?

P. Yes: I have no reason to doubt it.

U. Well, then, neighbor A., if you believe God to be the Creator of all things; that he has all power in heaven and earth; that he knew and knows all things from the beginning, and that he knew the end and aim of each individual before creating him, that he is a just, merciful and benevolent God, do you believe he would create the human race, knowing that one would be doomed to endless sin and pain, and still retain his character of justice, mercy and benevolence? Or could he be just, merciful and benevolent, in creating beings for such an end?

P. O! I do not wish to talk farther with you. You would destroy all free agency. Good morning.

U. I will talk farther with you on that subject if ——

P. No! no! not now; perhaps another time—good bye.

U. Good morning, neighbor. M. D.

HAMILTON COLLEGE.

On Wednesday, the 31st ult., the commencement of this institution took place. A great variety of talent was displayed, and the exercises can not fail to reflect credit on the institution.—Most of the subjects were well chosen, and well treated. The orations of Messrs. Jerome, A. D. Gridley, Curtiss and Adams, candidates for the first degree, were productions of no inferior order, and they are evidences of the benefits of a thorough collegiate course. Most of the other orations of the candidates for the first degree, were good.

But we would refer more particularly to the oration pronounced by S. Ellis, Esq., of Cincinnati; a candidate for the second degree. In an oration of more than an hour in length, he completely enraptured the audience. His subject was the Social Progress and Destination of Man. He treated the subject in a manner highly reputable to himself, and in the highest degree honorable to his "Alma Mater." In originality of expression, in polish of style, in historical and general information, and in ease and elegance of delivery he is seldom excelled. He certainly combines powers of which few can boast. His subject is kept constantly and steadily in view, and if he appears to digress, the result shows that the apparent digression is a direct and complete illustration of his subject. As the stream impeded in its progress gathers force by its obstruction, but at length rushes on with resistless power, so does he by every seeming departure from his subject, gather increased strength and beauty.—In short, we consider the oration a grand display of genuine eloquence, liberal principle, and unadulterated truth; and if such principles and sentiments are imparted in Hamilton College, it deserves, and will undoubtedly receive, the patronage of a liberal public. We are confident that we express the desire of the audience, when we request its publication. Q.

CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES—NO. VIII.

THE REAL TREASURES.

"But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven."—Matt. vi: 20.

We proceed to remark, in the third place, that the heart is devoted to that which occupies or sways the mind. "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." How true this is, experience and observation will tell you. Do not cares for that object which is prominent in your thoughts, crowd in upon your most careless moments? Is not your slumber sometimes prevented by the intrusion of some important scheme which you have in progress? Is not the retirement of home, or the solemn hour of devotion, interrupted by thoughts of the ruling object of your heart? Is not the thoughts of the merchant in his vaults and safes, or out upon the sea with his ships? Does not Napoleon dream of battle in the calm hour of sleep?—did not "the currents of the heady fight" toss around his dying pillow? Is not the heart of the father in distant lands, fixed upon his bright browed babes afar? Does not the mariner hear the image of "sweet home" before him, over the waste of stormy seas? Is not the mind of the patriot, prisoned as he is, away on the battle-fields of liberty, and on the thresholds, and by the altars of his father-land? Does not the chained eagle pant for the sun?—But you need no illustrations of a truth so familiar and universal as this. He who places his treasures upon earth, will rivet his heart there also; and he who lays up heavenly riches will set his soul upon heaven as his home and his chief end. You will find the man who is absorbed in business or pleasure, giving but little heed to those purer and loftier things, which should be the objects of every one. He may give for a moment a listening ear, or lend an attentive eye, but they go not to his heart, for that is sealed to them, and filled with other matter.—Hard must you labor, frequently, and earnestly appeal, ere you can break its stern indifference and move its torpid pulses—ere you can raise his eyes from his glittering and absorbing dreams, and fix them onward and up. Where his treasure is there is his heart, and you must convince him that this is not the best and richest treasure, you must urge him until he places his affections on that which is, ere you will have done your work. But he whose treasures are above, who has placed them safe from the storms and changes of time, in the innermost shrine of the soul, will rest his heart in heaven. You can not come to him with a spiritual topic which is uninteresting. You can not set before him a spiritual treasure which he does not make it an object to obtain.—He pursues his business, his recreation, whatever may be his lot, industriously and rightly; but they are only means to aid him on in the upward and radiant way.—Go read his actions and behold his works—go see his triumph and his joy—and feel the force and certainty of the truth, that "where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

Lastly—we find a reason from the facts stated, why we should lay up heavenly instead of earthly treasures. Because earthly treasures are uncertain, and heavenly ones the best and the surest, and because we rest our affections where our treasure is, we should lay it up in heaven. And do not, reader, think of heaven too much as a foreign good. Remember that the kingdom of heaven is within us, and that, while we use outward terms and physical expressions to convey our meaning, and while the blessed existence beyond the grave is especially called heaven, remember, I say, that in your own purified and expanded mind you will find many of those imperishable treasures, if you will cultivate those affections which are set forth in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. There it is, reader. Instead of absorbing your heart and your faculties in the pursuit of such earthly and perishable things as we have named, you are to strive to live the life, and perform the acts, of a follower of Christ, and thus do you lay up treasures in heaven. You will find, after all, that you reap no real reward from these fleeting temporalities—that disappointments, and griefs, and losses, are connected with them—while the other will prove your stays in every hour of need, and your light when the sunshine has departed and the earth looks dark. You know, moreover, that it is your duty to cultivate these right affections, and you can not compromise with this duty by making earthly things your main object, and yet pretending to cultivate those graces. So, you perceive the beauty of the figure used by our Saviour.—

"Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

I trust, dear reader, that you will obey this precept. "The moth" and "the rust"—who has not felt them cankering his treasure heap and destroying his hopes? Who has been so happy as to pass to any age without experiencing in himself the mutability of earthly possessions? Reader, the moth and the rust warn you. Your own knowledge of duty, and every consideration of righteousness and gratitude, call upon you to lay up the rich, the real treasures, where they shall never be lost and will never fail you! E. H. C.

ANTI-PHRENOLOGY.

Many of the newspapers are just beginning to learn that there is a work in existence, containing two Lectures against Phrenology, by Dr. Sewall, of Washington, D. C.; and are publishing J. Q. Adams' commendation of the book, as almost sufficient, of itself, to convert every Phrenologist that may happen to cast his eyes on it! Unfortunately for their hopes, Dr. Sewall's Lectures are no new thing to well read Phrenologists; for the Doctor has extracted many of his materials from the works of Gall, Spurzheim, Combe, and Caldwell; where Phrenologists saw and read them, years before Dr. S. thought of purleining, garbling, separating them from their contexts and refutations, and publishing them to the world as his own!

In the second place, he has first carricatured Phrenology, and then directed his weapons against his own man of straw; and, unfortunately for the hopes of these anti-Phrenologists, Phrenologists are too well acquainted with their own system, to be deceived into believing it such a mess of absurdity as the Doctor sometimes represents it.

In the third place, Phrenologists generally read Dr. Sewall's lectures more than two years ago—when they first appeared from the press—and as the Lectures, themselves, failed to convert us then, it is not likely that Mr. Adams' letter will effect that work now. Dr. J. Barber publicly lectured in refutation of Dr. Sewall's Lectures, two years ago, in this city.

In the fourth place, Mr. Adams' letter contains evidence within itself, that he is ignorant of Phrenology, to a degree which must render his opinions weightless to our minds. For instance, he never regarded it seriously, but evidently despises it too much to give it a candid, serious, and thorough examination—if he had done so, he would now be a Phrenologist. Again, he locates the "thirty-three or thirty-five faculties" (he does not even know how many!) "on the blind side of the head"—evidently betraying his ignorance of even the number and location of the faculties!!! And lastly, he supposes Phrenology to be a system of mere materialism—and to represent the organs of the mind as "the imperishable mind" itself!!! And this is the man whose mere opinion of a book full of plagiarism, garbled extracts, and disingenuous statements, we are to take as full and convincing evidence against FACTS! With all our respect for the great mind of J. Q. Adams, we can not receive his opinions for proofs—we appeal from him as he now is, to John Quincy Adams, when he shall have laid aside his contempt for a new science, his prejudices and preconceived opinions, and informed himself fully on both sides of the subject.

In the fifth place, unfortunately for the hopes of anti-Phrenologists, if Phrenologists received any man's opinions in proof of the truth or falsehood of any science based on facts, we have in our favor the opinions of a greater number of distinguished statesmen, philosophers, divines, jurists, teachers, physicians and others, who have examined both sides of the question, than they can possibly bring against it—of men, too, better able to judge of its value, and to test its truth in actual observations and daily practice, than is even John Quincy Adams, or Daniel Webster; Judge McLean, or Moses Stuart; Dr. Fisk, or D. M. Reese and Thomas Sewall, M. D.'s.

To all who would see the absolute dishonesty and unfairness of Dr. Sewall's Lectures severely exposed, and his arguments (?) refuted, we recommend the perusal of "Phrenology Vindicated, or Anti-Phrenologists Unmasked," by Dr. Charles Caldwell, late a Professor in Transylvania University, at Lexington, Ky. We understand that Mr. J. Toulmin Smith is also about to publish a refutation of Dr. Sewall's Lectures. He is capable of answering a much more powerful book against Phrenology than Dr. Sewall has written.

Is an apology needed for introducing this subject into our columns? Here it is: Phrenology has, more than any thing else, convinced many good but skeptical men, that Christianity, from its adaptation to the nature of man, as disclosed by this science, must have had for its Author, the Creator of man It has opened to my mind, and to many other minds, new vistas in the wilderness of mental philosophy—shed a clearer light on religious faith, morals, legislation, jurisprudence, education, and the treatment of insanity—has disclosed more plainly the whole nature of man, his relationship to God, his necessary improveability in the successive generations of his race, and thus confirmed my belief in his glorious destiny—the holiness and happiness of all God's offspring—of the entire intelligent universe. All this it has done, and more—much more—for myself and for hundreds—and I can not tamely see the mists of superstition, ignorance and error envelope minds that yet need its teachings and influence, and shut out all its blessed light from their understandings. The secular papers are copying this letter—spreading the clouds and the mists—and I feel it my solemn duty to aid in dispersing them. If Phrenology is false, as it professes to be based on facts, by facts it can be refuted—but let not professed facts, manufactured by Dr. Sewall, be taken for real facts—facts in nature. And let not the cry of "materialism," "infidelity," and "irreligion" deter the clear minded and pure hearted, though timid votary of truth, from examining its evidences and receiving its teachings, which agree with nature, reason and revelation. Universalists, especially, who know by experience the cruelty of this wicked warfare against their own views, should be careful to distrust it when it is employed against Phrenology, or any other unpopular theory.

Our subscribers are owing us more than twice that amount! and we want at least one-half of it paid between this and the close of the year. Ten thousand dollars will just about pay what we owe for the establishment, paper, printing, etc., up to that time, and what we need to make arrangements for our next volume.—We need it for the sake of our health and peace of mind, both of which are suffering under the cares and anxieties induced by the want of it. We want it, that we may perform our publishing and editorial duties, and provide for our families, with that cheerfulness, promptness and energy which are necessary to their being well performed. Shall we receive it?

Those subscribers who owe for volumes previous to the present year, owe us much more than the amount we ask—can pay it—and should pay it. We are aware that all are not able, but enough are, to pay all they owe us. Why do they not? Are their excuses satisfactory to their own consciences? Would they excuse us, if we were in their place, and able to pay, and they in ours, burdened with debt and its cares on account of our neglect? If not, then the payment of what they owe, and can pay to us, is a duty to us, to themselves, and to the cause we advocate. It is an act of but common justice, which they should discharge immediately. Will they not do it? "We speak as unto Universalists, judge ye what we say."

Now for the mode.—If your Postmaster is an honest and accommodating man, he will remit the dollars you owe us—as the Postmaster General says they may frank all such remittances to publishers—and the amount under a dollar can lie over till another time. This, when there is no agent near you. If the Postmaster is not such a person, (and you can judge,) send five dollars or upwards, (in current bills, and as few pieces as possible,) and we will pay the postage. This, also, when there is no agent near. But where there is a good agent near, pay him all you owe us, as soon as possible, and let him forward the amount, or as near the amount he collects, as he can remit. Now, don't delay this business, so important to us—we want money every week to pay current dues and expenses, and could advantageously use the whole sum we ask, to-morrow, if we had it!

Those who can not pay immediately, should get ready to pay soon—say by the time the Fall Associations meet. Do, brethren—do try and pay us up all that is owing to us—at least all that is owing on volumes previous to the present year. Reader—if you owe, and can pay us, you are the person here appealed to—shall we appeal in vain? G. AND H.

N. B. Notes on solvent banks in the Middle and Eastern States, generally, can be used here; but New-York bills are preferred. South Carolina bills will be received at par, if sent to our General Agent for the Southern States, Br. "Allen Fuller, P. M., Salubrity P. O., Pickens District, South Carolina." State, in all cases, the name of the person for whom the money is sent, his Postoffice, county and State, and the years or volumes on which the money is to be applied. This is not only necessary to prevent mistakes, but often aids in correcting mistakes already made. G. AND H.

THE U. S. CONVENTION

Of Universalists holds its next session on the third Wednesday and Thursday in September next, in the city of Portland, Me.—about one day's or one night's voyage in a steamer from Boston. The delegates who were appointed by the several State Conventions to attend it, may need this timely notice, to jog their memories, in order that they may make their arrangements to attend it, or to appoint for substitutes those brethren who will attend, in case the power of appointment is vested in them. The ministerial delegates from this State are, T. J. Sawyer, G. W. Montgomery, J. Chase and the writer—the lay delegates are, S. Van Shaack, P. Price, H. H. Brown, T. Biddlecom, A. L. Wells, and D. Montague—four ministerial and six lay delegates being all that are allowed from each State Convention.

DIALOGUE.

Partialist.—Well, neighbor, I have read Combe on the Constitution of Man.

Universalist.—And how do you like it—what do you think of it?

P. Why I think it is a work eminently calculated to make Universalists.

U. Ah!—I am glad to hear you say so; for I think it an excellent work.

P. What I meant by saying that it was well calculated to make Universalists, is this—many people do not distinguish between natural laws and moral laws—a law is a law with them, whether of matter or of mind. Now when such persons see it so clearly proved by Mr. Combe, that every violation of the natural laws brings with it its own certain and adequate punishment, they will not distinguish properly, and will suppose that it is the same in violating the moral laws, and that men receive their punishment as they go along.

U. But do you not suppose that Mr. Combe's work is well calculated to make people more careful—more thoughtful about the consequence of their actions—more prudent and provident?

P. Oh, certainly—in that respect it will do much good, and tend greatly to preserve health and increase happiness among men.

U. Thank you, brother. If seeing that men are punished "as they go along" for violating the natural laws, tends to make men better and happier in that respect—then, believing that they will be punished "as they go along" for violating the moral laws, must also tend to make them more careful—better and happier in that respect, also. What, then, becomes of the "licentious tendency of Universalism?" And why object to men's becoming Universalists? Besides, you seem to forget that violations of the moral laws are morally punished, and as certainly and speedily, as violations of the natural laws are physically punished. A. B. G.

THE DUN.

We give a big dun place this week, because we can not help it! Surely our readers will excuse us—as we do not trouble them often. A friend who knows many of the very painful and disagreeable difficulties that have beset us during the last two years and a half, and the perplexities of so dunning delinquents, that none but real delinquents shall notice the dun, has handed me the following sketch of only one out of the many similar scenes we pass through every month. We could give dialogues of the grocer, the paper maker, the printers, Clerks, etc., etc., all, like this, based on facts, that would make every reader declare that he would not be in our place for any amount that hope may promise us as our reward some dozen years hence!!! Heigho—but here is the dialogue—will it not excuse our big dun to the mind of every sensible reader? A. B. G.

LANDLORD AND PUBLISHER—A DIALOGUE.

Landlord.—Your rent is due to-day.

Publisher.—True, but we have a heavy note to pay this week, and although we have enough due us, the trouble is to collect. We must therefore ask you to wait a few days, at least, till some of our delinquents realize that we can not live on faith.

L. But why not dun?

P. Dun! We have already dunned till we are tired. And the worst of it is, none but those who have paid punctually, consider the duns as meaning themselves; and such threaten to discontinue their paper if we do not stop dunning.

L. But have you none but newspaper accounts to depend on? Have you not accounts due for books, that you have supplied your preachers with?

P. True, we have some such accounts, that should have been paid long ago. But some preachers have spent money which they have realized from the sale of their books, and are now looking in vain to their societies for the means of replacing it. And if we were to crowd them for pay, as hard as you and others that we owe crowd us, they would think we were deficient in brotherly kindness.

L. One word for these preachers.—Just tell them from me, that if they knew what was best for the societies, they would require their pay punctually; for the longer a preacher's salary runs, the harder it is to pay it; and every preacher would best inculcate the precepts of honesty which he preaches, to refuse to go into the desk at the end of each quarter, until his salary is paid. But I can spend no more time in considering excuses—your quarter's rent is due—I have made calculations on receiving it to-day—and must have it.—(Exit.)

P. (Solus.) Here is a reasonable man—he asks me out of nothing to make nearly one hundred dollars! He is just like our subscribers—they require us to furnish them a newspaper regularly, at an expense of 150 dollars per week, and send us about 20 dollars a week to pay our expenses with!!! ALMOST A FACT.

QUERIES.—Is the doctrine of the Gospel in opposition to, or inconsistent with, a single precept of Jesus?

Has Jesus given a single precept which, if carried out in the divine government, will countenance the doctrine of man's endless sinning and suffering?

If not, can the doctrine of endless sin and misery be any part of the Gospel of the blessed Redeemer—the Friend of sinners and the Saviour of the world?

What precept of Jesus, or what moral virtue, is that, the practice of which will cause a man to be vindictive or wrathful to a fellow-being?

Can a man inflict, or desire to inflict useless or endless suffering on a fellow-being, without feeling wrathful and vindictive to that being?

How long must a man love God supremely and man universally, before he can be reconciled to the endless sin and suffering of his neighbor or his enemy?

T. FISK.

In reply to the question of a correspondent, I remark, that Theophilus Fisk, one of the Editors and Proprietors of the political paper, entitled "The Old Dominion," published in Portsmouth, Va, is not now in fellowship with our denomination. He was formerly in our fellowship, but some time ago, say two years, he sent in his resignation, which was published in the Trumpet, at Boston, and afterwards noticed in this paper. He has not since applied for, nor been received into fellowship; and consequently is not responsible to us, nor are we responsible to the public, for his conduct as a man, an Editor, or a preacher. A. B. G.

TO "APELLES."

Dear Br.—After a seeming neglect of more than a month, I have noticed your private remark, and now notify you, as requested, of the acceptance of your favors. I hope the delay will not alter your promise, on such condition, to "resume your pen for greater and more enduring labors." Go on with the work. We will begin the publication of what we have received, shortly, and hope to be kept in "copy." A. B. G.

THE SUBLIME AND ONE STEP BEYOND.

"But he [the infidel] can imagine no creation! Nothing can never become something. Something exists—which something he calls matter, wherefore matter has always existed—could never have had a maker."—N. Y. Watchman, Vol. 2, p. 71.

Corollary—The infidel can imagine no creator. Nothing, in intellect, can never become something. But something exists, as may be seen by the "Watchman," which something he calls D Smith, therefore D. Smith has always existed—can never have had a maker. Can any one tell us how, according to the above logic, intelligence can be the result of material organization, or be otherwise than independent of it in its origin?

MEANS AND ENDS OR SELF TRAINING.

This is the title of a work recently published by Marsh, Capen, Lyon and Webb, Boston, in which much instruction, indispensably necessary to every young woman in America, is agreeably conveyed.

It may not be interesting to those butterflies of fashion who think of nothing but dress, gay parties, and scandal, and read nothing but love sick tales and ghost stories, but those who read for improvement, we venture to say, will never regret the time spent in perusing another of Miss Sedgwick's valuable accessions to the useful publications of the day.

DYING HYMN.

BY MISS LAURA EGGLESTON.

Jesus, my supernal Saviour,
While thy heavenly voice I hear
And I realize thy favor,
I will never, never fear.

Now my youthful form is sinking,
'Neath consumption's with'ring power,
And my spirit oft is thinking,
Soon will come her parting hour.

Here I've tasted much of anguish,
Life for me displays no charms;
I am weary, thus to languish—
Take me, Jesus, to thy arms.

Long I've pined to quit earth's bowers
Where the seeds of death are sown,
To re-bloom with fadeless flowers,
Where no blight or sorrows come.

Death has lost his arm of terror,
Since my Saviour has arisen;
Nought but blighting creeds of error,
Makes me doubt the love of Heaven.

See the boundless, free salvation,
Of our blest, immortal king!
Every kindred, tongue and nation,
Shall before him come and sing.

Shall my Saviour be victorious,
O'er the powers of death and sin?
Yea, indeed, his reign is glorious—
All shall be subdued to Him.

I can now depart with gladness,
Trusting soon to meet above
All I love—the whole creation,
Perfect made in truth and love.

CAN THE MOTHER FORGET HER CHILD?

"Why may not the spirits of departed friends hover near us, and act the part of guardian angels? It is at least a beautiful thought."

Dear mother, dost thou hover near
To shield from harm thy erring child,
And is that love as warm, as pure,
As when on him in life you smiled?
Dost watch him yet with ardent love,
Though years have sped since thou didst go
To join the angel-choir above,
And left thine orphan child below?
Dost love him yet—though change hath wrought
Upon this brow thou once didst kiss
The lines of care and saddened thought?
Dost love him less because of this?
Dost love him—though temptation's snares
Have caused his wandering feet to stray?
Dost love him, though 'mid wants and cares,
He swerved from virtue's narrow way?
Dost love him yet, though other friends
Share the affections of his heart;
Who to his sorrow comfort lend,
And in his friendship claim a part?
Thou lov'st him yet! a mother's love,
Nor time nor change can e'er efface!
And will my God less faithful prove?
Will He, to me, deny his grace? W. R.

Consistency.—Some few years since, there resided in Vermont a Calvinistic clergyman, who was very fond of preaching up total depravity, and who continually insisted that in every act performed by an unconverted person, however good the act was in itself, the actor committed sin enough to damn him eternally. This clergyman lived in the north part of the State, where the lands of non-residents were frequently sold to pay taxes, and being a lover of this world as well as the world to come, frequently speculated in the purchase of those lands. It so happened, that he had made large purchases and payment had become due. Unable to meet the payment, from disappointments in money matters, it was necessary he should borrow or lose his bargain. He was directed to a gentleman who was in the habit of lending money, and who happened to be a Universalist—of whom he inquired whether he could be furnished with a sum of money on certain conditions. He was answered by the gentleman that he had the money, but did not care about lending it, however, to oblige him he would do it, and immediately stepped to his desk and took out the money. While counting it, the good clergyman, elated in spirit, observed, "Esquire, I very seldom see you at my meeting, I should really be happy to see you there oftener." And I, Sir, was the reply, would be happy to go oftener, but I do not like the preaching. "Well, Sir, what is there in the preaching you do not like?" I am not pleased, Sir, with the doctrine of total depravity, of which you have so much to say. I do not believe that every thing an unconverted man does is sinful, or that in every act he does, however good the act may be in itself, he commits sin enough to damn him eternally. Do you believe it, Sir? Oh, yes, an unregenerated man can do no good, and however kind, obliging and beneficial an act may be to those who receive it, yet with the actor it is sin. Well, Sir, replied the gentleman, we will not dispute on this subject; here is the money. I do not care about lending it, as by keeping it in my own hands I may turn it to better advantage in the purchase of lands than to lend it to you—I lend it to oblige you, and to do you a kindness. But, Sir, I am an unconverted man, and in doing this act of kindness, I shall commit sin enough to damn my soul through endless duration. Here is the money, Sir, and I leave it with you, whether I ought to commit this sin, or not, and whether I ought to be eternally damned for obliging you. Need we say, the poor clergyman looked astonished; his color changed, and after biting his lips for some time, he took his hat and wished the gentleman good morning, being unwilling to deny his favorite doctrine, and not hardened enough to say, by deed, if not by words, "you may be damned for what I care, if I can only be obliged by getting the money and saving my speculation."

The Balance of Happiness Equal.—"An extensive contemplation on human affairs, will lead us to this conclusion, that among the different conditions and ranks of men, the balance of happiness is preserved in a great measure equal, and that the high and the low, the rich and the poor, approach, in point of real enjoyment, much nearer to each other than is commonly imagined. In the lot of man, mutual compensations, both of pleasure and of pain, universally take place. Providence never intended, that any state here should be either completely happy, or entirely miserable. If the feelings of pleasure are more numerous, and more lively, in the higher departments of life, such also are those of pain. If greatness flatters our vanity, it multiplies our dangers. If opulence increases our gratifications, it increases, in the same proportion, our desires and demands. If the poor are confined to a more narrow circle, yet within that circle lie most of the natural satisfactions, which, after all the refinements of art, are found to be the most genuine and true. In a state, therefore, where there is neither so much to be coveted on the one hand, nor to be dreaded on the other, as at first appears, how submissive ought we to be to the disposal of Providence! How temperate in our desires and pursuits! How much more attentive to preserve our virtue and to improve our minds, than to gain the doubtful and equivocal advantages of worldly prosperity!"

Proper time of Rising.—Among the curiosities of Apsley House, is the truckle bed in which the Duke of Wellington sleeps. "Why, it is so narrow," exclaimed a friend, "there is not even room to turn in it." "Turn in it!" cried his grace—"when a man begins to turn in his bed, it is time to turn out."

An Arabian Proverb.—Knowledge is a diadem to a young person, and a chain of gold about his neck.

MARRIAGES.

In McLean, on Sunday, July 14th, by Rev. W. Bullard, Mr. David Curtis, to Miss Melissa Allen.

In the town of Canajoharie, August 1st, by Rev. H. Belding, Mr. Austin J. Robertson, merchant of Sparta, Ala., to Miss Mary Coleman, of the former place.

In Leon, Cattaraugus county, July 23d, by Rev. T. C. Eaton, Mr. Joseph Daniels, to Miss Dene Elvira Barton, both of that town.

DEATHS.

In Bainbridge, July 26th, Mrs. Olive Huggins, aged 32 years. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the friends and relatives of the deceased, on Sunday, 28th, by the writer. H. Torrey.

In Taberg, Oneida county, on the 3d inst., of cancer, Benjamin Hyde, Esq., aged 82 years. He was an old resident, and a highly esteemed and intelligent citizen of that section, and died universally lamented. His sufferings, which were excruciating, and were out the strength of a healthy old age by their long continuance, were borne with that fortitude and resignation which Christian philosphy inspires in the strong mind, and to the last he failed not to thank God for his mercies in giving him kind and affectionate children and friends to minister to him in his trials. Thus lived, and thus died our venerable brother, professing "love to God, love to his family, and love to all mankind." His aged companion to whom he had been united more than half a century, still survives, and was able to follow his corpse to the meeting house on foot, though nearly 80 years old, and weighed down by affliction and failing health. He has left numerous descendants and many friends to cherish his memory with fond regard.

The funeral was attended on the 5th, in the Presbyterian meeting house, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to a large congregation of mourners, and sympathising friends and neighbors, by the writer, aided in the services by Rev. Mr. Hodges, Presbyterian. May they all be comforted by that faith which directed the deceased in virtue and sustained him in death. A. B. G.

In New-Hartford, on the 29th ult., Mr. Robert Gilmore, aged 68 years. Br. Gilmore was a firm believer in God's impartial grace, which he adorned with a well ordered life. For many years, infirmities increased upon him, and his last illness was long and painful, which caused him to desire anxiously to be with God and at rest, where pain, sorrow and death shall never more annoy. He has left a widow, a number of children and other relatives and friends to mourn his departure. Funeral on the 30th—sermon by A. B. G.

In Russia, on the 23d of July, Henry Clay, son of Willis and Mary A. Philleo, and adopted son of his grandfather, Darius Philleo, Esq., aged about 7 years. He was a remarkably active, sprightly, and interesting lad; and his death has produced a chasm in the fireside circle of his friends, which can never be filled. To his respected grandparents, who had fixed their hopes upon him as the stay and comfort of their declining years, his loss will be irreparable. But there is consolation for them in the promises of our Saviour, of a glorious reunion in a world of blissful immortality. Yea, though

"Cold in the dust this perished heart may lie,
That which warmed it once can never die.
That spark unburied in its mortal frame,
With living light, eternal and the same,
Shall beam on joy's interminable years,
Unveiled by darkness, unassuaged by tears."

D. D. T. M.

In Brockport, N. Y., on the 27th ult., Mr. Levi Sadler, father of Br. L. L. Sadler, of Geneva, aged 66 years. The subject of this notice was possessed of a strong, logical mind, and capable of deep thought, and profound study. He was led in early life by a careful search of the Scriptures, and an examination of popular religious views, to reject the cruel creeds and dogmas of men, and to adopt instead, the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation, through a risen and crucified Redeemer. Possessed of an ardent temperament, and an energetic, independent spirit, he was bold, fearless, uncompromising and zealous in the advocacy and propagation of his sentiments. Through the expressed desire and encouragement of some of the ministering brethren, he was induced to proclaim in a public manner the glories of God's heavenly grace. Circumstances prevented his devoting himself very fully to the work of the ministry. But he labored sufficiently in this department, to cause the Genesee Association to think it proper, to set him apart to the work of an evangelist, by solemn ordination. His earthly circumstances, however, prevented his ministering much subsequent to this event. After his son entered the ministry, he was often heard to say, he had cast "his mantle" on his successor, and henceforth should submit the business of the priest's office to his charge. He was an active, enterprising man—and often remarked, that when he should cease to be useful to himself and others, he should desire by some sudden visitation of Providence, to be taken to his home in heaven, in preference to a continuance on earth, a burthen to himself and others. He witnessed much hard fortune in life, which he bore with heroic fortitude and Christian resignation—and at last, when his work was done, and life had lost its charms, agreeably to his wishes, he was visited with the apoplexy, which terminated his mortal career.—Com.

In Manheim, of consumption, on the 2d inst., Mrs. Susan consort of Mr. C. D. Lyon, in the 25th year of her age.—The deceased bore her last illness with becoming fortitude and Christian resignation, retaining her mental faculties, until the last moments of her mortal existence. She died as she had lived, in the full assurance of the blessed immortality of a ransomed world. Her funeral was attended the following day, and a discourse delivered by the writer. J. D. Hicks.

"Search the Scriptures."—JOHN v: 39.

Our Lord Jesus Christ was the author of our text, and the Jews were the persons he addressed. As the books of the Old Testament were all the revelation which they had in possession at that time, and these were then properly the Scriptures, these and these alone must have been intended. We shall not, in this stage of our subject, attempt to prove that the obligation is equally binding upon us, and that it is equally necessary that we form an intimate acquaintance, both with the Scriptures of the Old Testament and the New. We think the necessity and the propriety of this course, will eventually be manifest to all. We do not say that the Scriptures are the only revelation which we have from God. He has exhibited his wisdom, his goodness and his power, in the living, moving, speaking world which surrounds us. We need not ascend up into heaven, or descend into the lower parts of the earth, to find evidences of a God, or to learn that his powers are infinite. Every object which surrounds us, from the mountain to the mole hill —from the grandest to the humblest of nature's works—are witnesses of the power, and the wisdom, and the goodness of their great Creator.

But how came we to form these conclusions and these conceptions of a God? Thousands have had these same works, these same evidences before them, and yet have drawn no such inferences.

The answer is ready. Revelation pointed us to God—taught us to look upon these things as the work of the all-wise, omnipotent Creator; and we found in them a confirmation, an assurance of the truth of Scripture, while the Scriptures, in turn, illustrated and explained the works of God.

In fact, without revelation, the book of nature, as it is called, had been a volume sealed to man. The former has been the key which unlocked the latter, exhibited it to the view of man in all its perfection, its glory, and its beauty, and enabled him to see that God was indeed a God of wisdom, of order, of harmony and love. You see that man is an inhabitant of earth. You see too, that he is subject to a law which he can not control. He is mortal, and must die. This, and a thousand evidences of a superior power, have convinced mankind in all ages, that they were the production of a power superior to themselves. Now among those who are destitute of revelation, or having it, deny its teachings, what account do we have of the origin of man? We answer, a thousand contradictory fables. Take the account of the creation as recorded in the Bible—take it, I say, and compare it candidly with any and all other accounts of man's origin ever given by man, and if you value truth or consistency, you must prefer the former.

But I am to consider that I address believers of the Scriptures—those who feel and acknowledge their dependence upon God—those who recognize the sacred volumes as a revelation from him, one which is able to make them wise unto salvation, and which contains rules for the regulation of our conduct in all the events and circumstances of life. It is a lamentable fact, brethren, that even among professed Christians, the Bible is either very little read, or else read much to very little purpose; for it is obvious to every man, even of limited information, that no one book so extensively circulated, is so little, so very imperfectly understood. Now there is somewhere a cause for this. I, it is true, may be incorrect in my opinions, still, in enforcing the duty of our text upon your consideration, I can not consistently, with my appreciation of duty, avoid noticing some of those reasons why men do not read the Word of God more, and why they do not understand better when they read.

If I were about to direct a person on his way, in a road where I had travelled, I should be likely, not only to give him information in relation to the route he should pursue, but also such cautions as my own experience or observation should dictate. If I had been misled from want of caution or deceptive appearances, or had seen others mistake the road at some one point, I should endeavor to give him such information as would prevent him from being turned aside from his route by similar causes.

This is the course I intend to pursue upon the present occasion. I have been some times a reader of the Bible, when I felt and knew that I did not understand it; and I supposed that I never should, until it pleased God to perform some thing he had left undone. I have read it, too, when I found little in it but seeming contradictions, and I have left it unread, because, to speak plainly, I hated to read it! I have seen and conversed with others in similar situations—have heard them express their opinions and feelings, and from these sources, have made up my mind in relation to the causes of men's indifference to the Scriptures—their want of understanding of the Bible, and their rejection of the Word of God.

One reason of the indifference of men to the Scriptures, and their dislike to the Bible, is, I believe, to be found in their early education.—You have all noticed how much children dislike study, as a general thing—especially studying what they do not understand—and how eagerly they engage in the ordinary sports of youth.—Now it is an incontrovertible fact, that the mind requires its exercise as well as the body; and if the exercises provided for the mind were as well adapted to its wants, and as judiciously selected, as bodily exercise is, the person would engage in it with corresponding eagerness. Let a man send his boys to the field to play ball, day after day in succession—let them be required to continue their sports without cessation, except for meals and sleep, and how long do you think it would be, before they would beg and entreat to go to school to study, or to labor upon the farm?—Take, yourself, a dictionary, or a city directory, and sit down and try how long you can amuse yourself by learning a succession of words or names. When you have become tired, throw it aside, and note the time that has elapsed. Try again the same experiment with some book which you understand, and which interests your feelings, and mark how long it will be before you become wearied. Now, a book which a child does not understand, is as barren of interest, as insipid, as tiresome, as disgusting to him, as a dictionary was to you.

Again—you do not expect that a child—a boy of ten or twelve years—will be able to perform as much labor in the field, as a full grown man.—Neither ought to expect that his mind will have the strength and capacity of maturer years.—Therefore a study may have interest for you, which has none for him.

Once more. I think it very probable that you might, for a week, or a day, interest yourself in the house of the President of the United States, in viewing the house, its different apartments, its furniture, pictures, etc., etc.. pass the time very agreeably. But let bolts, and bars, and locks be put to the doors, and I doubt not you would be making efforts to get out, in less than an hour. Well—the secret of all this is, you like to be led, and dislike to be driven.

Still, again—you have appetite, and perhaps prefer a particular kind of food. You would, however, dislike very much to be continually kept upon it, or to eat an excessive quantity at a meal. Let me also say, that the mind has its wants—its appetites, if you please—but still they are limited, and demand variety. Now, for one moment look at the course pursued with children in their religious instruction. The Bible is put into a child's hands, and he is commanded to commence and read it through in course, or required to read a certain number of verses or chapters, some where, every day. Reading is what is required—but understanding is another question. Now suppose that the child absolutely reads as is required of him. He performs it as a task; it is, in fact, to him, a task of the most irksome kind. He reads, just as you could con over so many words in a dictionary—anxious to get through, that he may mix in the sports and plays of his companions. Soon the child begins to view every hour and moment devoted to reading as so much subtracted from his time for amusement, and actually wishes there was no Bible for him to study! I have known instances (more than one) where a child has been compelled, as a punishment for a fault, to commit a certain number of verses to memory, from the New Testament!—And can you wonder that children thus dealt with, should regard a similar task as a punishment, under other circumstances? In looking at the first lesson selected for Sunday school children, some time since, I found that the first chapter of John had been selected for them to commit to memory. It begins—"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." Certainly there is very little in the first part of the chapter in the least graduated to the capacities of a child; and it was probably selected, not on account of its interest, but because it furnished alleged proof of a feature of the doctrine of the trinity. Now the doctrine itself, is, by the acknowledgement of its advocates, a mystery—incomprehensible—and this we may say, fairly represents the course pursued, as well as the character of the instruction communicated. So far as the child is concerned, it is to him a mystery, and the result of his education is generally the committing of a certain number of incomprehensible passages to memory, without any knowledge of the beauty and harmony of Christianity as a perfect system.

But it may be said, that unwearied pains are often made use of by parents, in order to explain what is read by their children. I know it. But how is the parent to explain to the child, that which he does not himself understand? This, I venture to say, is the case with at least a majority of parents who pursue this course.

I know from experience, that when I discovered what I believed was inconsistent, or attempted to obtain information in relation to some of the dark points of Calvinism, my inquiries were generally met with the assurance, that the carnal mind could not understand these things—or astonishment was visibly manifested, that I should presume to question any thing which God had revealed, and that was so plainly taught in the Assembly's Shorter Catechism. I would not have any one imbibe the impression that I am averse to a child's reading the Scriptures, or to his receiving religious instruction. No. I would as soon advocate the propriety of their being brought up in ignorance, because schools had been mismanaged. The truth is, the mind requires exercise. The religious feelings implanted in the human bosom, will have scope. Let them then have a right direction—let the Bible be put into the hands of the child—let him be directed, from time to time, to such portions as he can understand, with the conviction, that a little read and understood, is better than much committed to memory, when he is ignorant of its meaning. Give the young the means of religious instruction—give them such means as are adapted to their capacities—encourage inquiry, listen to their objections, manifest less anxiety to indoctrinate them in particular views and opinions, and more, that they may be upright, understanding Christians. People may speculate as they will upon the causes of infidelity—may talk as they will about men's hating the Scriptures on account of their doctrines—but I never, as yet, knew a man who liked to read any book that he did not understand; and I feel morally certain, that no method could have been adopted, better calculated to induce men to hate the Scriptures, than the course which has been pursued with many of the children in our country.

I lament the indifference among mankind in regard to religion—I deplore the disposition which is leading many to scepticism—but truth requires that I say, that I am convinced that much of this is to be justly attributed to the injudicious method which has been too generally pursued with the youth of the land.

I would have the youth obey the injunction of our text, and "Search the Scriptures"; for I am confident that if there be indifference among them in relation to this important subject, it arises from the errors of education—from opinions grounded in mistaken ideas of the doctrines and truths communicated in the sacred volume. I can well remember when I thought that, to be religious, was to be gloomy, unsocial, and unhappy—to engage in tasks and duties of the most unpleasant kind—to pursue a path planted with thorns, and to deny myself all innocent mirth and pleasurable enjoyment. But, alas, how much did I misconceive and misunderstand the character of my heavenly Father! He promised peace in his service—assured me that wisdom's ways were ways of pleasantness, and I foolishly sought it in violating his laws—in being the author of my own misery, and then fretted against his providence, because I was disappointed! We do not see a person seeking enjoyment, by foolishly thrusting his hand or arm into the heated and glowing embers. And why? We answer, because he has learned that to do this, would be to burn himself and cause him pain. Now, who would say, that it would be a hardship to render obedience to a law which should require him to abstain from making himself miserable? We answer, no one. Yet such is, in reality, the language of every one, who supposes his pleasures are to be circumscribed by obeying Jehovah. God, my friends, is not a tyrant! He asks no service from you, without some intention, and the object of demanding your service is your good. He requires you to abstain from nothing, but what your own good judgment would lead you to acknowledge you must abstain from, to secure present enjoyment. If you do not already know this, I would beseech you to "search the Scriptures," and see if these things are not so—see if you have not misconceived his character, and done injustice to your heavenly Father.

Very many, in reading the Scriptures, err from want of method. They read a little here, to-day—a little there to-morrow; and next day, a little somewhere else. They do not take into consideration, that one part of the Scriptures was addressed to one people, and another to another—that their situations and circumstances were often different, and required a different course of instruction.

Again—men have been informed that, upon religious subjects, they had no right to reason—they must receive them just as they were, without question. But how is a man to read, think, or judge, without the exercise of his reasoning faculties? Let him lay them aside, and what is he? An idiot, a brute!—no, not a brute, but far beneath him, for be it known to all men, that even brutes reason. Then, talk not of a man's laying aside his reason, and believing. You might, as consistently, call upon a dead man to converse, or walk with you.

It is the part of a reasonable man to do business methodically—with some kind of system. We will suppose, then, you wish to be informed in relation to the character of God. You take the Bible and learn, that God is almighty in power, infinite in wisdom, in goodness, in justice, in mercy and in truth. Now you have a standard by which you may try every doubtful or questionable passage in the Scriptures—for no one can be so interpreted as, in the least, to infringe upon the character of Jehovah. Suppose, for an instance, you should find some passage in your reading, which should be claimed as proof of the final defeat of the Almighty. You try it by the standard. God is almighty in power—almighty power can not be defeated—for there can be no power except what emanated from, and is inferior to him. The question is settled, and a new meaning sought for the disputed passage. I might pursue this subject farther, by supposing cases which you must try by the goodness, the wisdom, justice and mercy of God; but I will leave it, remarking, that it must ever be remembered, that the attributes of God so harmonize, that he is just without being unmerciful, and merciful without being unjust.

The character of God—the nature and object of his moral government—the intention and end of the mission of the Saviour—man's duty, and final destiny, constitute the important and great leading truths of revelation. These are such as every one is interested in; and a knowledge of these truths may be acquired from the Scriptures in far less time than what is generally spent in in idleness, every season. Do not understand me, my friends, to say, that a man may acquire all the knowledge he will ever need in any given time. I mean, that he can acquire sufficient knowledge to have an understanding faith upon these subjects; and when he has done this, I have no fears but what he will make the word of God the man of his counsel—it will be a new book to him, and he will wonder how he could ever have read so much of the goodness and love of God, and never have observed it before! Children do not like to read books that they do not understand, and men are but children of larger growth. But let them once begin to learn, begin to understand and feel interested, and they do not need driving or urging to the task.

One reason among the many, why the Scriptures are not read more, and better understood when read, is to be found in the fact, that very many expect, that at some favorable period, God will so open their understandings, that in a very short time, and with very little trouble on their part, they shall be able to know all that is necessary to be known, (at least all that is necessary to be known to get to heaven,) which seems to be the alpha and omega of their labors. There never was an idea more injurious to the interests of mankind, than the idea of the miraculous interposition of divine Providence at this age of the world. I firmly believe in an overruling, superintending Providence, but yet every person knows that the age of miracles passed about eighteen centuries since.

It is true that in the apostolic age, the preachers of our Lord's Gospel spoke with new tongues, so that the dwellers of different countries heard in their own language of the wonderful works of God. God listened to their prayers, and when they laid hands on the sick they were healed. But who performs such miracles now? We answer, no one. The truth is, the age of miracles terminated with the circumstances which called for them. If a man now wishes to preach in Greek, he must first learn Greek; and notwithstanding the much which has been said about men preaching the Gospel who were ignorant, they have, by their ignorance, convinced mankind that they could communicate what they had learned, and nothing more.

Suppose, brethren, that a man should neglect to till the soil, and sow the seed, in the proper season to commit it to the bosom of the earth, and should then set his empty casks in the field and pray to God to fill them. Men would charitably conclude, that the person was insane. For no one would suppose that one in sound mind, could expect that God would work a miracle to encourage indolence. I would ask, can a person in this land of Bibles, surrounded by the means of instruction, suppose that God will miraculously reward him for disobeying the solemn injunction of our text?

I readily admit that some have greater capacities for learning than others. Some have a greater aptitude for teaching—greater powers of oratory—and some less. But if it be a miracle that men of one profession are thus constituted and gifted, it is equally a miracle in others. In truth, brethren, you have the Scriptures, and you cannot understand them without searching, any more than you can understand science without study.

Another reason why men do not understand the Scriptures, is, because they do not search them for that purpose. Such a declaration may appear, at first sight, rash and unwarrantable. Very many in our land, read the Scriptures very little, if any, after they arrive at manhood or womanhood—until they become members of a particular sect.—Then, when they have joined the church, professed its faith, and most solemnly obligated themselves to believe and defend it—then they begin to read. If their minds were not made up in relation to the teachings of the word of God, they solemnly subscribed to a falsehood. If they were, I need not say, that very many have decided a most solemn question with far less consideration than they would give to a project requiring the expenditure of ten dollars. But the question is decided—the Bible is read—and no reasonable person can wonder that the judgment should be biassed by the force of these previous opinions. I have been frequently pained by the declarations of individuals of this class, and their sweeping denunciations of all who presumed to disagree with them, or question their theory. Their misquotations of the Bible—their utter ignorance of revelation, their knowledge extending often not even to a defence of a single article of their faith, is calculated to excite no very pleasing emotions in the mind of a lover of Christianity. But while they are so deficient in a knowledge of the truth, we cannot anticipate any very bright exhibitions of the graces or the charity of a Christian faith. To such persons we have only to say, "search the Scriptures"; and if it should please God to incline their hearts unto wisdom, we feel confident that they would be less dogmatical in their assertions, and more charitable to all who differ from them.

Brethren, It is our duty to "search the Scriptures." When I say that it is our duty, I would be understood that there are good reasons why we should do it, and that we shall reap a reward for our labors. We, it is true, understand the moral government of God—realize that it is paternal—that he is our Father, and the Father of all intelligencies. We regard him as infinite in perfection, and believe that his name and nature are are LOVE. We look upon Jesus Christ as our Saviour, and the Saviour of all mankind. We look back to God as our origin, and to heaven as our peaceful and eternal home. We have been taught, too, from the blessed pages of revelation, that God rules and governs in the earth—that his kind and overruling providence continually watches over his creatures for good—that even our sorrows have been, by his kindly hand, tempered in the soft fountain of pity, and are evidences of a Father's care and a Father's love. But all we have learned of God—all our studies and discoveries; serve to remind us that there is an infinite field before us—one which we can contemplate with joy unspeakable while life shall last, and in which we may range throughout the wasteless ages of eternity. But, brethren, we did not make these discoveries without exertion, and exertion is the price of new and higher attainments. We need the knowledge which we have acquired, for our own consolation, our own comfort and support. We need it, too, in the instruction of our children; for, be it known to all, if we neglect them, there are those who will take advantage of our slothfulness, to sow the tares of error in their tender minds. We have the means—abundant means, and these, judiciously applied, will render the study of the Scriptures interesting and pleasurable to the youth of our families. We need this knowledge, too, for other purposes. We are, as Christians, commanded to be always ready to give a reason for our hope. The circumstances of the world around us, as well as our situation, require an intimate knowledge of the Scriptures. Assertions may pass with some, as scriptural reasons; but from us, men ask evidence, and we expect to give it. More than this—we are often compelled, not only to defend our own faith, but also to rectify the misquotations of those who assail us.

Brethren, these considerations, and a multitude of others which might be named, admonish us that it is our duty—to ourselves, to the cause of of Christianity, and to the world—to "search the Scriptures."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER EIGHT.

JUDGES.—This book has its name from its containing the history of transactions, during the government of the Israelites by temporary judges, before that of kings; from the death of Joshua to the time of Samuel. It comprises the history of about three hundred years, and is thought to have been written by Samuel. It was evidently written before the taking of Jerusalem by David, as may be inferred from chapter i: 21.

Judges, ix: 23.—"Then God sent an evil spirit between Abimeleck and the men of Shechem,"&c.

We here find the first mention of an evil spirit. Every thing being by the sacred writers ascribed to the providence of God, this dissention between Abimeleck and the Shechemites, is said to have been produced by his sending an evil spirit among them. We are not to infer from this, that it was actually a personal evil being which was employed on that occasion. For bad men are very apt to quarrel without any supernatural instigation.

Judges, 15th and 16th chapters.—There are various opinions respecting the account contained in these chapters of the exploits of Samson.—That there is some mistake in the translation is generally conceded by the learned. Dr. Priestly says, respecting the fox story, that the word translated fox should have been translated jackalls, which he says were very numerous in that country, and may be caught in great numbers. Others are of the opinion that Samson took two sheaves of wheat, and tied them together, and put a firebrand between them, and threw them among the standing corn or grain of the Philistines. It is said that two sheaves of wheat, tied in this manner, were called foxes.

In regard to the one thousand men, said to have been slain by Samson with the jaw-bone of an ass, Priestly says, "It should be—'he smote them, killing some and dispersing the rest.'"

The great destruction of the Philistines, which took place at the falling of the temple, (for such the building was,) is not improbable; as these temples were something constructed so as to be made to rest on two pillars, the removal of which, would cause the whole to instantly fall to the ground. Pliny tells of a theatre in Rome, which was so constructed as to depend on one hinge; so that he wondered at the madness of the people in venturing into a place, the safety of which was so uncertain. Had that hinge failed, he says "more people would be killed than at the battle of Cannæ." Shaw says that he saw, in Algiers, buildings in the form of a large pent-house, supported by only one or two pillars; on which were many hundreds of people, diverting themselves with exhibitions in the court below.

It appears on the whole, that Samson was a man endowed with great muscular strength; of which his killing the lion and carrying off the gates of Gaza, is abundant proof. But the common or vulgar opinion, that his strength lay in his hair, (as it is expressed,) is certainly erroneous; although when his hair was cut off, his strength departed. But this only proves, that the Divine Being from whom he derived his strength, saw fit, when this was done, to take it from him. It did not return again with the growth of his hair, as some suppose; as may be seen by consulting chapter 16th, verse 28th.

TWO INCONSISTENCIES.

BY REV. O. WILCOX.

To my Partialist brethren I will say, do you not think that the person who professes to believe in a God that is good unto all, and that will forever bless all his children, is inconsistent and even hypocritical, when he calls on this same God to damn or send to hell, a part of them?

The answer will be, "yea." Let me now turn to my Universalist brethren and say, Do you not think that there is great want of consistency, and a show of hypocrisy in the conduct of those persons who profess to believe in a God that has made a hell in which he is determined to torment some of his children, without mercy and without end? And still they are laboring, beseeching and praying this same God to save all. Here again the answer will be, "yes." That there is inconsistency in the profession and practice of both these classes of individuals, will, I think, be allowed by all candid persons.

The former believe God to be too good to answer their requests for him to damn to hell those that they call on him to send there; and therefore they act the part of hypocrites in making the request. And the latter believe him to be too bad to save those whom they pray him to save; and therefore their prayers are faithless. In short, the one says, in effect, if I could persuade God to be as good as myself, he would convert and save all those poor, miserable beings. And the other says, if he was as passionate and revengeful as myself, he would damn a large portion of them. Now I wish to propose a remedy for both these inconsistencies. Let those professed Universalists believe in and worship the Partialist representations of God, and then they can have the pleasure of believing in a God who is as bad as themselves, and can call on him to damn their neighbors in good faith. And let those better hearted Partialists believe in, and worship God, as set forth by Universalists, and then they can have the pleasure of praying "in faith, nothing doubting," for the salvation of all men.—Brethren, try the exchange, and if you reap no other advantage from it, you will have the pleasure of being consistent in your profession and practice.

QUERIES.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

If the heathen, who die ignorant of the Gospel and a knowledge of the truth, are saved; when are they brought to this knowledge and changed from hatred to love—from wickedness to holiness? Are there idolators in heaven? If not, where are they made acquainted with the living God, and born of the spirit?

Do Limitarians believe in the future happiness of those who live and die heathens?

If they do not, are they not damning them for not doing impossibility—for not believing in Christ, of whom they have not heard, and for not accepting his salvation, when it was never offered them?

If they do, are they not criminals in sending the Gospel to them, and thereby giving them an opportunity to reject to their eternal ruin? Are they not cursing them with the means of their damnation?

THE DEVIL.

Many people have supposed that the Devil was once an angel of light—an inhabitant of heaven—a holy messenger of the Most High, and that he rebelled against the Almighty, fell from heaven and became a Devil. Now the Bible says, he was "a liar from the beginning," and that "there was no truth in him." If, therefore, he sinned "from the beginning," how could he once have been an angel of light? And if he was once an holy intelligence, must he not have been faithful and true, and the record false, which says, "there was no truth in him."

EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.

In Jude, verse 7th, Sodom and Gomorrah are represented as being "Set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."

This language is supposed to refer to another state of existence; but that such is not the reference is plain from one fact. In 2 Peter ii: 6, we are told that those cities were "an ensample unto them that after should live ungodly." If eternal fire means endless misery, how could it be an ensample unto them that should after live ungodly?

Indeed the term example necessarily implies an after period, in which the effects of witnessing it may be realized. But eternal fire, if it mean endless misery, can have no afterward; and of course can not be an example. Hence, as eternal fire, in the above passage, was an example, and an example, too, to them that should AFTER live ungodly, it follows that endless misery can not be intended.

A HINT TO UNIVERSALIST MINISTERS.

There are several townships adjacent to, and on the confines of, the counties of Erie, Warren and Crawford, Pa., many of whose inhabitants, we think, are now hungry for the true bread of life. And though some of them have never heard the sound of a Universalist sermon, still, doubtless, near one half of their inhabitants are friendly to, and many we trust are firm believers in, the blessed doctrine. And though we are sure "it is the Lord's doings, and is wonderful in our eyes," yet we believe in a still further agency. Our means are limited, and we have as yet no meeting house, but as we have school houses, barns, and shady groves, sufficiently spacious to contain us all; if preaching the Gospel to the poor is considered a miracle, let it no longer be said that the day of miracles has entirely gone by.

MARRIAGE.

BY REV. L. L. SADLER.

The following strictures on one of my articles on Marriage, published several weeks ago, would have appeared earlier but for their length, and my labors in preparing the Register. It will be seen that Br. Sadler has entirely mistaken the spirit and intent of the article, and has, therefore, replied as if his own conscience condemned his celibacy!!! I will add a few notes, as brief as possible, to save a formal reply, and, perhaps, a controversy on this subject. A. B. G.]

Br. GROSH—It seems that you and Br. Austin have commenced a crusade against the bachelor community, and are determined, if possible, to coerce them by rigorous measures to let go their hold of their native birthright—a state of celibacy. And from the profuse manner in which you deal out your censures and denunciations, one would be led to suppose you had long been schooled in the condemnatory institutions of Partialism, where it is practicable to reproach and villify such as do not come up to the standard there furnished. It is not enough that they are deprived of the joys, the pleasures, the bliss, you so feelingly and eloquently represent as associated with the connubial state—it is not enough to be doomed to the lonely, anti-social, friendless, splenetic, state of unnatural singleness—living without object and without aim—strangers to friendship, and the better sentiments of sympathy and affection; and left at last to pine, sicken, wither and die, unpitied, unwept, and unmourned—but they must be branded with infamy, anathematized with many an odious epithet, and held up to public view as a spectacle

> "——— For contemptuous scorn
> To point her slow unmoving finger at."

If there be any class of people, deserving the sympathy and pity of their fellows, it is the celibates, allowing your statements true, concerning the superior advantages of the marriage state over that of a life of celibacy. But instead of mercy and fraternal friendliness, they are doomed to meet at your hands cold severity and bitter reproaches. From your humane spirit, exhibited in remarks offered on prison discipline, and on the treatment due sinners, I had expected that a milder, gentler spirit would be manifest, when those delicate matters of social affinity, concerning which everyone supposes himself his master, were made the topic of remark and discussion. "It is easier to preach than to practice;" and we find ourselves very often deviating from the rules prescribed to others. "Happy is the man that doeth not that which he disalloweth."(a)

I would not be understood as entering my protest against the marriage institution, or as wishing to gainsay, or controvert, any thing you have offered in regard to the nature, value, tendency and design of such connexion. And had it not been for the attempt to heap opprobrium on the heads of such as have, from considerations best known to themselves, stood aloof from the entanglements of wedded life, I should have rested in silence.—But when censorious calumny marks an individual his victim, or labors to bring public opinion to bear in sneering frowns on any respectable class of community, is it not humanity, is it not justice, to stand out in defence of the injured and abused? Who can read sentences like the following, and not think one justifiable in pleading the cause of the offended party?

"Abounding as matrimony does, with numerous advantages and beneficial incentives; and with so great an amount of social and domestic enjoyments, it is hardly supposable that any person can be found who voluntarily abstains from the marriage state. Yet many there are who exhibit this eccentricity. By way of distinction, they are denominated 'Old Bachelors.' They are anomalies—exceptions from all earthly existences—a kind of monstrosity, put forth through some unaccountable freak of nature—a species of Ishmaelites, 'whose hands are against every man, and every man's hand against them.' The contemner of woman, the voluntary bachelor stands before the world as one who violates the laws of nature, disregards the commands of God, and opposes the designs of his Maker in the creation of the human race."—Austin.

"My bachelor brother, I do not mean to be uncourteous, or to press you too hard on this delicate subject; but be sure your own conscience condemns you not, before you ask others to acquit you of such a highly compounded SIN, as is living alone."(b)—Grosh.

Such is the wholesale denunciation—such the "courtesy" the bachelor receives from Hymen's votaries—such the condemnation pronounced, without regard to their apologies or pleas of defence. Surely, this is a kind of Catholic, inquisitorial, summary way of disposing of offending brethren. The necessity and propriety of putting forth these essays on the subject of matrimony, is to be found, I suppose, in the declaration incorporated in your first number—"the number of celibates is too great among both sexes in our land." And hence means must be adopted to liminish that number, and secure some important accessions to the multitude of worshippers who bow before the altar of Hymen.

I can not agree with you in this statement.—That some might be happier, more virtuous and useful, had they married in early life, I am not disposed to deny. But then, again, what an incalculable amount of suffering and misery might have been prevented in our world, had multitudes who have entered the connubial state, abstained from such alliances! How many a hapless wife, and poverty-stricken, unfortunate husband—how many a sorrowing mother and care-worn father—how many a child, and destitute, heart-broken widow, would have been spared the bitter pangs that have called up the deep drawn sigh, suffused the cheeks with tears, and rent the bosom with anguish, had not the relative ties been created by marriage! The fact is, marriage, like liberty, is one of Heaven's greatest blessings, when man is properly qualified and circumstanced to appreciate and enjoy it, but a curse when incompetent for its duties and responsibilities. And it must be obvious to every observing, reflecting mind, that there are more who enter the marriage state, incapacitated to appreciate and enjoy it, and to discharge its numerous obligations, than there are who abstain from such connexions, that would be bettered by the change, all things considered. There should be more celibates instead of less.(c)

The young are apt to be inconsiderate in regard to this most important circumstance of human life. They are generally fanciful and romantic in their views, impressions and imaginings concerning the conjugal state. And the charms, the fascinations, the enchantments, that are thrown around wedded life, associated with existing, instinctive impulses, renders man much disposed to change his condition from celibacy to wedlock. The youth look on the married state, much as an individual looks on a picture, who fixes his eye intently on the light and sunny spots, and does not notice the darker shades with which they are contrasted; and consequently, are extremely liable to become enamored, and rush precipitately onward to secure possession without calculating consequences. There seems to be need of cautioning and admonishing the young to ponder well the paths of their feet, to sit down first and count the cost, before they engage in an enterprize that fixes their destiny for life, rather than to urge the few in "single blessedness," to worship at the altar of Hymen, or to denounce them as reprehensible, odious and sinful.(d)

Br. Austin says, "It is hardly supposable that any persons can be found who voluntarily abstain from the marriage state." If this be true, it is probable that those who do so, feel constrained to do it reluctantly, by the circumstances of the case. If they bring their feelings to yield to the voice of reason, conscience and judgment, they are worthy of all praise, and should be applauded rather than condemned.(e)

It would seem you would have us believe, that it is the duty of bachelors to secure wives, even if apprehensive of trouble and disaster on the stormy sea of life, so as to have sharers of their sufferings. This is indeed humane! It is an ennobling sentiment! Were an individual to fail in business, he would like to have his neighbors involved in the same calamity, so that they could sympathise with him in his misfortunes! To know that a dear wife and a family of lovely children were brought to participate with me my trials, and sufferings, and cross providences, and afflictions, would but augment my wo. Were it not for these I might endure the shock, but how witness their distresses also, and survive the pelt-ings of the pitiless storm? Demons may exult and be glad that others suffer with them, and share of their miseries; but even "the rich man in hell" had too much humanity left to desire that his brethren should come to his place of torment, to partake of his tortures, and to sympathise in his distresses. And though I am fond of sympathy, I would have it come from a friend, that can feel for the afflicted, and be excluded from a lot in such an inheritance. Rather than involve others in my misfortunes, I would "tread the wine press of the wrath of God, alone." But you tell us, that the exercise of sympathy affords delightful satisfaction to the one who exercises it. This is true, but attended, in cases of want and difficulty, with a superabundant amount of pain. Who do you suppose would link destinies with another merely for that privilege, or even with the expectation of such a fate? You think that redoubled efforts would be made to rise again, where the interests of a family were at stake.—This is probable. But ten chances to one he had not fallen, were it not for the additional care and expenses of the family. And if he had, how trifling the consequence, compared with that which involves the fate of numbers. Besides, it would

(a) "Open rebuke is better than secret love," and our Saviour rebuked even sharply the open, deliberate transgressor—of course, with intent to benefit him—yes, even "a whip made of small cords" may sometimes be salutary. If I have done worse in means or in spirit than my Master, let me be rebuked; not otherwise. I feel unconscious of any deviation from a Christian spirit, or a good intent, in this matter.

(b) Br. Austin speaks thus only of the "voluntary" celibates—the "contemners of woman"—evidently meaning those whose circumstances and opportunities permitted marriage, but who voluntarily, deliberately, or out of contempt for woman, abstained from it. Does Br. Sadler mean to defend and approbate such "monstrosities"? I think not. He must have misunderstood Br. Austin, as he has misunderstood me. I adhere to my assertion. (But why does Br. S. omit "my maiden sister"? Does he defend the bachelors—the "stronger sex," only? This is not gallant, to say the least!) Celibacy is contrary to nature, and requires strong and particular circumstances to justify it. All celibates should therefore be sure that their own consciences justify them, before they ask others to excuse them. Br. Sadler would not call this "wholesale denunciation....without regard to their apologies or pleas of defence," if his sensitive feelings had not led him to take it closer to his own bosom than I laid it—i. e., if his own conscience does not condemn him. All apologies admitted to be invalid by their own consciences, should not be regarded by others.

(c) Quite eloquent! But remember, good brother of mine, that the evils of celibacy are its legitimate fruits—its necessary and natural results; whereas those you recount as those of matrimony, are not the necessary and natural results of marriage, but of the abuse of it, or of the neglect of other duties. To all such we may say, "these duties ye should have performed, and not have left marriage unperformed." Yourself, then, being judge, celibacy is the cause of evils connected with it, whereas marriage may have evils connected with it, but they belong to other causes.

(d) Good! This extreme, (precipitancy,) is to celibacy, as too much zeal is to total indifference—it is hard choosing between two such great evils.

(e) I have set this misapprehension of Br. Austin's language, right in note b.

not require as much exertion to retrieve his broken fortunes with none to provide for but himself, as it would had he others to attend to.(f)

It seems to me improper for a person to take on himself responsibilities and obligations he is incompetent to discharge. And if a man have not prospective means for providing for the wants of a family, ought he to adopt measures for possessing one?

Again, I suppose you would not be understood, that marriage would be conducive to the promotion of human happiness, unless love—deep, ardent, devoted LOVE, cemented the union. Now, how many instances are there in the world, of individuals who have looked in vain for objects of interest, to whom they would bestow their heart's best affections—how many, of persons who have been riveted by ties of strongest attachment to the objects of their choice, and have had their hopes blighted by the samiel blast of disappointment, that left no substitute to fill the place? how many, of those that yield their hearts to others and are doomed to be unloved in turn, yet care for none besides? And are these to be blamed and spurned, because so unfortunate as not to be able to answer their wishes—and henceforth prefer to remain as they are, rather than to change their condition under existing circumstances! I had hoped for better things.(g)

I do not think the case an extraordinary one, that would justify an individual in abstaining from marriage. I once knew of an individual who lived a bachelor for the sole reason, that he thought it probable if he had a family, he might rear children to immortal misery. He could not bear the thought, and chose to live alone.—

(f) This whole paragraph is a singular (but doubtless an unintentional) perversion of my meaning—I think, of my language. I certainly did not mean to urge the consideration of a wife's sympathy, as a reason why the bachelor should get a companion in his sufferings, merely; but, as there is more happiness than misery in nearly, if not quite, every one's life—as the single life is, in my opinion, contrary to religion and nature, and therefore more miserable than the married state—and as the blessings of life are doubled by being shared with a companion, whereas suffering is lessened by being thus shared—therefore, I hold that the fear of involving a woman in our sufferings, is not, of itself, a valid excuse for not marrying—in other words, for not making her a sharer in our, and ourselves a sharer in her, more frequent and greater happiness—for not saving her and ourselves from the unnatural and more miserable condition of merely "single blessedness"—for not doubling her and our happiness by sharing it with each other, and for not lessening her and our own misery by mutual sympathy and mutual encouragement and aid. And singular views of God's goodness, must that Universalist have, who will deny my premises; or of logic, who will admit the premises, and deny my conclusions!—The "rich man in hell" suffered the pains of guilt, not of misfortune; the case is not in point, therefore. So far as the outward pains were concerned, I would say, if the wife of my bosom, and the pledges of our love go to an endless hell, I had RATHER be with them in their suffering, than be saved from them! Myself, then, being the judge, the sharing of their sufferings is a happier lot, than a selfish exemption from them. Every devoted wife and mother will say the same—and especially will she declare so, when merely occasional and temporal sufferings (which she can lessen and aid to remove) are concerned. As to the latter part of the paragraph, facts are better than theories; and though theory declares that it will "not require as much exertion to retrieve" a single man's "broken fortunes with none to provide for but himself, as it would, had he others to attend to;" yet facts (as admitted by Washington Irving, himself a bachelor) prove, that the single man does not make the exertion a married man will make, and therefore he fails oftener than the married man, because "he has none to provide for but himself."

(g) This is wide of the mark. If their own consciences excuse them, they may ask others to excuse them. As to the disappointed in this romantic love—let each bachelor thus disappointed, seek out a maid similarly lovelorn, to sympathise with him. "Pity is akin to love." My reputation as a prophet on the issue, that they will not long remain bachelor and maid! Seriously, the cases cited, are very—very few—and they scarcely ever survive to become old maids and old bachelors.—The heart that is tough enough not to break, will generally bear a second bending!

His motives were pure and benevolent; and of course justifiable in the course he pursued. And so would be any man, who should refrain from entering the marriage state, if apprehensive by so doing he should bring trouble on himself, and rear up children in ignorance, poverty and disgrace.

It could not be a duty for the soldiery and seamen to obtain wives, when they must constantly peril their lives—be most of the time from home, and unable from existing circumstances to protect their families and provide for their wants. Neither could it be for others, whose situation and condition in life were unfavorable to such cares and responsible duties.(h)

But to come a little nearer home. When a young minister of our denomination looks about him, and sees many a father in Israel, and superannuated preacher of the Gospel, "who has fought the good fight, finished his course and kept the faith," and who, by the most rigid system of economy, has sustained himself and family hitherto, now dependent on the cold charities of the world, and left to beg, to starve, or to die unregarded—when he sees others, who might be useful in the high vocation to which they are called, compelled to abandon the ministry in order to provide for the wants of their dependants—when he beholds others obtaining credit for like purposes, and lastly doomed to lose their reputation for want of means to pay their debts, and with it their usefulness in their profession—when he sees the widows of deceased brethren, who once labored successfully for the good of Zion, in a state of want, and seeking in vain for help, would he not be justifiable in the perpetration of the "highly compounded sin of living alone?"(i)

"It is enough that the servant is as his Lord. Jesus Christ has left an example, that we should follow his steps." But "in carrying out the designs of God, in his creation," he did not marry. And shall ministers be more perfect than their Master?(j) Paul has probably given as good counsel as any man can give on this subject; and he advises in very strong language, celibacy as preferable to the conjugal state. If it be said in reply, it was on account of the perilous posture of affairs then existing—I have only to remark, this is my plea.(k) And if an individual thinks he sees a storm ahead, and he is afraid of breakers, if he puts out to sea on the ocean of matrimony, let him be prudent and remain in the port of celibacy, without being subject to the taunts and jeers of those who have stronger vessels with which to buffet the storm. And while our clergy are so circumstanced, that they can barely live during their health and height of usefulness, let not one brother find fault with another, because he chooses to imitate Paul, rather than sacrifice his profession on the altar of domestic felicity, or suffer a dear family to come to poverty and misery!!!

(h) To please Br. Sadler, I will excuse all bachelor soldiers and sailors; (who are not free agents in this matter; as their country does not permit them to perform the duties of the married life;) and all old bachelors who are afraid that their children will be the devil's children. I do not suppose his conscience will ever urge this plea!

(i) In this case the fault lieth at the door of his congregation. Woe unto them, for all the happiness they prevent to him, and (through his increased efficiency by the aid of a wife) to themselves and society around—and for all the misery caused by their penuriousness, and indifference to human good, and their pastor's increased welfare and usefulness!

(j) If Br. Sadler will show that he expects to travel in his Master's footsteps in not having any home, in all his trials, and to Calvary, this plea may answer—if not, 'twas wrong to quote this Scripture on this subject; for every disciple of Jesus had better turn Shaking Quaker at once.

(k) Well done, Br. S.! I am glad to find the "I" and "my" plainly set forth. It is better than a mere defence of others. But I am sorry that you see such "perilous times" ahead as Paul and the early Christians had to pass through. As to all that follows, I can only say—"See that your own consciences do not condemn you, before you ask others to excuse you." For if your own consciences condemn you not, you should not feel very sensitively the fault finding of others; who in that case, will have no right to condemn you. A. B. G.

JESUS "HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL."—NO. IV.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

Without adverting to other particular instances of actual impression made by the teachings of Jesus, let us now turn our attention to the instructions themselves, as preserved to us in the Gospel record. They will prove even to a demonstration, that "he hath done all things well." In his teachings all mankind are considered as the offspring of one common Parent, members of one common family, and heirs alike of the same glorious and happy destiny. In his instructions there is no exclusiveness. They are designed for all, of every age, of every rank and condition.—The virtuous may there go and learn that the reward of obedience is holy peace, and perfect love, and heavenly joy in the soul. The vicious may there read their guilt and condemnation—may there learn that the gnawing worm, and the consuming fire of a guilty conscience, are inseparable attendants on vice, and are ever sounding in the ears of the votary of sin "the requium of departed joys," and the knell of faded peace and waning happiness. He may there read also—in that beautiful parable of the "Prodigal Son"—the pardon and peace that await the humble and penitent, and, perchance, be induced to return and walk in the blissful paths of virtue, obedience, and peace.

And most beautifully did Jesus reveal unto us the unity, the spirituality, and the benignant character of the great Creator. He who was the "one Lord" of the Hebrews, then became the God of the whole earth. And Jesus unfolded in the most happy manner the supremacy of his nature, the universality of his goodness, and the impartial benignity of his providential dominion. And how did he blend the majesty of him "who upholds all things by the word of his power," with the kindest condescension, by declaring that the sparrow's flight or fall is ordered by his directing hand, and that even "the very hairs of our head are all numbered."

And then, he was the first and best Teacher of the universal paternity, the boundless love and unfailing mercy of God. Oh, how much do we not owe to him for declaring and making known that we have all one Father in heaven, who watches over us with a parent's tenderness and love; who is constantly showering down unnumbered blessings upon us; who wisely orders every dispensation of his providence for our good; and who will finally bring all his children safe home to the "spirit land" on high, to bask in the bright sunbeams of his own endless glory, to meet and commingle their devotions with congenial spirits around the radiant throne of endless love, and to range the golden streets of the New Jerusalem, forever progressing in knowledge, glory, and heavenly blessedness! Oh! that the whole world could see the beauty, the glory, and the loveliness there is in the character of our Father in heaven, as made known through Jesus Christ, his well beloved Son, for he was truly the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person! Oh! that God, who, in the morning of creation, commanded the light to shine out of darkness, would shine into the heart of every child of humanity, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ! And, oh! that all the world would listen to the instructions of the blessed Jesus, for surely "He hath done all things well," and the tendency of his instructions is to bless the whole world with the joys of eternal life!

It is well to be a good talker, but it is better to be a good listener. You can hardly please a man better than to listen to what he has to say.

LETTER TO BR. D. SKINNER AND HIS ANSWER.

Trimble county, Ky., March 12th, 1839.

Mr. D. Skinner:

Dear Sir—I have been for some time reading your Letters to Mr. Aikin; and it appears to me that you certainly establish the following facts: 1. That God is love, and loves all things that he created. 2. That he desires that all his children should be happy hereafter. 3. That God formed every part of man; consequently he must be the Author of every effect that the parts produce, which he formed: and 4. That man is not a free agent.

Now, Sir, although these facts seem to be established, it appears to me that difficulties would attend their admission that would be insurmountable. The design of this letter is to request you, not for disputation, but for information, to solve the difficulties that they seem to involve. If the above facts be admitted as true, I wish to inquire, 1. If God formed every part of man for a good purpose, and desired the happiness of all, and will not be disappointed in his desires, is not every act that ever was or ever will be done by man, a good act, and is not every act of man a virtuous act? If you answer yes to the above; 2. I want to know how Adam committed any sin by disobeying the command, and on what principle of justice God condemned him for that violation, when it was right it should be so? If you answer no, to the first question, 3. I want to know who created that part of Adam that produced the desire to sin? If the devil could create one part of Adam, could he not have created the whole? Therefore, would he not be as great and powerful as God? 4. If you think it was right for Adam to have fallen, and no sin was produced by the fall, and the act of disobedience was right, I want to know why Christ came into the world and suffered death for sin, seeing there was no sin in the world? 5. If man is not a free agent, (and I don't think he is,) I want to know on what principles of justice he can be made by God a culpable being, in any sense of the word? 6. What difference was there between Adam before, and after, the fall; and what difference was there between the human family before, and after, the death of Christ? 7. You say that works are not meritorious. I want to know what is? but recollect that you can't blame my hand for striking my neighbor, but the mind. Therefore all acts that man is accountable for, are the acts of the mind.

Sir, I want you to distinctly understand that I am your friend, and not your enemy: and I want these things explained for the good of myself and all mankind. Direct your letters to Milton Postoffice, Trimble county, Ky. I remain, Sir, your friend, G. F.

ANSWER.

Dear Sir—Your letter reached here during my absence at the South. Having lately returned, I cheerfully comply with your request to answer it the first opportunity. Though your letter is a private one, I make both it and my answer public in order that the benefit, if any, may not be confined exclusively to you and myself. Others may possibly labor under the same doubts and difficulties as yourself; and be gratified with seeing the publication of your questions, and my reply thereto.

I allow the two first items you say I have established in my letters to Rev. S. C. Aikin. I also allow the first part of the 3d item—"that God formed every part of man:" and although I can not allow that God is directly and immediately "the author of every effect that all the parts produce," yet he is undoubtedly the indirect or remote cause of all things; or in other words, nothing could exist without God, and all power that exists is derived from God. Still, there are secondary causes in operation, and agents both intelligent and unintelligent, responsible and irresponsible, to whose action as immediate causes, many effects are to be directly ascribed.

You say I have established, as a fourth item, "that man is not a free agent." This, Sir, depends on what definition is given to the term free agent. The word free usually signifies, being at liberty, uncontrolled, unrestrained. The word agent may signify any active cause or power, or it may (and usually does) signify a substitute or deputy, a factor employed to transact business for a principal. When used in this last, or usual sense, it is hardly compatible to apply the term free to agent: because an agent, substitute, deputy, or factor, is always supposed to be bound by the will and instructions of his principal or employer, and therefore can not be free. If perfectly free, he is not under any restraint, and therefore can not be amenable to his employer or principal. But if by agent be meant simply actor, then the question occurs whether man is a free agent (free actor) or not. If by his being such be meant that he is free to do anything and every thing, unrestrained, uncontrolled, and without accountability, then I deny that man is a free agent. If by his being a free agent, be simply meant, that man is endowed with the freedom of volition and of action in a certain limited sphere, and is accountable for the choice he makes, and the manner in which he performs those actions, I have no objections to free agency. Still, he is not unlimitedly free. If he were so, he could not be accountable. Moreover, there are many things which he can not will to do if he could, and could not do them if he willed.—Therefore, his will, his freedom and his power are all circumscribed.

Having made these preliminary remarks, I now proceed to notice your questions. In answer to your first, I remark, that, though the premises be correct, the conclusion that your question implies does not necessarily follow. Every act of man, taken in connexion with, and as a part of the grand scheme and ultimate purpose of God, with all their final results, may be good: but every act of man, in itself considered, or unconnected with the great results which God has in view in permitting such acts, is not good. Many of them are decidedly evil. Much less is every act of man virtuous. Even if the doctrine of predestination or fatalism in its strongest form, were admitted, it would not make every act of man virtuous. In order for an act to be virtuous, the actor must act from a good and virtuous motive. But we know the motive with some is evil and wicked; and, conscience condemning the act, the perpetrator is guilty before God, whatever may be the ultimate results of the action.

Having answered the first question in the negative instead of the affirmative, your second question is rather non-suited. Nevertheless, I suppose the real question of difficulty in your mind is this: If Adam acted as God designed he should, or even as God knew he would, and God overrules his act of transgression for ultimate good to him and the human family, how could Adam be to blame, or justly condemned therefor? I answer, because he acted contrary to the dictates of his own conscience—he was conscious of doing wickedly, conscious of guilt at the time. The motive of action determines the character of the act, without any regard to the consequences. If a physician administer a portion of arsenic with a view of killing his patient, and instead of operating according to his intentions, it should cure his patient of some dreadful disease, this does not free the physician from the guilt of intended murder. He is guilty of murder in design; and in no possible way can his act be construed into a virtuous act. The good resulting from it is ascribed to God. As man's act, it is evil—it is murder; as God's act, it is good—it is salvation.

The subject is beautifully illustrated by the case of Joseph's being sold a slave into Egypt by his unnatural brethren. God designed Joseph's future elevation and glory. I will admit, also, that he designed, as a means of effecting that elevation and glory, that his brethren should sell him as a slave. His brethren designed his downfall and utter ruin; and as a means of effecting that wicked purpose, they sold him as a slave. They were guilty of the deepest criminality in this, and suffered a righteous punishment therefor; as they afterward confessed, (Gen. xlii: 21,) "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us." But how could they be guilty if God designed they should so act, and overruled it for good? Because they knew not God's design, and they designed no good themselves, but evil. As their act, therefore, it was evil, but as God's act, it was good; as Joseph himself told them, "Ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive." Gen. l: 20.

Your third question requires no answer, inasmuch as I do not hold that the devil created any part or portion of man, soul or body. Your fourth and fifth questions have been anticipated in my answers to your first and second.

In answer to your fifth query, I remark, that the difference between Adam, before and after his fall, was simply this:—he was innocent before he sinned, and guilty after it. That he both sinned and was guilty, is clear from the fact that the Bible defines sin to be "the transgression of the law;" and that he transgressed the positive command or law of God, and felt so conscious of guilt as to seek to hide from the presence of God, his Father and his Friend.

You have another query under the same number: viz. What difference was there between the human family before and after the death of Christ. Answer, none: i. e., there was no difference in their condition effected simply by the literal death of Christ, except that those who put him to death rendered themselves murderers by the act. The mere shedding of his blood, or putting him to death on the cross, affects not the condition of mankind. He himself declared, "the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." It is the word of Christ dwelling richly within us, the doctrine, the teachings, the spirit of Christ, that benefits man, and effects his salvation. His sufferings and death were a commendation of that love to man that is stronger than death, and that many waters can not quench. It was the seal of the covenant of immortal grace, and of the everlasting truths he taught. His death, burial, and resurrection from the dead by the mighty power of God, were also necessary to bring to light and demonstrate the doctrine of the resurrection and of life and immortality beyond the grave, "that we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us: which hope we have, as an anchor of the soul, sure and stedfast, and which entereth into that within the vail," thus begetting us "unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us."

You preface your 7th question by affirming, that I "say works are not meritorious." Here you labor under a mistake. I have never said that works are not meritorious. I say the works of man can never merit endless happiness or the immortal joys of heaven.—They are meritorious in a limited degree, and will most certainly receive their due reward; even if but a cup of cold water be given in the name of a disciple, it shall not go unrewarded. But the immortal and endless joys of heaven are not to be merited by the feeble works of man, but are the free, unmerited gift of God, through Christ. I agree with you, that the mere hand that strikes is not to blame, but the mind that impels it. The mind is either guilty or innocent, according to the motive that actuates it.

Hoping that these desultory remarks may prove satisfactory to you, and not wholly uninteresting or useless to others, I am, dear Sir, yours in all sincerity.

WORKS AND CONSEQUENCES.—NO. 1.

It will be well to examine a principle which will be found an important aid to good works, at the very outset of the investigation. That the exercise of faith is necessary to happiness and spiritual prosperity in this life, is undeniable. Without it man would be a cheerless, solitary and isolated being. Nothing but what presented itself immediately and imposingly before his natural senses, would receive the concurrence of the mind. And even then it would fade, and the impressions it had made would vanish from the memory, the moment its actual, present, living existence disappeared from the mind's eye. There would be no lifting upward of the desires; no reaching forward of hope, to things unattained but real in the nature of things. Instead of this, there would be the unsatisfied desire of the soul, without knowing what it desires—the wild impetuosity of the tornado, but without its destination or boundary.

I repeat, therefore, that faith is necessary to happiness, to spiritual prosperity, and, I may add, to stability of purpose, in this life. But do we reflect upon the nature of true faith as often as we should do? When we say we have faith, do we understand the extent of the acknowledgement? Perhaps we do—at least so far as the essentials are concerned. It is certain we do, if our minds are properly imbued with the spirit from on high, and our actions conformed to the will of Jehovah.

What then is true faith? It is the assent which a well cultivated mind gives to any truth, proposition or principle. Were it possible to try the experiment, it would still be apparent that there could be no faith, were the mind wholly inactive. In support of this, we have one fact which we deem sufficient to settle all dispute. In proportion to the activity of the mind, will be the extent of its faith; and in proportion to the cultivation of the mind will be the purity of its faith. This determines the nature of faith, that it is the approving labors of the mind—of the rational powers. Of course good works must receive the co-operation of the same mind.

We see, then, the propriety of the language of the apostle James, where he connects works and faith together. "Even so," says he, "faith if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." "Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works."—If faith be an active principle or disposition of the mind, it must be succeeded by works, which are a portion of its effects. And if works are good, they must, I think, be guided, or assisted by an equally good faith. Even that silent, unostentatious firmness, agreeably to which, the afflicted bear up under their misfortunes without a murmur, is a noble work of human patience, and speaks volumes in favor of an abiding faith in the justice of the power that orders their lot. Though a silent, it is a no less powerful work, which is inseparably connected with the true faith. Abraham, when he ascended one of the mountains, supposed to be Calvary, in the land of Moriah, with his son Isaac, was required to perform a work which tried his faith to the utmost.—And what a work was there! In that example, where he must have experienced all the agony consequent upon the loss of an only and beloved son, he shrank not from the will of God, but left an enduring evidence to his posterity forever, both of the power of faith over the works, and the power of good works in strengthening the faith, of the creature. Paul, in the midst of the persecution and opposition which he had to encounter, has left, in his faithfulness to his duty, a memorial of the effect of faith which works by love and purifies the heart.

A man may possess but little faith, and yet do good works; but, methinks his works, in the aggregate will be limited to his faith. I can not conceive it possible that man can act deliberately and voluntarily, without having some object or end in view which he designs to accomplish. If so, then he must have faith inseparably connected with his designs, in order to ensure the propriety of the means employed.

I speak not now of infatuation. Where there is no reason, there can be no principle, and where there is no reflection, there can be no living faith to assist man in his actions. But I speak of him who acts after mature reflection. He has satisfied himself, (whether his judgment be right or wrong) that his plans are feasible and his desires proper, and he proceeds in the accomplishment of his designs. The conclusion is apparent. The man who would act justly, must act understandingly, and from a settled motive. That motive can be manifested to the world only by the conduct which attends it. Hence he only has the true faith, who is faithful in righteousness; and he only is good who does good, the professions of men to the contrary notwithstanding. So endeth the first lesson. A. R. B.

TO THE UNIVERSALIST PUBLIC.

It was a year ago last June, that I entirely ceased preaching, or taking any part in public speaking. This step was taken reluctantly, and only from a sense of duty—a full conviction that I could never hope for a perfect restoration to health, while I continued the practice of public speaking. In November last, I sailed for the West Indies, and did not return home from thence until about the first of June, hoping that, by spending the Winter in a tropical climate, and wholly abstaining from public speaking, my health would be so far restored, or the disease of the throat (chronic bronchitis) so far removed, that I could again resume and continue my professional labors. I suffered less from the disease while at the South, than I usually do in this cold and variable climate; and on my return I preached a few times, not only to comply with the earnest solicitations and gratify the wishes of friends, but to ascertain by experiment whether I could safely and permanently resume the practice.

The effect of these few times of public speaking was decidedly bad and seriously injurious to the throat; and I am reluctantly compelled to refuse compliance with all requests that are made to me to preach, or speak at all in public. This notice is made public, that my friends generally may know the true state of the case, and particularly for the information of those friends, whether remote or near, who frequently send for me to go and preach with them, or attend funerals, etc. It is with grief I am compelled to give this notice, and to refuse all similar requests. Did my health allow, I should still continue to obey such calls, and that too with the greatest pleasure. My voice would still be raised in behalf of the great salvation. The theme is as dear to me as ever, and I still cherish some hope, though it be but faint, that I shall some day be so far restored as to sound once more the Gospel trump on the walls of our Zion. But this is known only to the all-wise Disposer of all events. "The Judge of all the earth will do right;" and it becomes me to say, "his will be done."

LOVE AND FEAR.

Fear moves in the heart and heeds the whirlwind there—love breathes upon the soul, and all is calm as the Summer sky. Fear rears a bloody shrine and sacrifices to Moloch and in the valley of Hinnom—love wreathes flowers around the altar, kindles a pure flame, and offers grateful incense. Fear sweeps with a rude and hurried hand the chords of the soul, crushing out wild discord in its strength—love touches it with angel fingers, and draws out all the sweet music of the instrument. E. H. C.

TO ——— ——— ———, IS IT I?

There is yet a large amount due me, in the aggregate, from a great number of individuals, for this paper, while I was the publisher, prior to the year 1836. To the individuals, the sums due are small. But to me the aggregate is quite too large to lose. And surely I have waited long enough. Will not my old debtors remember the apostle's injunction, "owe no man any thing but to love," and immediately discharge their obligations to me? Will not agents see to the collection of bills in their hands due to me, and have the accounts closed at once, and without further delay?

There are also several accounts due me for books in different parts of the country, which ought at once to be settled. And I would particularly invite attention to the Memoir of Rev. John Freeman. Though the greater part of the edition of this valuable work has been distributed into the hands of preachers and other agents, I have not yet received money enough to refund what was advanced for paper, printing, binding, etc.; while the widow has yet received nothing from the sale of the work. I think if we had returns for all that have been sold by agents, it would pay the expenses of the publication, and perhaps leave something for the widow.—Have agents disposed of all the books they can? Will they not make another effort to sell what they have on hand, and at least make returns and payment for all they have sold? Are you a preacher? ask your congregation to give, each of them, fifty cents for the benefit of the deserving widow and orphans of our late, lamented Br. Freeman, and receive in return therefor a book (the Memoir) worth double the money. Brethren, let us immediately hear from you on the above subjects, and oblige Your obedient servant, D. Skinner.

SING THE SWEET PÆAN.

BY MISS LAURA EGGLESTON.

O, sing the sweet pæan of love and salvation!
For truth is prevailing the nations among—
Arise, every heart in sublime adoration,
Rejoice, for an era auspicious is come.

Already the people, in love, are beginning
To worship Jehovah in spirit and truth;
The voice of the Gospel, divinely is winning
The souls of the aged, and hearts of the youth.

Behold, what a change in the moral creation,
By truth's plastic hand has been wrought in our land!
Around us are beaming her bright scintillations—
Her crown is unfading—her empire shall stand.

O, sing the sweet pæan—for rich benedictions,
More ample than dew drops descend on the world!
The mercy of heaven shall know no restriction,
Its banners of love over all are unfurled.

The mind long confin'd in the prison of error,
Has found manumission, and basks in the light,
The beams of salvation, where visions of terror
Are never display'd to the ideal sight.

The heralds of Zion, arrayed with salvation,
Sweet tidings of gladness proclaim in our ear;
And Jesus, the Saviour and Prince of the nations,
In accents of mercy forbids us to fear.

O, sing the sweet pæan of love and salvation,
And soar on the pinions of mercy and truth,
And rest on the broad and unbounded foundation,
Reared by the Redeemer on pillars of truth.

We'll sing the sweet pæan, and praise our Creator,
In life's fading region, until we shall rise,
Array'd in the garb of a supernal nature,
And sing with the angels in yon glorious skies.

THE TWILIGHT HOUR.

The hues of parting day
Are fading in the West
And now the twilight gray
Invites the swain to rest;
A welcome pause, a moment given
To lift the thoughts from earth to heaven.

Now memory wakes the grief—
The joys long, long gone by;
Nor heeds the rustling leaf—
The breeze's gentle sigh:
Dreams of the past, that come with power,
To haunt us at the twilight hour.

Rise, grov'ler! stay no more;
But stretch thy feeble wings,
And strive by faith to soar
Above terrestrial things.—
Where morn, and noon, and twilight gray,
Are lost in one eternal day.

SONNET.

BY H. K. WHITE.

Oh, 'twill be over soon—this sickly dream
Of life will vanish from my feverish brain;
And death my wearied spirit will redeem
From this wild region of unvaried pain.
You brook will glide as softly as before—
You landscape smile—yon golden harvest grow,
Yon sprightly lark on mounting wing will soar,
When my sad name is heard no more below.
I sigh, when all my youthful friends caress—
They laugh in health and future evils brave;
Them shall a wife and smiling children bless,
While I am mouldering in my silent grave.
God of the just! thou gavest the bitter cup;
I bow to thy behest, and drink it up.

FANATICISM.

The religion that Christ came to establish, does not exact that gloomy, monkish austerity from its votaries that is often exhibited; that message of glad tidings should inspire us with other feelings than those of the most sombre, melancholy hue. Is there not a joy in knowing that there is endless, unspeakable happiness provided for every one who will receive it, that "whoever will may come?" Then why lead the inquirer into fields of theoretical speculation, terrify him with threats, perplex him with doubts, or plunge him into despondency, with the most dismal forebodings? Religion, where the mind is influenced by common sense, does not demand that we practice penance and mortification, and despise the good things which a kind Providence has bestowed upon us; but on the contrary, it is impious to put too low an estimate upon the bounties which he has thrown around us. We may use the things of this world in such a way as may contribute to our own, and to others' permanent comfort; being ever mindful of the Giver, and of our accountability to him.

It is a trait in the mental character of man, to run into extravagances, to be led astray by the wild vagaries of wayward fancy, uninfluenced by the sober dictates of common sense. This frailty of our nature has been manifested in all countries, and in all ages, from the most remote antiquity; and there has not been in any place, at any time, the most ridiculous, or the most absurd notions in politics or religion, but have found their advocates and abettors among the most enlightened of the age. We have but to peruse the history of our own country, to be made acquainted with the proneness of our species to embrace the most fanatical, and foolish, and inconsistent notions that ever entered the mind of man. And for this we need not go back many years—the events of our own times, in our own day and generation, are fraught with superstition and phrensy; and what is very singular, every deluded sect claims to be Divinely inspired, and to derive its doctrines from the same blessed volume. Fanaticism is contagious, and those who have uniformly led a life of consistency, and been noted for their good sense, no sooner enter the charmed circle, than the wildest enthusiasm takes possession of their minds, and governs all their actions. Generally, however, they who are fanatics in one thing, are fanatics in whatever else their minds become engaged; the same individual will be factious in politics, an exclusive in diet, and a zealot in religion. Every principle by them must be pushed to extremes; they are the ultra reformers of the age, the radicals of the nineteenth century; they would have a man confine himself to a diet of bread and water, devote his whole time to the benevolent operations of the day, and literally "pray without ceasing." Such are to be commended for their philanthropy—for their honest desire to benefit mankind, but they are to be pitied for their lack of discretion. Their arguments and examples operate upon all who do not become their disciples, like negative electricity—driving each other farther asunder.—Philosophy of Living.

COMMUNION WITH GOD.

What more conducive to our happiness, and what greater source of pleasure and instruction, than to hold communion with the Father of our spirits! To turn our backs for a time, upon the engrossing cares of a noisy world, and bring our thoughts and our devotions to the calm and grand repose of nature's instructions, and through them to nature's Author. Who does not love to steal away from the excitements and passions of the world, and quench the fever of assiduous devotions to its interests, in the contemplation of the loveliness, peace, in the harmony displayed in the works of the Creator? And thus to hold intercourse with the Spirit of our spirits—to commune with nobler things than earth affords. It is through the medium of his works that the Creator delights to hold converse with his creatures.—The voice of inspiration is heard all around us—in the most solitary and desolate places of earth, we hear the inviting sounds of our Father's instruction—we read the solemn and important lessons of wisdom, and truth, and love. Especially does the returning energies of nature, in this vernal season, remind us that the glorious and extensive volume of the Divine goodness, is again opened for our admiration and profit. Who does not delight to hold communion with the spirit of the seasons, and let the heart and affections go out in gratitude and love to the Author of all beings? Welcome again the spirit and inspiration of Summer! Welcome this season of grateful communion with our Father above, and our kindred on earth. May devotion inspire our hearts, and pleasure crown our exertions, in the cause of truth. —Watchman.

CAUSE OF QUARREL.—"I wish I owned all the pasture land in the word," said Bob. "Well, I wish I owned all the cattle in the world," said Ned. "How would you feed them?" asked Bob. "I'd turn them into your pasture," said Ned. "No you wouldn't!" "Yes I would!" "No you wouldn't!" "Yes I would!" "You shan't!" "I shall!" And then came the fisticuffs—and oh! how they did fight!

MARRIAGES.

In Gainesville, July 4th, by Rev. W. E. Manley, Mr. HIRAM C. SMITH, of Warsaw, to Miss MARY HAWLEY, of the former place.

In Perry, August 8th, by Rev. S. Barnes, Mr. JABEZ B. BURR, to Miss CHARLOTTE B. PATCHEN, all of Perry.

In Geneva, July 4th, by Rev. O. Ackley, Mr. AMASA NELSON, to Miss MARY ANN COUNTRYMAN, both of Manchester.

DEATHS.

In Richfield, by drowning, on Sunday, the 4th inst., Mr. NICHOLAS UTT, a German by birth, of good character and habits, aged about 22 years, who had crossed the "world of waters" to be drowned in a mill-pond, ere he had breathed the luxuriant breeze of 90 Summer days in the land of freedom. The morning sun that shone upon his countenance, beaming with health and vigor, before he had sunk behind the western hills shone as brightly upon a newly made grave. And now he sleeps the sleep of death, a "stranger in a strange land," without one relative to drop the tear of sympathy over the lowly mound. The funeral was attended at 6 o'clock, P. M., of the same day, at the house of Mr. Braman, where a select portion of Scripture was read, a word of exhortation given, and a short prayer offered, by the writer. J. S. KIBBE.

In Cobleskill, Schoharie co., August 4th, at the residence of her son, Jonah Westover, Esq., Mrs. ASENATH WESTOVER, aged 85 years. She died as she had lived for nearly the last half century, a firm, consistent, and practical believer in the restitution of all things, spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began.

J. W

In McDonough, August 8th, Mrs. OLIVE JACOBS, aged 33 years. She has left a husband and two children to mourn their loss. We pray that the consolations of the Gospel may be a comfort to them in their afflictions, and be the means of leading them nearer to the fountain of peace and salvation. I visited Mrs. Jacobs a few days before her death, and found that her greatest consolation was in the promises of Heaven. She wished me to address the people at her funeral, and inform them that she died a firm believer in the restitution; which I did, assisted in the services by Mr. Densmore, of the Methodist persuasion, in an affectionate prayer to Heaven for a blessing to rest upon us all. But at the close of the services, in a prayer by Elder Bennet, of the Baptist order, I was led to reflect on the vanity of the professions of men; for when we have reason to expect the olive branch of peace, we are offered the glove of contention at a time when it is known that a reply can not be given consistent with the rules of propriety.

C. S. BROWN.

In Triangle, Broome county, July 25th, Mr. GIDEON BAKER, aged 74 years, formerly from Lebanon, N. H. He had been a resident of this county 34 years, and for more than 20 years past a firm and consistent believer in the restitution. His loss to his family, to the Universalist society in this place, and community at large, is great. He was a universal friend to the human race. The funeral was attended by the writer. C. S. BROWN.

Will the Watchman and Trumpet copy for the benefit of the connections in that region?

In German Flats, of scarlet fever, April 15th, RHODA ANN LARENA, daughter of Lemuel Swift, aged 9 years. The funeral was attended on the following day, and a discourse delivered by the writer. Also, on the 23d of April, by the same disease, the youngest daughter of Lemuel Swift, aged about 6 years. A few days previous to the death of those children, the father-in-law and a son of about 12 years, was by death called from the social circle. Thus in the space of a few weeks, has this afflicted family been deprived of four of its members! May the consolations of the Gospel, which maketh glad the hearts of the children of men, be their comfort and support, until they shall join the spirits of those loved ones in the mansions of bliss.

J. D. HICKS.

In Newville, May 15th, of scarlet fever, JAMES HERBERT, only son of James and Eliza Mattison, aged 1 year. A discourse was delivered to the afflicted parents and sympathising friends, on the following day, by the writer; this being the third and last child that has by death been called away. We feel to sympathise with them in their loss, but we hope that their loss is the gain of those little loved ones who now sweetly sleep in the arms of him that took little children into his arms and blessed them. INTERESTING FACTS
FOR THE MODERN HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM.

BY REV. T. CLOWES.

Br. Thomas Whittemore in his Modern History of Universalism, among other highly eminent men, members of various denominations supposed to hold the doctrine of endless sin, names Dr. Samuel Johnson, "the great lexicographer and moralist," as being probably a believer in the doctrine of Universal salvation. See Modern History, page 213. Br. Clowes has kindly permitted me to make an extract from a manuscript of his, in which, after copying what Br. Whittemore has said of Dr. Johnson's probable Universalism, he furnishes the positive proof, not only of that fact, but also of the Universalism of the entire General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States, at, and immediately after, the close of the Revolutionary war! The testimony is very full, and conclusive, and must awaken no little astonishment that men, professing to believe in God's abundance of wisdom and goodness, (Eph. i: 8–11,) could yet deem it their duty, or could consent, to conceal from the world, what God has so plainly revealed, and what they profess so undoubtingly to believe. Either they must have a low opinion of God's wisdom, or place a high estimate on their own cunning (!), as do many of the Tunkers. But read what Dr. Clowes offers on this subject. After copying from Br. Whittemore, as before stated, he says—

I refer to these extracts as found in Whittemore's Modern History of Universalism, for the evidence that Dr. Johnson was probably opposed to the doctrine of the eternity of future punishment. I will now quote from some writings of Dr. Johnson, conclusive proofs—not mere probabilities, but conclusive proofs of his Universalism. As Mr. Whittemore seems not to have been acquainted with these authorities, I shall be more full in quoting from them.

Dr. Johnson had a friend, Dr. John Taylor, who was a clergyman of the church of England, and who was Prebendary of Westminster, Rector of Bosworth in Leicestershire, and Minister of St. Margaret's, Westminster. As the intimacy was very great, Dr. Johnson favored Dr. Taylor with preparing a number of sermons for his use, which, after being preached by Dr. Taylor, were left by him for publication at his death. These twenty-five sermons, known to have been written by Dr. Johnson, but preached by Dr. Taylor, contain several passages on which we rely as proof of the fact that he held Universalist sentiments. We will quote one or two passages.

"In our present state, it is impossible to practice this, or any other duty, in perfection. We can not trust God as we ought, because we can not know him as we ought. We know, however, that he is infinite in wisdom, in power, and in goodness; that therefore he designs the happiness of all his creatures; that he can not but know the proper means by which this end may be obtained; and that, in the use of these means, as he can not be mistaken because he is omniscient, so he can not be defeated because he is Almighty."

In the sermon on the text, "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works," Dr. Johnson thus speaks of the doctrine of those who look upon God as destitute of goodness—"Without goodness, what apprehensions could we entertain of all the other attributes of the Divine Being? Without the utmost extent of benevolence and mercy, they would hardly be perfections or excellences. And what would a universal administration produce, in the hands of an evil, or a partial, or malevolent direction, but scenes of horror and devastation? Not affliction and punishment for the sake of discipline and correction, to prevent the offence and reform the sinner; but heavy judgments and dreadful vengeance to destroy him; or implacable wrath or fiery indignation, to prolong his misery, and extend the duration of his torture through the revolving periods of an endless eternity."

In the same sermon, he has this delightful sentiment—"No bounds can be fixed to the Divine presence, nor is any part of illimitable space without his inspection and active influence.—There is nothing remote or obscure to him, nor any exception to his favor among all the works of his hands. Far and wide as is the vast range of existence, so is the Divine benevolence extended; and both in the previous trial and final retribution of all his rational and moral productions, 'the Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works.'"

There are several other individuals named in the Modern History of Universalism, as probably adopting the sentiments of the Universalists, where I have the means of proving the fact beyond a doubt. Among them I might mention the very learned Dr. Jortin, the author of Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.—But I pass by them to notice a writer of our own country, who has been omitted by Mr. Whittemore. I speak of Dr. WILLIAM SMITH, who was the Principal and the founder of the University of Pennsylvania. This gentleman was one of the most eloquent clergymen of his age. In the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal church, he acted a very leading and influential part. In the reorganization of that church, after it became politically independent of the church of England, he took the lead. He drew up anew the Prayer Book, and articles of the Protestant Episcopal church, and was the author of what was called the Proposed Liturgy, which was published in this country in the year 1785. In this book, we can not, to be sure, find many places which are evidences that Dr. Smith was a Universalist, or of his wish to incorporate that sentiment into the standards of the Episcopal church; but there are two passages which certainly have a strong tendency to such an expression. The first was the omission of the article of the creed which expresses the belief of the descent of Christ into hell.—In the Proposed Prayer Book this article was omitted in consequence of its being supposed to express the belief of the existence of a hell of torment, and that Christ went down into that hell. When the omission of this article was objected to by the Bishops in England, and the article itself was re-inserted into the creed, it was only on condition that any church might omit the words, "descended into hell," or might adopt in their stead, "went into the place of departed spirits"—which, say the compilers of the Liturgy, are considered by the church as meaning the same thing as the term, "descended into hell."

There has long been a dispute in the church of England, and in the Protestant Episcopal church of this country, as to the meaning of the XVII article—concerning "predestination and election;—some maintaining that it was intended to assert the Calvinistic, and others that it was intended to assert the Arminian doctrine in respect to these subjects. The first part of the article runs as follows:—"Predestination to life is the eternal purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation as vessels made to honor. Wherefore, they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God, be called by God's purpose by his spirit working in due season; they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of his only begotten Son, Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works; and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity."

Now this definition of predestination has been the foundation of long and acrimonious disputes in the church of England, and in the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States. To such a height did these disputes arise at one time in England, that a royal order was issued, commanding all further dispute upon the subject to cease—stating that men of all sorts (by which it meant, that men of all opinions) do take the article as being in their favor—and that therefore an article which has been so ambiguously drawn up as to express the opposite sentiments of Calvin and Arminius shall be no longer the bone of contention between the partisans of the two doctrines.

There has been a third class of persons who have interpreted the XVIIth article as expressing the doctrine of Universalism. It will be observed that it is almost a copy of Paul's doctrine with respect to predestination, by which he declares that God hath purposed to gather together in one blessed community, all things, in Christ; both which are in heaven and in earth. The article being, therefore, mainly in Scripture language, may be interpreted in the sense of Scripture.—In whatever sense predestination is used in Scripture, in that sense it is used by some in the Episcopal church in the XVIIth article.

Dr. Smith, who took the lead, as before stated, in preparing the articles, and in altering them so as to make them express the faith of Episcopalians, proposed that the article should read thus: "Of Predestination.—Predestination to life, with respect to every man's salvation, is the everlasting purpose of God, secret to us; and the right knowledge of what is revealed concerning it, is full of comfort to such truly religious Christians as feel in themselves the spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of their flesh and earthly affections, and raising their minds to heavenly things," etc.—You will observe here, that the XVIIth article of the church of England, as revised and adopted in the Proposed Prayer book, gave a Universalist interpretation to that article, truly maintaining that predestination to life, is God's everlasting purpose with respect to EVERY MAN'S SALVATION. This article, so amended or explained, was UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED by the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal church in 1785; and though it was deemed expedient afterwards to relinquish the use of the Proposed Prayer Book, and to adopt the articles generally as they had been heretofore contained in the English Prayer Book, yet the Convention always maintained that they understood them as explained in the proposed book.

It was indeed a most remarkable event in the history of the Protestant Episcopal church, that she should become, by the alteration of a few words in one of her articles, not only a tolerator of Universalism, but a maintainer of it. For I can consider this transaction as nothing else than a unanimous decision, by the General Convention, of the Episcopal church, that the salvation of all men is the everlasting purpose of God.

This proof of the Universalism—of the secretly maintained Universalism of the Protestant Episcopal church, may be quite as satisfactorily deduced from the circumstance of the unanimous recommendation by the Bishops, and clergy, and laity of the Protestant Episcopal church in General Convention, of the two volumes of Sermons of the said Dr. Wm. Smith, which sermons are, beyond all doubt, affirmatory of the doctrine that the punishment of the wicked in a future world, will not be endless. And this was not a mere recommendation once given, and never afterwards repeated; but the recommendation of these Sermons, with all their Universalism, is still continued. The Convention has drawn up a body of instructions for the direction of students in divinity, and the Sermons of Dr. Smith are among those which are most prominently recommended.

We have not time at present to make many extracts from these volumes; and, besides, it would not be possible, without several long quotations and comparison of passages, to prove Dr. Smith's Universalism beyond all cavil; for although he was undoubtedly Universalist in his sentiments, and though he means to be understood by the observing part of his readers to teach that sentiment, yet he seems on this subject to adopt such ambiguous terms as to leave the common reader in the dark as to his sentiments. This he would not have done, had he been opposed to Universalism, or a believer in its opposite. The Doctor, with many other divines of the Episcopal church in England and in America, with the adoption of the truth of Universalism, seem to have thought that it was not a safe doctrine to be publicly preached. "The time will come, (says Dr. Thomas Burnet,) when this doctrine, which is now whispered in the ear, may be proclaimed upon the house tops: but that time is not yet." Dr. Smith adopts this sentiment. I will quote, however, one passage which will make it clearly evident what were his sentiments, and what sentiments the rulers of the Protestant Episcopal church wish to be impressed on the minds of their clergy, if they do not even wish to have them preached to the people at large.

Dr. Smith, speaking of those who will not return to God, and who die without repentance, says—"As to those who refuse to return, and will not seek God at all, (but continue to put their trust in vanity and lies unto the end,) they must lie under St. Paul's curse until the end comes; but I do not feel myself prepared to explain that curse, as the good and zealous Dr. Whitby thinks the pious men of old would have done; extending it beyond the end, and turning it into a prayer, 'that the Lord would reserve them unto that great day, when he at last shall sit in judgment, in order that, in his own person, he may smite them with perdition, and that they may perish under his own proper and everlasting curse.'"—"My brethren," (continues the same Dr. Smith,) "it has never been accounted heterodox or impious, (unless perhaps by the most gloomy and Pharisaical bigots,) in the divines of our church, or indeed of any other Christian church, to treat freely of such subjects, as 'the eternity of hell torments, and a universal restitution of degraded and lapsed natures;' and some of our most eminent divines have been considered as rejecting the former and favoring the latter doctrine."

The Doctor, as if apprehending that he might be thought to have spoken his sentiments too plainly, adds, towards the conclusion of his sermon on this subject—"My brethren, in these Sermons I teach no other doctrines than those which I taught and accounted orthodox from the beginning of my public ministry. When the Bishops, the clergy and laity of our church, (in General Convention assembled,) first encouraged me to proceed in the publication of a small body of Sermons, which might serve for a short system of divinity for the promotion of practical religion and Christianity, they complaisantly declared themselves persuaded 'that the interests of religion and practical godliness might be thereby greatly promoted; and that being well satisfied of the author's soundness in the faith, and eminent abilities for the work, they testified their approbation of the same, and of their desire to encourage it, by annexing their names,' etc., to this recommendation."

REMARKS.—Here ends the manuscript of Br. Clowes from which we have been permitted to copy the foregoing extract; and so interesting is it—so surprising in its revelations, that we will burden the reader with no words of our own, save the expression of our earnest desire, that Dr. C. may again, and again, open his budget for our perusal. THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER NINE.

RUTH—This book is thought to have been written by Samuel, as an introduction to the book of Samuel. It relates to the time that intervened between the death of Joshua and the birth of Samuel. The scope of it appears to be to trace out the genealogy of David.

SAMUEL—The two books that bear the name, Samuel, or as they are sometimes called, the 1st and 2d of Kings, are supposed to contain the writings of Samuel, Gad, and Nathan. See 1st Chronicles xxix: 29. Here they are referred to as separate books, but it would be natural for Ezra, or some other compiler, to throw the contents of them all into these two.

1st Sam. xv: 22.—"And Samuel said, hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold to obey is better than sacrifice," etc.

This is quoted by our Saviour, and the saying is approved by him. It is a maxim of great importance and of universal application; viz., that every thing of a mere ceremonial nature, ought to give place to things of a moral nature, these things being more expressly enjoined and insisted upon.

1st Sam. 28th chapter. There are various opinions respecting the account contained in this chapter of the raising of Samuel. It is not pretended but by very few, and they the most ignorant of the whole community of divines, that the witch or necromancer here spoken of, actually had power to raise the dead. She was, without doubt, a ventriloquist, and by this art might have deceived Saul; though some are of the opinion that God saw fit to cause a remarkable appearance on this occasion, in order to convince Saul that God was against him. But there is nothing inconsistent in the idea that it was a complete piece of imposition on the part of this woman.—For a full, clear and satisfactory exposition of this chapter, see Balfour's Essays, page 58.

2d Sam. v: 5. "In Hebron he (David) reigned over Judah seven years and six months; and in Jerusalem he reigned thirty-three years over all Israel and Judah."

David conquered and took possession of Jerusalem in the first year of his reign over all Israel. This was the first conquest of Jerusalem by the Israelites.

2d Sam. xi: 15. "Set Uriah in the forefront of the hottest battle," etc.

We see in this shocking history how one vice leads to another. David having committed adultery, found it necessary to add murder to it, and that of one of his bravest officers. This transaction has afforded room for much ironical remark and sarcasm from unbelievers. But let it be remembered that this act of David's was not approved; but on the contrary it is said, see verse 27, "The thing that David done displeased the Lord." And instead of its being proof of the falsity of the Bible, it is an evidence of its truth; for certainly no Jew would have written such a history if it had not been known to be true.

2d Sam. xviii: 33. "Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom," etc.

David must have been a man of strong and generous feelings to lament as he did the death of a rebellious son, who certainly would not have spared him. As David had great faults, he had also great virtues; and there is no history so concisely written, that has more genuine strokes of nature in it. It is a history which no person could or would invent.

UNIVERSALISM VERSUS JUDAISM.

Reader, are you a Calvinist? And do you know that there is an article in your creed, which, if honestly adhered to, would lead you to become a Universalist? The article I refer to is that which professes to recognize the freeness of God's grace, that he is to bestow his "gift," (Rom. v: 17, 18,) in the future world, uninfluenced as to the choice of his object, by any procuring qualification or entitling mark, whereby one might think to appear acceptably before him rather than the other. On the other hand, he is prompted altogether by a motive residing within himself, (his mercy. Eph. i. 9,) so that, although the degree to which his favor will be enjoyed, may be graduated according to what has taken place here, yet the bestowment of it, in distinction from its opposite, is not to be expected to be drawn down by works or compliances of any kind, however indirectly put forth.

Now we believe this to be precious truth, nothing less than "the good news of the favor of the blessed God;" but is it consistent with Partialism? Must not a man according to your opinion, have experienced a change for the better, (a detestation of his former evil ways and an aspiring after holiness,) before he is warranted to consider himself an heir of glory? Must he not have complied with what (unwarrantably transforming "good news" into an overture) you are pleased to call "the terms of salvation"? Do you not require him to show that he is not as other men; albeit, at the same time, by way of a sop to his suspicions of your legalism, (which yet you must know, from Luke xviii: 11, to be perfectly compatible with Pharisaism and no barrier whatever to boasting,) you place great stress upon the consideration that God is duly thanked in the case? In fine, do you not expect the Christian to be able to say that, in virtue of his being what he is, thank God, he stands a fairer chance of being blessed hereafter, than other men?

And is this "being justified freely"? "Where is boasting, then," Paul exclaims Rom. iii: 27, "it is excluded—by the law of faith"—i. e., on the principle of our simply having to believe what God has guarantied—viz., that "in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he will bring together all in one;" he will be all, (the satisfying portion) "in all." But is boasting excluded by you? Did not the Pharisee to whom I have referred in the citation from Luke, use precisely the language which you use? Was it not the very point of difference between him and the publican, that his hope sprang from the appearance of something hopeful about himself, whereas the hope of the publican was built altogether upon God's favorableness—"God be merciful to me a sinner"—no mention being made of any lucky turn that he had taken?

But perhaps you are a Sandemanian, and think that you shun the charge of frustrating the grace of God, since you allege that belief in religion, as in other matters, of itself, has no moral complexion, involves no moral yearning one way or another, but is barely an intellectual experience. Now it follows, indeed, from your position, that he who has faith can not therefore boast of having a moral favor-token to lift him above others. But who has made the mighty distinction between building one's hope upon a moral, and building it upon an intellectual ear-mark? And if each one must look to this ear-mark, before he is warranted to expect the favor of God, wherein does it virtually differ from that concering which Paul spake, Gal. v: 2—"I say unto you, if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing—I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law—we. through the spirit, wait for the hope of righteousness by faith."

But what I wished particularly to draw your attention to, is the manner in which you trample upon the doctrine of the freeness of the divine favor, and belie the best part of your creed, in your effort to make certain passages of Scripture square with Partialism.

Witness the interpretation which you put upon John v: 28, 29—"they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." You say that reference is here had to a period yet future, when men's allotments, of endless happiness or misery, will be awarded to them; yet the future allotment of happiness, you tell us, at other times, and rightly say, is to be irrespective of works. Does this passage represent it so?

Nor is this the only passage which is thus handled deceitfully. The award of blessedness to which reference is had in the parable of the talents, the parable of the ten virgins, the parable of the faithful and wise servant, etc.; the award referred to in Matt. xxv: 31–46, is represented as being upon the score of works, yet to combat Universalism, you force it forward to a day still future, the day of the final restitution; not thinking that the Bible and your own creed have said that the favor bestowed on that day, would be bestowed freely, Gal. ii: 16.

The coming of the Son of Man with his mighty angels, so often referred to, you make to be the same event—yet future—the season for the display of God's grace. Yet what do we read of the Son of Man at this time? Matt. xvi: 27—"then he shall reward every man according to his works"! Your inconsistency I leave before you. J. A. P.

THE PRUNER.

INTRODUCTORY.

For afore the harvest, when the bud is perfect, and the sour grape is ripening in the flower, he shall both cut off the sprigs with pruning hooks, and take away and cut down the branches. Isa. xviii: 5.

Messrs. Editors—Through the medium of your wide-spread, valuable paper, have already appeared many able and well digested articles, in defence of the great salvation, as well as numerous ones, purely of a practical nature, intended to enforce a strict conformance to all the Christian graces. Like Paul of old, many worthy correspondents have prepared the soil, and planted the good word—the plants have sprung up—and in many cases, the planters have passed on, scattering the good seed abroad, till through the extent of our country, are seen the fruits of their labors; while others have followed in their rear and pulled the noxious weeds that were ready to choke up the tender plants—loosened the soil for their roots to extend, and thereby draw more nourishment to hasten on their strength and maturity. And nearly in the last of their train, an "Apollos has watered" with the dews of kindness, the moral vineyard of our common Master.

The planting has been well performed—the weeding very faithfully executed—and the watering salutary and refreshing; and yet, (we grieve to say it,) there are many uncomely and fruitless plants, that often put forth their blossoms, but still they bear no fruit. Now, Br. Editors, it seems to us, that these plants should be pruned, the hurtful "sprigs cut off with pruning hooks, and the useless branches cut down and taken away." For while the tree is cumbered with useless branches, its sap is exhausted in their support, while its comeliness is deformed, and its usefulness destroyed.

With this view, by your leave and approbation, we design acting in the capacity of "the pruner" through the columns of your paper, in a series of articles intended to lop off some of the useless and hurtful branches—the evil practices, feelings and habits among the professors of universal grace.

And while we bear the hook, ready to strike off every excrescent shoot, we may occasionally lay it down to survey the beauties of a flower—the grace of a limb, and the growing goodliness of the tree. We reserve this latitude, in order to follow the "moving of the spirit," and adapt our labors to the circumstances of the case.

Such is the outline of our plan, in which we promise no "new thing under the sun," for our station is humble, our abilities are humble, and our pretensions should also be humble; and all we can promise is "to do the best our circumstances will allow" in the garb and with the implements of a pruner.

Having now made our bow introductory and professional, in our next a salutation will be extended to our brethren, by your humble servant,

Apelles.

THE CAUSE.

Br. Grosh.—At Denmark we have a smallish house, and that commonly but poorly filled, and sustain meetings one half the time. Br. Wilcox and myself preach with them alternately. Here I have labored much, publicly and privately, under dark and discouraging prospects; and these prospects were not owing to a want of a sufficient number of professed Universalists to give strength and stability to the cause, nor to any want of ability to defray the pecuniary expenses attendant on religious worship, but to a cold insensibility on the subject. Yet here have always been some who have had more than a mere name to live, and as God never fails to reward the righteous in the earth, our congregations are now increasing, and the cause appears to be advancing. At Burrville, in the south part of the town of Watertown, our friends own one-fourth of a good house, and sustain meetings one-fourth of the time. We have very good congregations here and they are decidedly on the gain. The same in substance may be said of our congregations at South Champion and Tylersville, at each of which places we have one-fourth of a house, and sustain preaching one-fourth of the time. These two places are both properly within the boundaries of the first Universalist society of Champion and Rutland. As Tylersville is a small village near the head of the North Sandy Creek, and at the South end of the town of Rutland, about three miles from the South Champion meeting-house, the principal members of the society own property in both houses.

At Burrville, no society has been formed, because the principal supporters are members of Br. Waggoner's society at Watertown village. The Champion and Rutland society, and that at Denmark, number, I should think, about twenty-five members each; but that is not quite to the number of real believers, for we have many in every place who from self-diffidence, or some other cause, neglect to become members.

So you see, that our cause in this section is decidedly advancing—for this you will rejoice with me, and with me give thanks to our Heavenly Father. Yours, etc., J. French.

DEDICATION AT CORTLAND.

The new Universalist meeting house in the village of Cortland, was solemnly dedicated to the worship of our Heavenly Father, July 10, 1839. The order of services was as follows, viz: 1. Voluntary by the choir. 2. Reading of the Scriptures by Rev. N. Brown. 3. Singing. 4. Prayer, Rev. C. S. Brown. 5. Reading select portions of Scripture. 6. Singing. 7. Sermon, Rev. G. W. Montgomery. 8. Dedicatory prayer, Rev. J. Potter. 9. Voluntary by the choir. 10. Benediction. The day was fair, and the house was filled at an early hour. The services were all well conducted, and commanded the strict attention of a vast assembly. And we trust that some good at least, was done in the name of our holy Redeemer.

The meeting was continued two days. Sermons were preached on the first day, P. M., by Brs. Potter and Clark, and on the second, by Brs. C. S. Brown, Rounseville, and N. Brown, to good acceptance, and which did honor to the speakers. The dedication at Cortland, was a time we trust, which will be long remembered by those who were there. A. C. B.

MATT. XI: 11, AND LUKE VII: 28.

TRANSLATION.

"Verily I say unto you, among them that are born of women, there hath not arisen a greater (prophet) than John the Baptist; notwithstanding the least (prophet) in the kingdom of heaven is greater (a greater prophet) than he."

"For I say unto you, among those that are born of women there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist; but the least, (viz. prophet) in the kingdom of God is greater (a greater prophet) than he." There is nothing in the original of these passages that stands for, he that is least: but the original is simply the least—that is, the least prophet, as the connexion shows.—Hence the question often asked, in view of the above phrases, how can the least Christian be greater than John the Baptist? is answered.

IMPROPER INDULGENCES.

A gentleman, perspiring freely in a sultry day, was standing in the current at a window cooling himself, when a lady warned him of his danger by saying, "Ah! that's too pleasant to be safe." This is applicable to more occasions in life than that on which it was originally made. When we have seen, as we often do, any indulging themselves in pleasures whose bitter consequences were unsuspected, or which they hoped to escape, we have been reminded of this saying. It is synonymous with the maxim which formed one of our first lessons in Latin, perimus licitis—that is, we are ruined by indulgences not expressly prohibited. Is it so? Were the fruits of indulgence as visible and vivid as the promised pleasure which constitute the temptation, who would taste forbidden fruit? Is it not

With earth's allurements—to subdue the soul—
To keep the heart, and the whole life control?
Oh! it is hard to live." A. S.

Will you orphanise the universe? Will you pluck the banner of hope from the couch of the dying—wrest the cup of consolation from the lips of the mourner—and deprive the aged sire of the staff on which he leans for support? ALL GOING TO HEAVEN.

BY MISS H. I. STONE.

Much is said by professed followers of Christ in the present day, concerning that doctrine which teaches that all are finally to meet in heaven.—Statements are often made like the following, which charity hopeth come not from the heart, but flow unadvisedly from the lips. "If all are going to heaven, I for one, choose never to go there"; again, "if all men are to be saved, why preach the Gospel? Why not indulge all the powers which we possess, in sin and blasphemy against God?" It would seem that the person who could make such inconsiderate remarks, must either be a very ignorant or a very wicked man. What! a Christian desire to see the laws of God trampled upon forever—his will and purpose frustrated—his counsels made null and void—and the joys of immortal felicity, which await every son and daughter of the second Adam, never enjoyed by some of the very creatures for whom, in the wide economy of omnipotent power, they were designed. Can it be possible that an intelligent, rational being can thus reason? Can man be thus lost to all the holy, godlike principles of benevolence and philanthropy? O, tell it not in this boasted land of freedom, lest the unbelieving rejoice! To such an one, of all others, true Gospel should be proclaimed.

Besides, it imparts peace and happiness to the true believer. It is the "joy of the comfortless, the light to the straying," the hope when all else fails. This is a sufficient reason why we should preach it.

Another and more apparent one is, that it is the truth of God; that truth which the Son of the living God came down from the shining courts of celestial glory to make known to poor, dying, hopeless man. It was that the despairing, stricken sons of bondage and corruption might have whereof to glory through Christ their Redeemer. It was to give them a correct knowledge of their Father's character—of his will and purpose—of the high and holy destiny that awaited them beyond this transitory, fading world—of their duties towards their Father, and their brethren of the human race, the performance of which was calculated to fill them with peace and joy in a holy mind. It was to exalt the affections—to draw forth the purest and warmest energies of the soul—to expand and ennoble the powers—to adorn and beautify the whole man, and render him just such a being as a God of infinite and eternal power and wisdom designed him to be. Worthy the life and sufferings of our blessed Saviour, was such a mission; the final consummation of which, will fill the realms of immortal bliss with the shouts of a congregated universe, throughout the ceaseless ages of eternity!

To render evil for good, hatred for love, is not the innate disposition of one creature whom God has made; (and we are not among those who believe that his majesty, the Devil, ever yet was the creator, or the rightful owner, of one intelligent being in the universe of God;) therefore the moment man becomes convinced that he has such a friend in heaven, as we have described, he will—he must love him. All, therefore, who feel such an unholy, man-debasing spirit as to desire to sin and blaspheme against God, because he intends ultimately to bestow his free and unlimited grace and salvation upon all his offspring, without partiality or distinction, most certainly are in an awfully deplorable condition—not unlike the impious ones of our Saviour's day, who asked if they should command fire from heaven to destroy his enemies. "But he rebuked them and said, 'Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of; for the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them,'" Let all such beware how they speak, for there is one that accuses them and rebukes sharply, even Christ the Lord. "Wo unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and all uncleanness. Even so ye also appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity." But why are they not willing, that all should go to heaven? Is there a parent on earth who approaches so near a demon in human form, as to be willing to leave a part of his own offspring to welter in the flames of wo—yea, even to exult in their misery, and to rejoice and sing loud hallelujahs, when he shall look over heaven's high battlements down on their infinite and unending tortures, with fiends and damned spirits in hell? God forbid! Who then would be happy in heaven? Not one!

For one we would say, let us all go to heaven together, or sink to hell. Let us leave no one behind on whom our soul's best affections are lavished, for it would be no heaven to us. We would say with the untutored red man of the forest, when informed by the missionary that his ancestors had gone to that drear abode—"let us all go there together." He spoke the words of his heart, and there was more of the religion and of the spirit of heaven comprehended in them than in many of our elaborate, high-sounding discourses at the present day—more Godlike love manifested for his kindred, and, we fear, more real and disinterested benevolence, than dwells in the heart of many a white man. We there see the impress of Deity—the spirit of love engraven as with the finger of the Almighty. O, ye partialists! come, and learn a lesson from the rude and barbarous savages of the wood! Come, and they will teach you the first rudiments of the religion of the despised Nazarene! Hear them tell of the daring deeds of their brave and fearless warriors, and ancestors! Mark how the eye kindles with love and animation not of earth while they dwell on their virtuous actions and noble heroism! See their dark visages brighten up, and their souls beam forth in their every look and motion. How think ye they would receive it did ye tell them, that those same revered and loved spirits were now writhing in the vengeance of God's ire? Would they love such a Being? Go to them and tell them there is a way provided for their escape—tell them of the joys of the upper world—of the crowns that await them there if they prove faithful, and how would they receive it? They would spurn your offers of mercy if to be enjoyed by themselves alone! O, let us not, in this boasted land of Christianity, be less consistent in our ideas of God and his government than the Indian! Let us ever act up to the principles of our great High Priest, by doing as we would wish to be done by, at all times. Endeavor to live as heirs of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, which fadeth not away.

For the Magazine and Advocate

The Rev. Luther Lee, of backing-out memory, brings forward in his book, oddly entitled Universalism Examined, (a book, by the by, that contains a little of every thing old and new, that could be picked up against Universalism, and but very little of anything to the purpose,) the objection that Universalism "is not especially comforting to the truly pious," and that it "administers no special comfort to the devoted, praying Christian," meaning, undoubtedly, that numerous and popular class of religionists who are so frequently heard boasting of their piety, of the loudness and number of their prayers, (which, it is feared, are frequently made for a mere pretence,) and who in their deportment towards their fellow creatures, who stand equally as good in the sight of Heaven as themselves, virtually say, "stand by yourselves—come not near us, for we are holier than ye are." They are of that class who thank God they are not as other men, and who say as did the good old deacon, "if all our neighbors are going to heaven, we don't want to!" Father Hosea Ballou, of Boston, has written in reply to the above mentioned objection the following excellent article, which I would respectfully request Brs. Grosh and Bartlett to copy into the columns of the Magazine and Advocate. I do not make the request in consequence of any great importance attached to either Mr. Lee or his book. No. Mr. Lee's mean and cowardly conduct during his discussion with Br. Pitt Morse—his procuring the expulsion of his opponent's articles from the columns of the Christian (!) Advocate and Journal—the bitter and malignant spirit exhibited by him towards Br. Morse, with whom he was unable to contend in manly and honorable controversy—his mean, ungentlemanly treatment of Brs. Skinner and Grosh, who had granted him every indulgence that a man could ask—and above all, the barefaced and scandalous falsehood published three different times by him to the world, that he was shut out from discussing in the columns of the Magazine and Advocate, the question in debate between him and Br. Morse—have lost him the confidence and esteem of all high-minded and honorable men. It is not therefore in consequence of any influence possessed by Mr. Lee, or his book, that I make the request, but because I consider father Ballou's article the best one on that subject that I have ever seen. From the Trumpet and Magazine.

MR. LEE.

On pages 298, 299, Mr. Lee states the following objections to the doctrine of Universalism:

"Universalism is not specially comforting to the truly pious, but administers consolation to none but the ungodly. The godly have every assurance of salvation whether it be true or false; hence, their own hope of salvation does not depend upon the truth of Universalism, but upon a knowledge of their present acceptance with God, being justified by faith, and already in the way to heaven. Should it prove true that those who live and die in sin will be forever lost, it would not endanger the salvation of those who fear God and keep his commandments. Taking this view, we see that so far as relates to personal hope and comfort, Universalism can administer nothing to the truly pious which they may not enjoy without it, or which they may not enjoy knowing it to be false. But while Universalism administers nothing to the personal comfort of the pious, it really administers to the comfort and hope of the wicked of every description, so far as they believe it. It says to them that sin cannot endanger their final salvation. Universalism says to the drunkard that though he must suffer here in the loss of property, character, and the aching of a feverish brain, yet drunkenness cannot endanger his final salvation; that just in proportion as he shortens his life by intemperance he will hasten his flight to heaven; and if at any time he shall drink so much as to destroy life, or if he meet with some fatal accident in a defenceless hour of intoxication, for such last drunken fit he will have no after pain, but will awake in heaven and find himself shouting among the angels and redeemed spirits. Universalism says to the murderer, that though he must be somewhat disturbed with horrors of a guilty conscience, and be hanged by the neck if he be detected, yet all the murders he can commit cannot shut him out of heaven at last; that should he be called to expiate his crimes upon the gallows, yet it would be but a momentary pang, from whence he will make a precipitate retreat to heaven, where he will meet the victim for whose murder he was hanged, and will have the opportunity of congratulating him on their premature arrival in glory," &c.

The argument against Universalism contained in the foregoing extract from Mr. Lee's work, is by no means new. It has been in common use for half a century, and has been a theme on which the enemies of divine truth, have delighted to dwell, and to make a display of their wonderful powers of ridicule. Sober Christian people, whose minds are well informed, and whose hearts are properly affected with the benevolent sentiments of the gospel, need no argument to refute such inconsistent statements; but there may be some in community whose discernment does not detect the weakness which to others is sufficiently apparent. For the benefit of such, a few suggestions are here submitted.

In relation to our author's reasoning, wherein he endeavors to show, that, to the truly pious, Universalism affords no comfort, we will proceed to show its unreasonableness, in a most direct manner, by making use of himself as the man who is truly pious. To this truly pious Mr. Lee, Universalism, did he believe it, and allowing it to be the truth as it is in the Lord Jesus, could yield no comfort, which he cannot enjoy while not believing it. Now if this be really a matter of fact, it necessarily follows, that this truly pious Mr. Lee derives no comfort from believing that any of the human family, besides himself, will finally obtain salvation, which he could not enjoy without such a belief! It surely cannot be necessary to labor to show, that if this truly pious Mr. Lee could enjoy any confort in believing that even one more besides himself, will finally enjoy everlasting happiness, which he cannot enjoy without such a belief, it opens a way by which his comforts might be increased by believing, that not only one more, but many, even many thousands will be with him thus blessed. Suppose God has blessed this truly pious man with a wife whom he loves as he loves his own soul, and for whose sake he would endure any hardships, or face any danger; as life wears away, and as the infirmities of age or disease give sure indications that the enjoyments of this world must soon pass away, if he can derive any comfort in believing that this object of his affection will hereafter enjoy the bliss of immortality, and that he with her shall enjoy the same, which comfort he could not have without this belief, then this truly pious man has reasoned falsely.—We would beg of Mr. Lee to look at this subject and contemplate it seriously. Let him ask himself the question, is there any more comfort in believing that this faithful companion of my bosom will with me enjoy everlasting happiness, after our earthly sorrows and joys are past, than there would be in beliving that when death shall separate us it will separate us forever; and when I shall be favored with a welcome to eternal bliss, I shall know that she is doomed to endless wo?—Keep your eye on this subject, Mr. Lee; you are the truly pious man with whom your argument has to do.

If the reader should say, that we press this pious man into too close a corner; that we ought to allow him to derive comfort from believing that some few of his beloved connexions will enjoy salvation with him, we ask how many? Besides his dear wife, would he wish to embrace some of his and her children? Hark! he overhears us! He says he wants all his children? ALL? This sounds too much like Universalism. Well, allow him his wife, and all his children; will he now say, that he does not care for another soul of Adam's whole race? Does this truly pious enemy of universal salvation entertain no comfort in believing that he shall enjoy everlasting happiness with that kind father and that affectionate mother who watched over his infancy and guided his youth, which he could not as fully enjoy if he believed them doomed to everlasting wo? Now if this is not the case, then has he reasoned most fallaciously.

What is Universalism, and what does it teach, and for what does it hope? It is universal love; it embraces all moral beings with benevolent desires; it prays in faith that sin may come to an end; that all men may come to the knowledge of the truth; love the Lord Jesus Christ; love God with all the heart, and one another as they love themselves. This is Universalism; and this is what it teaches; and for this it hopes and prays. But Mr. Lee's argument represents him as having no love for mankind; no desires that sinners may be brought to repentance, and to love and obey God; not a wish that any should be saved from sin but just himself! According to his bold and barefaced statement, he thinks he should enjoy as much comfort in believing that the whole human family except himself, will hate God and sin against him to all eternity, as he should in believing that the time will come when all men shall love, and obey, and enjoy their Maker!

In replying to Mr. Lee's argument in which he contends that Universalism gives comfort to the wicked, and encourages the sinful in the ways of transgression, we shall say to him as Nathan said to David: "Thou art the man." Yes, Mr. Lee's argument says, that if he believed in universal salvation, he would from this belief comfort himself in drunkenness with the reflection, that by it he might shorten his days and hasten his flight to heaven; and in the indulgence of a wicked, murderous spirit, would comfort himself with the reflection that he should soon go from the scaffold to heaven, and congratulate the victim whom he murdered on their premature arrival in heaven. What a blessing to society it is that Mr. Lee is not a Universalist! What keeps him from drunkenness? The fear of hell. What keeps him from committing murder? The fear of hell. Will he say that he means no such thing; that what he means is that other men will do those wicked things? Let him remember that divine inspiration says—"Thou art inexcusable, O man, whoever thou art that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same thing."

This argument, which we are here noticing, is precisely the same which the enemies of the Gospel urged against the apostles when they accused them of teaching men to do evil that good might come. The argument now is the same it was then; the spirit of those who urge it now the same as it was then; and the blindness indicated by it is the same it was then. Because Paul and his brother apostles taught the heavenly doctrine that where sin abounded grace much more abounded, their enemies brought the objection against them which Mr. Lee now urges against Universalism. By so doing he bears stronger testimony in favor of Universalism than is in his power to bring against it.

Wherein lies our author's mistake? By what divine declaration can he be set right? See Paul's reply to the question, "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?" To this question he gives the following answer: "God forbid; how shall we who are dead to sin live any longer therein?" What rendered the believers in Jesus dead to sin? That faith which worked by love. What did they believe? They believed that where sin abounded grace much more abounded. This faith works by love, and love fulfils the law by obeying it.

Standing in this heavenly light we detect the fallacy of Mr. Lee's argument by discovering that it supposes that those who believe the truth as it is revealed in Jesus, and love God and all mankind; and who hope and believe that our heavenly Father will bring all men to love, obey and worship him in spirit and in truth, will be led by such a belief into sin, so as to hate God, violate his commandments, hate one another, and murder and destroy one another. How astonishingly blind must a man be to use such arguments!—How strangely infatuated must he be to publish to the world such folly! Does Mr. Lee know what he does? Surely he does not. And we will pray for him as Jesus prayed for his enemies: "Father, forgive," etc. H. B.

UTICA, FRIDAY, AUGUST 30, 1839.

A FALSE CHARGE REFUTED.

MESSRS. CAMPBELL AND SHEPARD'S ROCHESTER CONVENTION, A NONENTITY.—I have a somewhat long story to tell, and must therefore be brief in my introductory remarks. The following article appeared in the Star in the West, in March last—since which time I have been following it up, in order to trace it to its author. Like "the three crows," it came down to "something as black as a crow" in Mr. S. E. Shepard's letter—who gives a dead man for his authority, so that the testimony can not be further subjected to examination! But facts and records open to examination, the utter absence of the witness' name in our periodicals, and frequently dublished lists of preachers, and other circumstances, induce a suspicion that the "something as black as a crow" came from the first tellers of the story, rather than from the party against whom they have industriously circulated the slander! It is a common trick among some polemics, when beaten in fair controversy, to shelter themselves by calling their opponents infidels—as if proving that that opponent is an unbeliever in what he so ably advocated, would be a healing balm to soothe a conscious inability to overthrow his arguments! Both Messrs. Campbell and Shepard have tried the strength of Universalism, in controversies with Messrs. Skinner and Montgomery, and, in public estimation generally—even in the estimation which each placed upon the favorite dogma advocated by the other—they have completely failed, been beaten. Whether, therefore, they only affect to believe their silly, groundless tale against Universalists, or not; it is certain that if they can only persuade the public that we are infidels in disguise, it will account very satisfactorily, why Universailsts were able, by reason and Scripture, to refute Mr. Campbell's theory of endless sin and suffering, and Mr. Shepard's theory of the annihilation of the wicked—which two harmonious doctrines, united, constitute "the ancient ORDER of things"!!!

But enough—to the statement, after reading which, the reader will judge for himself.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL—AND A STORY.

This gentleman seems of late to have become highly displeased with Universalism; and he improves every opportunity which he thinks can be used to advantage to vent his spleen and indignation against it. His last letter to Br. Skinner was really, in the language of Br. Grosh, "an out pouring of wrath." It was undignified, ungentlemanly, and indicated any thing but candor and a love of truth. But what is the matter? What has so ruffled the temper of the "great Mr. Campbell," and called forth his ire against Universalists? Have they misused or abused him? Not to our knowledge: as far as our information extends they have had little to say about him, although they generally look upon him it is true, as a vain and self-conceited man. They pity him for these weaknesses, for they are so conspicuous that every one must notice them who reads his writings: they acknowledge he possesses much talent, and more low cunning—but they have no desire to magnify his faults.

Not so with him: he rudely assails us in his paper, in the pulpit, and in the private circle. All this he does to our knowledge: and in his late tour South, he has been very industrious in circulating the most ridiculous stories about Universalists and Universalism. He thought no doubt to palm them off upon the people, without being detected. But he is altogether mistaken in his calculation; it so happens that we have communication with southern friends: and that the most of all such tales reach us not only from that section of the country, but others; and we would here forewarn him and other like characters—"your sins will surely find you out."

And now for one of his most marvellous stories.—That there may be no mistake about our authority, we will just say, that the Rev. Mr. A. Campbell did, two or three weeks since, while on board the steam boat Commerce, on a trip to New-Orleans, state to, and in the presence of a number of Ladies, that in the year 1835 a Convention of fifty-two Universalist ministers met in the city of Rochester, N. Y., and there deliberated whether they should come out and avow to the world that they disbelieved the Bible, or whether they should continue to quote and preach from the Bible.—His language we do not pretend to give exactly, but the idea conveyed was, that they were in reality all infidels, but were divided on the question of expediency about declaring themselves such to the world. Some were for deceiving the people by making them believe that they held to divine Revelation, while four-fifths voted in favor of boldly proclaiming themselves skeptics. And he gave for his authority the name of Silas E. Shepard. What a tale this for A. Campbell to be circulating through the south and west! A more ridiculous, inconsistent story we never heard. Falsehood is marked upon its very face; and Mr. Campbell, if he knows any thing of the Universalists, knows that it can not have the least shadow of evidence in its favor. And any man of common understanding should be ashamed to tell it. But for a person of his pretensions to be circulating it through the country as truth, is evidence enough that he is any thing but what he pretends to be. Such low business is beneath a gentleman or a Christian. However, we suppose the Ladies with whom he had to contend on this subject, were found too intelligent to be reasoned out of their doctrine, and so he thought best to entrench himself behind such tales as the above.—Poor Mr. Campbell! The Universalist Ladies refuted all his arguments, and to save himself from an entire defeat, he attempts to frighten them with ghostly fables of infidelity! He must be a very brave man indeed. The truth in the case is, A. Campbell has been entirely defeated in his discussion with Br. D. Skinner, and he severely feels it; and he is now endeavoring to make up his loss in arguments by circulating through the community low and petty stories that have no foundation in truth against the Universalists. As he finds himself unable to meet their arguments he grows more and more enraged, and thinks to sustain himself by blustering and raising a wonderful cry about infidelity, evil tendency, etc. Let him go on—his exertions against the truth will be as fruitless as were the Babelites of ancient days in building a tower to heaven.

And now Br. Grosh, of the Magazine and Advocate, will you please to enlighten us in relation to this wonderful convention at Rochester! Br., was you a member of it? If so, you can tell us which side you were on at least. Please give us a little information also about Mr. Shepard, who had the honor of reporting its proceedings before Mr. Campbell.

As I deemed it best not to stir publicly in the matter, until I had gained all the information I could get respecting it, I did not reply to the jocose questions here proposed by Br. Gurley, but immediately addressed myself to Mr. Campbell, to whom I was about to write, in reply to some of his proposals for exchanging and publishing his and Mr. Skinner's concluding letters. I put both matters into one letter, believing that the importance of the latter would secure attention to the former. After despatching what I had to say in behalf of Br. Skinner, touching his proposals for ending the discussion, I wrote as follows—my letter being dated early in April, say on the 4th or 5th.

Letter to A. Campbell.

"I have just received the 'Sentinel and Star in the West,' published in Cincinnati, Ohio, on the 23d ult. The Editor, Rev. J. A. Gurley, says—'The Rev. Mr. A. Campbell, did, two or three weeks since while on board the steam boat COMMERCE on a trip to New-Orleans, state to, and in the presence of a number of Ladies, that in the year 1836, a Convention of fifty-two Universalist ministers met in the city of Rochester, N. Y., and there deliberated whether they should come out and avow to the world that they disbelieved the Bible, or whether they should continue to quote and preach from the Bible. His language we do not pretend to give exactly, but the idea conveyed was, that they were in reality all infidels, but were divided on the question of expediency about declaring themselves as such to the world. Some were for deceiving the people by making them believe that they held to divine revelation, while four-fifths voted in favor of boldly proclaiming themselves skeptics. And he gave for his authority the name of Silas E. Shepard.'"

"I have my doubts about this story, which is related of you—certain it is, that whoever told you of this Convention, has related what is not true, nor even in the neighborhood of fact. May I, then, respectfully inquire of you if this statement by Mr. Gurley is correct? If so, who is this Mr. Silas E. Shepard, and where does he reside?—Believe me, Sir, that in soliciting your answer to these questions, I ask but what I should feel it my duty to grant in an exchange of circumstances. Your answer, I think it but fair to say, will be used for the purpose of procuring a fair and manly correction of error, wherever it may lie, and whatever it may be. If you never made the statement attributed to you, it is due to you, and to the Universalist clergy of this State, to make your denial public. If you did, then Mr. Shepard should be appealed to for his authority for such an unfounded and wholesale slander, that the whole affair may be probed to the bottom, and justice be done to all parties concerned.

"Respectfully yours, A. B. GROSH."

"Rev. A. Campbell."

This letter was sent early in April. Before that, two letters had been received from Mr. C., in which he appeared very anxious to arrange speedily the preliminaries for exchanging and publishing simultaneously the final letters of the discussion between himself and Mr. Skinner. In this same letter to him, I accepted (for Mr. Skinner) his offer that Mr. Skinner might occupy 8 pages of the Harbinger, and proposed a modification of his plan for exchanging the letters—a modification which Mr. C. accepted in July last. Well—Mr. Skinner wrote to Mr. C. from Buffalo, on the 25th of May, referring distinctly to my April letter, and agreeing in effect to what I had there accepted and proposed. Mr. Campbell never answered my April letter, nor acknowledged the receipt of Mr. Skinner's of May 25! If he did not get mine, what became of his haste to arrange preliminaries, that he could coolly leave the whole subject untouched for nearly three months? If he got Mr. Skinner's, (and it will be seen below that he does not deny having received it,) why not acknowledge its reception; and, seeing a reference in it to my letter, why not write to know distinctly what my letter contained if he had not received it? If he did not get either my letter or Mr. Skinner's, is it not a singular circumstance that those two letters, mailed about 50 days apart, at Utica and at Buffalo, should both miscarry?

Leaving these questions for the consideration of the reader, I proceed with my narrative.

In the latter part of June, (nearly a month after Mr. S.'s letter,) a letter was received by Mr. S., from Mr. C., in which no mention was made of either of our letters to him, nor of the propositions and acceptance of propositions contained in them. It accordingly became the duty of Mr. Skinner to direct Mr. Campbell's attention to those acceptances and propositions, and on the same sheet I again addressed Mr. C. as follows:—

"Utica, June 21st, 1839.

"Dear Sir—In the 'Sentinel and Star in the West,' published in Cincinnati, Ohio, on March 23d, the Editor, Rev. J. A. Gurley, says—[Here follows the extract before given. A. B. G.]

"Did you, Sir, receive my letter containing the above extract? If so, may I respectfully inquire, why it was not answered? If not, may I here be permitted to repeat the questions I asked in that letter?—Is this statement of Mr. Gurley correct? If so, who is this Mr. Silas E. Shepard, and where does he reside?—I do think that if you made the above statement, you owe it to yourself, as well as to a denomination that is innocent of the charges there made, to inform us who your author is, and where we may call on him for his authority. If you did not make the statement, it is your due to be exonerated from the charge of making it. I declare to you, that no such convention was ever held to the best of my knowledge and belief, and hope you will soon reply to this, that I may probe the affair to the bottom, and leave the blame fall where it justly belongs. I ask of you, Sir, only what I would feel bound to grant in an exchange of circumstances. You can reply to this in your reply to Mr. Skinner's on the preceding page.

"Rev. A. Campbell."

To this letter an answer came in July, but nothing said of Mr. Skinner's letter of May 25th, referring to mine; nor any reasons given for the subsidence of his haste and anxiety to settle the mode and conditions of exchanging the final letters, from March to the 20th of June! I give so much of his letter to Mr. Skinner, (verbatim, even to the italicising,) as relates to my letters on the subject in hand.

"Bethany, Va., July 4th, 1839.

"Mr. Skinner, Sir—" * * * * Please state to Mr. Grosh that the first sight or hearing that I have had of the Reported conversation aboard the Commerce was in your letter, In reply to which I answer that the conversation is not accurately stated.

"I did not mention the year 1836. 1837. but I said that I learned from Silas E. Shepard who had it from his own brother a universalian preacher and a member of that meeting, convention &ca. or whatever it was—that either during the meeting, in public or private assembly—such a matter as reported was discussed, and an overwhelming majority were for casting off the mask, amongst whom the aforesaid Shepard was one.

"Mr. Silas E. Shepard* told me this while I was in New-York in 1836, and I think he said his Brother had published it in Rochester, in a paper of which he was at that time editor. But of this I am not certain.

"Such was the substance of the matter and as such I give it, believing it on the testimony aforesaid to be correct, and to have happened a year or two before I was there. All of which is respectfully submitted by Yours truly, A. CAMPBELL."

Immediately after receiving this long waited-for reply to my inquiries, I addressed the following to Mr. Shepard:

"Utica, July 12, 1839.

"Dear Sir—An anxious desire to correct an erroneous statement which involves the character of a large denomination of Christians on the one hand, or the veracity of some prominent individuals on the other,—and to do it with the least expense of good feeling, or liability to mistakes—induces me to address this letter to you. The subject of it is as follows:—In March last, the 'Sentinel and Star in the West,' published in Cincinnati, Ohio, stated that Rev. Mr. A. Campbell did, [here followed the remainder of the extract, as furnished in my first letter to Mr. Campbell. A. B. G.]

"Immediately on reading this article, I addressed a letter to Mr. Campbell, enclosing it, and asking whether it was true—and not receiving any reply, I wrote again in June. His reply has just been received. It is as follows:—

"'In reply to which' [my letter] 'I answer,' [here followed the remainder of the extract from Mr. Campbell's letter, as published above. A. B. G.]

"Such, my dear Sir, is Mr. Campbell's courteous reply to my inquiries; and in the same spirit of candor, and desire for truth only, I now respectfully inquire of you—Is there any mistake in Mr. Campbell's statement? If so, what is it? Be pleased. also, to state your Brother's name; the Association in which he lived, and from which he had obtained fellowship at the time this convention or meeting was held? When this meeting was held in Rochester, and the title by which it was known, and the house in which it met? I would also be much obliged to you for a copy of the paper containing your brother's publication, if any such was made—or information by which I, or some friend for me, could obtain a sight of the file—and also your brother's present Post-office address.

"Now, lest I be misunderstood, let me frankly state, that I do not believe any such meeting was held in Rochester, or elsewhere; that, in my opinion, the story has grown out of some error or misconception, and is virtually and substantially untrue. But if I am mistaken in this opinion, I wish to know it—and soon. If the story is false, (and I am certain it is,) justice to an injured people, no less than to yourself and Mr Campbell, demands that it should be corrected as early as possible, that its further circulation may be stopped, and your motives in circulating it may not be misunderstood by those who disbelieve it.

"Believing that you will agree with me in this matter of simple justice, I await your reply. Address, Respectfully yours, A. B. Grosh, Utica, N. Y."

"Mr. Silas E. Shepard."

A few days brought the following, post marked, "Troy, Pa., 20th July."

"Troy, July 19, 1839.

"Dear Sir:—Having been absent for five weeks, I have had no opportunity of reading your very candid

[Note by Mr. Campbell.]—
"Formerly of Auburn, now of Bradford county, Pa. Troy P. O."

and reasonable letter of the 12th inst., till this morning; and I now hasten to reply.

"I called on my brother, Dr. Luke Shepard, in Rochester, N. Y., on the 15th day of December, 1835, to induce him, if possible, to discontinue "THE WORLD AS IT IS," a paper devoted to the advocacy of infidelity, and of which he was Editor. My visit, as a matter of course, led to a protracted discussion of the claims of Christianity on the confidence of mankind; and in the course of conversation he affirmed that he did not believe that the religious community, generally, had any confidence in the Scriptures. I replied that, from the acquaintance which I had formed with the various societies of professed Christians, I had come to a very different conclusion. He then said that he had long known that an overwhelming majority of the Universalist preachers had no more confidence in the Scriptures than he had—that there had recently been a private convention of a respectable number of the Universalist clergy, the object of which was to decide whether it was expedient for them to continue to quote from the Scriptures, as if they believed them to be of divine authority, or to throw off the mask and let the world know that they had no confidence "in the pious frauds" of the Bible; and that a large majority of them thought it better to do so, but that a minority held that the state of society was not yet prepared for a measure of that kind, and that they had better defer it a few years longer: but that for his part, he judged that the time had arrived which called for such a measure, and therefore he had given being to "The World as it is," and that if the others did not come out soon, he would expose the whole affair in his paper.—These facts I stated to Brother Campbell when he was at my house; and from the time of this conversation with my brother, until I saw an account of his death in a Rochester paper, I was in the confident expectation of a full disclosure of the whole matter. But his death, which happened on the 20th April, 1837, forbid me to expect any thing of that nature from that quarter, although I have continued to think that some other person would make a disclosure.

I can not inform you in what association he lived, nor from what association he obtained fellowship; nor did I ever ask him these questions. But he and others informed me that he spent some time in the proclamation of Universalism in Courtland and Tompkins counties, N Y.

I did not interrogate him as to the time, nor place, of the aforesaid meeting, as I expected he would make a full disclosure of the whole affair.

"Very Respectfully, S. E. Shepard."

"Mr. A. B. Grosh."

Immediately after receiving this letter, I wrote to Br. Montgomery, Standing Clerk of the Cayuga Association of Universalists, (which, since 1823, has existed as an Association, and embraces the counties of Onondaga, Cayuga, Cortland, Tioga and Tompkins, in its bounds,) to examine its records, and inform me whether the name of Dr. Luke Shepard appears on them as a preacher or layman of our order, in all its lists of preachers or of lay delegates, etc.; and of such other information as he could procure. I also addressed a letter to Br. Chase, pastor of the Universalist society in Rochester, N. Y., requesting him to procure, and forward to me, information respecting Dr. Luke Shepard, his character for veracity, and standing in society, etc., from such sources as would be responsible; for that I intended using it publicly, and wanted nothing that would not bear the test of scrutiny. Br. Montgomery replies—

"Auburn, July 15, 1839.

"Dear Br.—In reply to your letter, I would state that the name of Dr. Luke Shepard does not occur in the records of the Cayuga Association, as a minister, delegate, or otherwise. I would remark, however, that there is no regular list of the preachers on the records for 1824; but of the delegates only;—no list of delegates or preachers for 1825;—no list of delegates for 1826; but of preachers only;—no list of delegates or preachers for 1830 and 1831;—no list of delegates for 1832; but of preachers only. The rest of the lists are perfect.—Thine in haste. G. W. Montgomery."

As the defective lists all occur previous to 1833, and as Dr. Luke Shepard is said to have been a Universalist preacher "recently," previous to "December, 1835," this testimony is conclusive—there was no Universalist preacher named Luke Shepard, residing in Tompkins or Cortland county, between 1832 and 1839. But to make the matter more satisfactory, in the Magazine and Advocate, vol. 4, page 144, we published a list of all the then known Universalist preachers in this State, for 1833, and added to it all then omitted, on page 172, and the name of Luke Shepard is not among them. In all the additions to the ministry, and lists of preachers since published in the Magazine and Advocate, no such name can be found. This may seem to some, being unnecessarily exact, inasmuch if we had had such a preacher, since 1830, Br. Skinner or myself would be likely to know it; but I reply, that I do not rest my assertion on mere memory—it is based on records carefully kept, published to the world, and now open for inspection to any one who doubts my word—that Dr Luke Shepard never was a Universalist preacher in this State.

But I have not yet done with this subject. Br. Chase has not yet replied to my letter, though he has promised to do so soon. When his reply comes, I will offer a few remarks upon it, as well as a few more additional to the above, which I now omit for the want of room.

Meanwhile, I call for proof that any Universalist Convention was ever held in Rochester previous to last Spring—that any body of 50 Universalist preachers ever assembled west of Utica—that any deliberation ever was had in any of our ecclesiastical bodies, in public or in private, on the expediency of disavowing belief in the Scriptures—or that Dr. Luke Shepard ever was a Universalist preacher, or even a lay member of any of our Associational or Conventional councils. If Messrs. Campbell and Shepard are sincere in professing to believe this story which they circulate, surely some of these items can be proved—especially as we will give them all the aid they can ask in searching for the proof. More anon.

WORKS AND CONSEQUENCS.....NO. II.

Religion can no more live without works, than a flame can exist confined from the atmosphere. The mind, under the influence of true religion, soars upward in the field of improvement, expands, and increases in vigor and purity. The boundless region of spirituality is its home, and it feeds upon the all pervading atmosphere where it dwells. God is its pattern, and though it bows in adoration to Him, and hopes not to emulate his ceaseless perfections—perfections that are the fountain of all that is good in us—it loves to become His child by cheerful obedience—by imitation which copies from an infinite, spiritual distance, and approaches in eternal progression. Hence the mind that is actuated by the principle of "pure and undefiled religion," is ever active, and never weary. What, weary of well doing! weary of contemplating that goodness, those perfections, and those duties which are its life, its hope, its enjoyment! Nay, it is its delight to do the will of Him whom it loves. While hoping, and rejoicing, and learning, it forgets not its earthly connections, but strives, in its upward aspirations, to give its energies a direction which shall embrace the good of those who, like itself are bound with mortality.

Thus the spirituality of religion diffuses itself through all the works of the creature, and teaches us that there is no neutral ground between sin and willing obedience to God. "If a man love me," says Christ, "he will keep my commandments." There can be no mental reservation, no holding back the fulfilment of a part, without an equal reservation of the affections. The spiritual impulse which accompanies every Christian, must pervade every action, or there is something lacking. So true is this, that it is necessary that the spirit of moral law should be written in the heart, in order to produce its proper influence. According to this principle was to be the dealing of Jehovah with his people, when he delivered them from the old covenant—the letter which killeth. "For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel, after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts," etc. With this law of the mind warring against the law of the members, they would find themselves furnished with a monitor which would forever forbid them from cherishing a spirit of disobedience to one duty, while cultivating an obedient mind towards another. They might ignorantly err; but this law of the spirit would make obedience the whole desire of the heart. No one, therefore, can plead that this law gives them license to commit an act, or cherish a desire, which would be sinful in another; for its office is to war against all unrighteousness; and it censures, as decidedly, sins of omission as sins of commission.—The mind commits wrong in both cases.

I do not say that he who has received this law can not sin, but it will fasten upon him immediate conviction, if he has not discarded it from his heart. The fact that the spiritual law is engaged in warfare against the law of the members—the impulse of the carnal passions—renders it probable that the latter may gain a transient supremacy over the former, and lead the creature astray. In this case man has thrown off his allegiance to the law of the spirit, departed from the spirituality of religion—without which all religion is false—and yielded obedience to that, which is of the earth, earthy, and which must of course, perish. But permit me to ask, when this earthly shall bear the image of the heavenly; when this corruption shall put on incorruption, will not man be freed from all liabilities to sin by being freed from the law of sin and death? And will not the spiritual law then reign and control supremely within him? If this law is adapted to the spiritual wants of mankind, it must continue in existence as long as man possesses a spiritual nature. As this law continues with, and ministers to the happiness of, the beatified saints, when every opposing law shall have ceased with the circumstances which called for it, we conclude that happiness here can be enjoyed only in obedience to the same law. Man's works, therefore, to be good must be in accordance with the spirituality of religion. Brethren, "if we live in the spirit, let us also walk in the spirit," remembering that "he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting."

POETRY.

[From the Star in the West.]

THE WORSHIP OF GOD.

"Let us go to the house of God."

Haste away, haste away, to the house of prayer,
And meet with the friends of the Saviour there;
With a humble, lowly and contrite heart,
Your various wants to his ear impart.

Haste away, haste away, and join in the song,
That doth to the Father of all belong;
The temple is ringing with music's soft voice,
Which causes the heart of the saint to rejoice.

Haste away, haste away, to the feast of the Lord,
Where the richest provisions in profusion are stored;
O! come all ye hungry, to this feast of the soul,
For ample provision is made for the whole.

Then away, haste away, and join with the choir,
And sing your full song with fervent desire,
'Till you join with archangels, the heavenly strain,
And sing Alleluia! for ever, Amen! J. B. S.

Galena, June, 1839.

FORGIVE AND FORGET.

Forgive and forget! why the world would be lonely,
The garden a wilderness left to deform,
If the flowers but remembered the chilling winds only,
And the fields gave no verdure for fear of the storm!
Oh! still in thy loveliness, emblem the flower,
Give the fragrance of feeling to sweeten life's way;
And prolong not again the brief cloud of an hour,
With tears that but darken the rest of the day.

Forgive and forget! there's no breast so unfeeling
But some gentle thoughts of affection there live;
And the best of us all require something concealing—
Some heart that with smiles can forget and forgive!
Then away with the cloud from those beautiful eyes,
That brow was no home for such frowns to have met;
Oh! how could our spirits o'er hope for the skies,
If Heaven refused to forgive and forget!

TALE FROM THE GERMAN.

In that beautiful part of Germany which borders on the Rhine, there is a noble castle, which, as you travel on the western banks of the river, you may see lifting its ancient towers on the opposite side above the grove of trees about as old as itself. About forty years ago there lived in that castle a noble gentleman, whom we call Baron ———. The Baron had only one son, who was not only a comfort to his father, but a blessing to all who lived on his father's land.

It happened on a certain occasion, that this young man being from home, there came a French gentleman to see the Baron. As soon as this gentleman came into the castle, he began to talk of his heavenly Father, in terms that chilled the old man's blood! on which the Baron reproved him, saying, "Are you not afraid of offending God who reigns above, by speaking in such a manner?"

The gentleman said he knew nothing about God, for he had never seen him. The Baron did not notice at this time what the gentleman said, but next morning took him about his castle and ground, and took occasion to show him a very beautiful picture that hung on the wall. The gentleman admired the picture very much; and said, "Whoever drew that picture, knows very well how to use his pencil." "My son drew that picture," said the Baron. "Then your son is a clever man," replied the gentleman. The Baron then went with his visitor into the garden, and showed him many beautiful flowers and plantations of forest trees. "Who has the ordering of this garden?" asked the gentleman. "My son," replied the Baron; "he knows every plant, I may say, from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall." "Indeed," said the gentleman, "I shall think very highly of him soon." The Baron then took him into the village, and showed him a small, neat cottage, where his son had established a school, and where he caused all young children who had lost their parents, to be received and nourished at his own expense.

The children in the house looked so innocent and happy, that the gentleman was very much pleased, and when he returned to the castle, he said to the Baron, "What a happy man you are to have so good a son." "How do you know I have so good a son?". "Because I have seen his works, and I know that he must be both good and clever if he has done all you have shown me."

"But you have never seen him." "No, but I know him very well, because I judge of him by his works." "You do! and now please to draw near this window and tell me what you observe." "Why, I see the sun travelling through the sky, and shedding its glories over one of the finest countries in the world; and I behold a mighty river at my feet, and a vast range of woods. I see pasture grounds, and orchards, and vineyards; and cattle and sheep feeding in the green fields; and many thached cottages scattered here and there." "And do you see any thing to be admired in all this? Is there any thing pleasant, or lovely, or cheerful, in all that is spread before you?" "Do you think I want common sense? or that I have lost the use of my eyes, my friend," said the gentleman somewhat angrily, "that I should not be able to relish the charms of such a scene as this?"

"Well, then," said the Baron, "if you are able to judge of my son's good character by seeing his good works, which are poor and imperfect, how does it happen that you form no judgment of the goodness of God by witnessing such wonders of his handy works as are now before you? Let me never hear you, my friend, again say that you know not God, unless you would have me suppose that you have lost your senses."

STUDIES.—The more accurately we search into the human mind, the stronger traces we every where find of His wisdom who made it. If a discourse on the use of the parts of the body may be considered as a hymn to the Creator, the use of the passions, which are the organs of the mind, can not be barren of praise to Him, nor unproductive to ourselves, of that noble and uncommon union of science and admiration which a contemplation of the works of infinite Wisdom alone can afford to a rational mind; whilst, referring to Him whatever we find of right or good or fair in ourselves, discovering his strength and wisdom even in our own weakness and imperfection, honoring them where we discover them clearly, and adoring their profundity where we are lost in our search, we may be inquisitive without impertinence, and elevated without pride;—we may be admitted, if I dare say so, into the councils of the Almighty, by a consideration of his works.—The elevation of our mind ought to be the principal end of all our studies, which, if they do not in some measure effect, they are of very little service to us.—Burke.

A CAUTION.—The following anecdote was related to us as a fact, and as we are not aware that it has been ever in print, we publish it for the benefit of all whom it may concern.

A young gentleman, not remarkable for either talent or intelligence, was in the habit of visiting a family in which there were, among others, two ladies and a little girl.

What induced the convesation we are not prepared to say, (perhaps it might have been some suspicious looks, or signs, or words from him,) but the ladies were discussing his acquirements in the presence of the child, and one of them in the course of the remarks observed that "Mr ———, had a soft place in his head."

This was treasured up by the child, and at a subsequent visit, the young Phrenologist commenced an examination of the gentleman's cranium, for the purpose of ascertaining where this new organ was situated.—Unfortunately, she imagined she found it; and the mathematician who ran through the streets crying out "Eureka," when he had solved a difficult problem, was scarcely more delighted than she, when to the discomfiture of the ladies she exclaimed, "Oh! sister, Mr. ——— really has, as you said, a soft place in his head, for here it is under my finger now!"

It is almost unnecessary to add, we never expect to have the pleasure of publishing the marriage of Mr. ———, to either of the ladies referred to.—Snow Hill Banner.

IMPORTANCE OF CORRECT COLLOCATION IN WRITING, ILLUSTRATED.—Mr. Godwin, while engaged in writing the Life of Lord Chatham, applied to a friend, who had been present at the delivery of a celebrated speech of Chatham's, on the "household freedom" of England, for an account of that speech. His friend, among other striking passages, repeated to him the following: "An Englishman's house is his castle. Its roof may be of straw, the winds may whistle around it, the rain and the snow may enter it, but the king can not—he dare not." Godwin wrote down the passage as follows, and it appears thus in his work: "An Englishman's house is his castle. Its roof may be of straw, the snow and the rain may enter it, the winds may whistle around it, but the king can not—he dare not."

"An Indian once brought up a young lion, and finding him weak and harmless, never attempted to control him. Every day the lion gained in strength and became more untractable; until, at last, when excited by rage, he fell upon the Indian and tore him to pieces. Our evil habits and evil passions very much resemble this lion."

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 19th inst., HENRY CLAY, son of H. D. and Mary Ann Boughton, aged 2 years.

In this city, on the 20th inst., an infant daughter and only child of Nathan and Laura Shippy. Services by Rev. T. D. Cook.

In Warsaw, August 1st, after about 3 weeks confinement, Mrs. HANNAH WILSON, consort of Mr. Daniel Wilson, aged 63 years. Sister Wilson embraced the faith of universal grace some years ago, and by her daily deportment secured the confidence of those who knew her. This faith supported her mind during her last sickness. At all times, when reason was with her, she expressed her unwavering faith in the Gospel of a world's salvation, and continued to rest in this glorious hope until her spirit returned to "God who gave it," there to bask in the smiles of undying love. She has left a husband and family to lament their loss. Her funeral was attended at the Universalist church in Pavilion, the 2d inst., when the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners and friends, from Col. iii: 2, by the writer. May God, in his infinite love, sanctify this bereavment to the good of all concerned, causing them to set their "affections on things above and not on things of earth."

A. K.

At the residence of his widowed mother, near St. Charles, (Mo.,) March 1st, after an illness of 48 hours, of the measles, SETH COLE, aged 22 years, 4 months and 5 days. He was the son of Mr. Luther Cole, deceased, formerly of Augusta, Oneida county, N. Y.

The deceased was a young man of great promise, possessed of much intrinsic worth, and universally esteemed by all who had the pleasure of sharing in his acquaintance. He was peculiarly endeared to his relations, who have keenly felt and deeply lamented his untimely death. Possessed of a fine genius, and buoyant with unostentatious emulation, our departed friend was fast gaining a merited share of applause and wealth. But, alas, he is called away in the very bloom and vigor of life, from his doating and affectionate relations, no more to participate in the interchange of reciprocal benefits; no more to elevate the standard of art, nor encourage by his own example the onward and mighty march of mind; no more to honor by his friendship and society his numerous friends and acquaintances who so deeply and universally deplore his untimely end.

But the God of love and mercy will support and comfort them, and finally reunite them in a world where parting shall be known no more, and where the mourner's tears shall be dried with the smiles of everlasting joy.

E. McN.

At Theresa, on the 12th inst., of consumption, Mr. WM. SEMANS, aged 28 years. Through a long and distressing sickness he was fully sustained, by an unwavering trust in the unbounded mercy and goodness of his heavenly Father—and an unshaken faith in the glorious doctrine of impartial grace. His death was peaceful, happy and triumphant—or is adding another to the long list of those who have proved that "Universalism will do to die by." A wife and three small children are thus left to mourn the loss of a husband and father. May that God who is "a father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widow," sustain them under this and every trial they may be called to endure, give them "the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." The funeral services were attended on the 13th, when the doctrine of a resurrection to immortality, was presented to a congregation of sympathising friends, by H. L. HAYWARD.

In Danube, of consumption, on the 28th of July, Mrs CLARISSA, consort of Mr. Andrew Shoemaker, of Mohawkville, and daughter of John and Polly Caspares, of Stark, aged 19 years, 11 months, and 19 days. Her funeral was attended on the 30th, at the meeting house in Newville, and a sermon delivered to a large and attentive congregation. This is the second companion which has been taken from the embrace of our bereaved brother. Truly can he say, I am the man that hath seen affliction—yet he mourns not as those that have no hope. With patience and resignation did our sister bear her last lingering illness, retaining unwavering confidence in God's impartial goodness, and casting herself into his arms, and breathing her life out sweetly there. May the same faith that comforted and sustained her in the hour of death, comfort and sustain her bereaved husband through all the meanderings of this mortal life.

LOVE TO GOD AND MAN—NO. II.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

There are many ways in which God manifests his love for the children of men—many ways in which he shows himself to be their Father and Friend. Some of these we have pointed out, we will point out more of them.

By the afflictive dispensations of his providence, God manifests his great love towards us. Afflictions are designed for the benefit of those who experience them. They remind us that we are dependant beings—dependant upon a higher source than man—upon that high and holy Being who created us. It is sometimes the case, that when success has crowned the undertakings of man, and the tide of his prosperity is not impeded by a single obstacle, he forgets his dependance upon God, and that from his bountiful hand has proceeded all the blessings he enjoys. But when loss follows hard upon loss—when his riches take to themselves wings and fly away—when the hour of adversity is come, and poverty and want sit down at the threshold of his dwelling, he is reminded of this fact; he is made to feel his dependance upon his Father in heaven, and to conduct himself accordingly.

Afflictions likewise, are a benefit to us, by reminding us of the great and inestimable value of religion. There are times and seasons when we are apt to think that earth possesses every thing necessary for our happiness. But when misfortune overtakes us, and our pathway is overshadowed with darkness, we behold "vanity" written upon every earthly object. We are soon assured that we have been indulging in delusive dreams, and that earth has no substantial peace or happiness to give. If these things are so, then afflictions are but manifestations of a Father's love, and of the undying interest he takes in the welfare of the children of men. And we ought to view them as such, and not as the manifestations of the anger, and wrath, and resentment of the Deity. God chastens the sons and daughters of men for their profit; he afflicts them for their good, and hence is actuated by motives of the purest benevolence, and not by feelings of hatred or ill-will.

Inflicting chastisements upon us when we stray from the walks of duty, and run counter to the divine laws, is another way in which God manifests his love for us, and shows himself to be a wise and benevolent Father. This may seem a strange idea to many, but it is because they look upon punishment as an end and not as a means. Punishment, under the all-wise government of God, is designed for the reformation of the offender. When man hardens his heart, and blinds his eye, and deafens his ear, and rushes on in the way of the transgressor, stripes are inflicted by the hand of divine Justice, that he may be led to search and try his ways, and return back to duty and his God. The child leaves his father's house where there is bread enough and to spare, and takes his journey to a far off country, where he riots in the practice of sin, debases his moral and intellectual powers, and brings himself into a dark and loathsome bondage. The reward of his hands is given him. In the barren deserts of transgression, there is no food for the inner man; it starves, and with a vast amount of misery bowing him down in hopelessness and despair, the poor suffering prodigal reflects upon the many pleasures he enjoyed while in the practice of virtue, and starting up with a sudden determination, he exclaims, "I will arise and go unto my Father!" He shakes off from his limbs the galling chains that sin had fastened on, and taking in his hand the staff of the promises, he pursues his way back to his father's house, and the home of his childhood.

Chastisement, then, is a mean for reforming the vicious; causing them to turn from the evil of their ways and live. And as it is inflicted for a benevolent purpose by the divine Being, it is a manifestation of his goodness, and of his great love for a world of transgressors.

In the life, death, and resurrection of his Son, God has most gloriously manifested his infinite love for a sinful and alienated world. Our duty has been made plain, many glorious examples left for our imitation, many ways pointed out for increasing the sum of our enjoyment, and for the exaltation of our earthly peace and happiness. Life and immortality has been brought to light for a universe of fallen beings, and the heavenly assurance given that a world shall yet be reconciled to God; that tears shall ultimately be wiped from off all faces, holiness triumph over sin, happiness over misery, and life over death! The Father surrendered up his only begotten, to endure the scorn and persecutions of the world, and to suffer death like a factious criminal, for a universe of sinners! And in this, as we have said, he has most gloriously manifested his great love—a love immutable as his own nature, as enduring as the the throne of his glory, and as boundless as eternity! And shall we not love that Being who has manifested towards us, in so many different ways, his great goodness? Shall we not give him our hearts, with their holiest affections, and uncorrupted aspirations? I trust we shall, for it can not be that our souls are so bereft of all feeling, as not to love him who has first loved us; whose paternal arm has ever encircled us, whose smiles have ever lit up our pilgrim-way, and whose watchful care has guided us through so many dangers to the present hour!

I am no believer in the total depravity of the human heart. I believe there are powers there, capable of being brought into exercise, in loving and serving God. And they will be aroused into action, when true and sufficiently powerful motives are presented. They can not sleep when the love of the Father calls! they can not remain inactive when mercy pleads!

Many have mistaken views concerning the nature of love to God; hence we would remark, (in the language of another,) that this love "is not a single and solitary affection in the human heart, which evaporates in a few transient and undefined emotions, but is the spring of every holy activity, and is intimately connected with every virtuous emotion, with every pious sentiment, with every religious requirement, with every sensitive enjoyment," and with our present peace and happiness.

But how should we manifest our love to God? It should be manifested by "complacency, or delight in the character and administration of God;" by admiration of his ways and doings; by reverence, by humility, by resignation, and gratitude. "In fine, supreme love to God includes, in its exercise, a delight in the public and private exercises of his worship; a constant endeavor to yield a willing and an unreserved obedience to all the institutions he has appointed, and to all the laws he has issued forth for raising us to a state of moral perfection; an active and enlightened zeal for the honor of his name, and for promoting those institutions which have a tendency to advance his kingdom in the earth; a sincere and disinterested affection to all our fellow men; a cordial approbation of all his plans and movements in creation and providence, and devout aspirations after that higher state of existence, where the glories of his nature, and "the kindness of his love" shall be more clearly unfolded, and where love shall glow in one uninterupted and perpetual emotion." *

We now bring our remarks upon the "first and great commandment" to a close. And we would only say to the reader in conclusion, study the character and perfections of God; view him as he has manifested himself unto the world, a Being of unlimited goodness, and infinite love, that you may be enabled to yield him the entire affections of your heart. Ever look up to him as your Father and Friend—as that God who has created you for felicity, and promised to bring you off conquerors and more than conquerors through him that loved you, that you may thereby feel to reverence and adore him, to be resigned under every dispensation of his providence; that emotions of gratitude may continually pervade your minds, and that all your energies may be enlisted in furthering the cause of universal emancipation, and in aiding to publish abroad the glorious tidings of a world's salvation.

THE PLUMER.

A CHAPTER ON EXCUSES.

"And they all, with one consent, began to make excuse."
BIBLE.

Men very readily frame excuses for every sin they may commit. No matter of what extent or magnitude their evil deeds may be; they nevertheless will urge something in palliation of their wickedness. "It was done with no bad intention." "It was done in a passion," or, "It was done because (all things considered) they could not avoid it," etc., etc.

Now, in every attempt at excuse, an admission is indirectly made, that he who has erred is conscious of his wrong doing, and, in order to be availing, it should in all cases, be followed by speedy reformation. If this were done, we might listen with pleasure to every excuse of our fellows, and no longer be compelled to regard them as pleas of justification for past offences; or fortification for future transgression. We turn to consider the excuse for not attending church.

My neighbor A. says, "he is pleased to attend church—but then he lives three miles off—his cares are numerous and pressing—his herds must be seen to—his labor performed, etc., etc., and all these things so completely wear him down, that when Sunday arrives, he is unable to attend church—he will give for the support of the ministry—but must be excused in not attending meeting."

Neighbor B. wishes well to the cause, and occasionally makes his appearance at the place of worship—but then, "the preacher dwells too much on the importance of practical religion—he does not expound the Scriptures enough to suit his taste—he is fond of strong doctrinal preaching, and does not like so much praying and singing;" and closes his excuse by saying—"Away with these forms and this tame practical stuff, and I will cheerfully attend."

Friend C. also professes to be a church-loving character, but he has excuses in abundance.—"Young preachers he never did like to hear, and these, with lifeless singing, are intolerable. Besides, one of the Trustees abused him, in asking for his subscription, which he never intended to pay—he only subscribed to encourage others;—and, moreover, the lowest classes in the place are too forward in the choir—he likes to see every thing in its proper place—there should be a church exclusively for the poor—or they should learn good manners, and not intrude upon the society of the wealthy—the preacher, too, condescends to notice those with whom he will have no intercourse; and, worst of all, the place and society are unpopular"—and thus on, for half an hour, will he make excuses, simply to convince his neighbors that he does nothing, and leaves nothing undone, without a reason!

Now if C. had more religion—more Universalism at his heart, he never would feel above his fellows; for real love of any cause, especially of Gospel grace, never pauses to ask whether it be popular or unpopular for a man to be a Christian. But while possessing the spirit of "stand by," he can not stoop to associate with the poor, or listen to the faithful communications of the young.

If B. had more love for the practice of the Christian religion, and less tenacity for his own speculations, the ways of wisdom would be pleasant, and his footseps would bear him to the Temple of Praise.

And A.'s worldly cares are only so many shares in the kingdom of this world, which moth and rust may soon consume; and while in the service of mammon, his spiritual well being can never be enjoyed, and his high moral nature must lie a desert waste. In short, these several excuses are all based on low and selfish motives—the animal nature, and are far beneath the dignity of man; for they are "earthly, sensual and devilish," and to lop them off, root and branch, that they no longer should "cumber the ground," is the first duty of the professors of the Christian religion; and for this purpose we raise the "hook."

APELLES.

The following series of articles, by Br. Abell, we are certain our readers will join us in welcoming to the columns of the Magazine. It was commenced in number 2, present volume, and was delayed on account of Br. Abell's unsettled state, and in part by ill health. He has now located in Castine, Me., and has permitted us to expect its continuation without any further serious delay. A. R. B.

TEACHINGS AND TENDENCIES.....NO. II.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

FAITH.

It was taken for granted—for it was presumed that the common evidences of its truth were familiar to most of you—that Universalism is the revealed doctrine of God, and we now proceed to the further demonstration of its moral influences.

And among the foremost duties enjoined by this doctrine is the exercise of faith. Indeed, this is the very condition, on which it promises the awarding of its blessings. To the enlightened observer of religious matters, even if he possesses no more than a definite outline of the Universalist theory, it will appear very evident, that many and strong demands are made upon the credence of the adherent. Not that the mind is to be tortured into an over-weening and superstitious acquiesence—not that marvellousness is to receive its utmost stretch toward the unreal and supernatural, ere the truths presented can be acknowledged. The demands are perceived to be reasonable, and among them may be reckoned one equally imperative with the others, which requires the exercise of a reasonable faith. To say that the being and perfections of God—and perhaps other truths set forth by the system in question—all come within the easy scope of man's mind, would be ascribing the attribute of infinity to human intellect. But these are all declared to possess a consistency—a rationality, of ample sufficiency, to induce implicit belief, without any unnatural distortions of reason. And Universalism is not wanting in inducements for securing the institution of a healthful and active faith.

The primary object of belief is the great First Cause. Admit his existence. Let the mind acknowledge the being of the invisible Maker and Mover of all nature. Now, it is not possible for the heart of man to conceive of a lovelier, or a more exalted character than that ascribed, by our doctrine, to the universal Creator. The imagination of an angel could not do it. He is represented, not alone as the infinite Sovereign, but as the assiduous Friend; not only as the Supreme Creator, but as the ever-tender Father, the smiles of whose unperishing love illuminate all creation! The ultimate fulfilment of his purposes is seen and provided for with the utmost precision; and being fraught with benevolence and wisdom, their execution is a matter of the most indubitable certainty. His plans can never go into complete or partial disorder. Contemplating the good of the whole world, and being pushed forward by the potentiality of an infinite God, they cannot fail of effecting that good, in the full extensiveness of the original design. Not one being bearing the divine image will be overlooked. No essential principle of favoritism would be discoverable, by which the embodiment of a faith in God, would only prove itself to be a cringing acknowledgment of the power, unattended by a cheerful and reposing confidence in the goodness of the Eternal. Nothing like this would shock the heart at the outset of its religious career. And in this destitution of traditionary dogmas, and in the plenitude of the better views and purposes it attaches to God and his government, it is conceived that Universalism exists single and alone; and that the inducements it possesses for the gathering up of a firm faith in the heart of man are peculiar to itself, and such as might well weigh seriously upon the considerate mind.

Believing in God, the disciple is required to make still further progress, and to cherish faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. And of the Saviour, the most attractive and encouraging views are presented. Being commissioned of heaven with a message of love to God's widely-scattered family-kingdom, appearing among men for the consummation of a design equally benevolent, and god-like, and possessing every necessary requisite for the faithful discharge of the duties of his high office, the trusting soul has the strongest ground for the basis of its belief. But if the Universalist system attached any degree of moral incapability to the Lord Jesus, for the performance of the work committed to him, if any uncertainty shaded in the least, the prospect of the divinely purposed accomplishment of his mission, then indeed, the matter would be vastly different; and an important subtraction be made from the inducements for the exercise of faith, and its remaining foundation would be discovered to be truly fragmentary and insecure. The intelligent mind could not be persuaded to a cheerful and undoubting committal of its trust to such an object. Views so vague and unsatisfactory would fail of securing that confidence of the heart so necessary to its well-being. But, every thing of this nature is entirely separated from Universalism. Our doctrine stands apart and aloof from every representation which gives to the mission of Jesus the least possibility of frustration. It acknowledges the disposition and the power of Jesus to carry out every purpose of the Almighty relative to man's destiny—to finisish the work assigned him; it ascribes to his Gospel an efficacy, sure and unfailing, which will effect the final renovation of the world.

What, then, are the legitimate tendencies of sentiments like these? What effect will they produce on being revealed to the sincere mind?

It must not be forgotten here, that there is a power in man, which renders him capable of appreciating the beautiful in religious truth, and the good in human action; that he is prepared, not only by the intellectual endowments of his nature, but also by the very constitution of what theologians call the 'heart,' to place a rational estimate upon the most evident of God's blessings, and to seek the promotion of the individual and general good. The wide prevalence of vice is a matter of universal acknowledgment; and the continual recurrence of temptation, and our liability and proneness to sin are not forgotten; but neither the one, nor the other, proves the complete and original entireness of human corruption, or the incapability or unwillingness of man to obey the dictates of perceived truth.

We are not among those who contend for the primitive and total worthlessness and depravity of the intelligent creation. We love the divine character, and the divine image, too dearly to embrace this doctrine, And if there was no other reason in existence, we are free to confess, that our "native pride" would cause us to hesitate long before receiving it. Its sweeping charge of innate degeneracy and impurity, falls, without exception or restriction, upon all humanity; and that man must be lowly and humbled indeed, who can, by its reception, declare himself to be only a mass of living corruption. But we have no confidence in virtual or verbal declarations of this nature. Be his professions what they may—be his opinions of others what they may—he can not, while in the exercise of a sane mind, be induced, by any process of argumentation, to think thus humiliatingly of himself. He knows better than this. If he has ever looked into that world within his own heart, he has beheld the uprising of great and glorious emotions, and the benign workings of good and benevolent purposes; and he cannot possibly persuade himself that these are only shadowy and evanescent bubbles, born and broken upon the black waters of the darkest depravity; or thrown out to glitter and to fade, by the pusillanimous efforts of his most deeply corrupted nature. Creeds and education may have their influence, but experience will tell her story, and the man must listen, and learn, and believe. It is not easy for the "commandments of men" to render her logic powerless and unimpressive. That must and will be felt. The mind will acknowledge it. The conduct may sometimes carry the outward semblance of a denial. The external profession may be one thing—the inward conviction another and a different thing. Faith in the doctrine in question, may be openly avowed, but the heart will not corroborate the unnatural testimony.

The very fact, that God has enjoined duties upon us, is unquestionable evidence of our moral ability. Any other supposition impeaches one or another of his perfections. It could not be harmonised with what we know of the manifestations of the divine attributes. The Author of our religion—and certainly the Author of our natures—knows what is "in man;" and the preceptive injunctions of the one, are consistent with the innate principles of the other. They are compatible. They are congenial elements; constituted, by their affinities and mutual adaptedness, to be the influencing and the influenced. Religion does not, by a sort of chemical process, re-mould and re-make the human heart. It is not her office to undo what God hath done, or to substitute something else in room of that which, in Nature's earlier day, was included in the general verdict—"all is good, yea, very good."

Why is it that the twinges of conscience are ever felt by the neglectful and disobedient, if there is no good within him? Why do shame, and remorse, and self-contrition, gnaw like an undying worm, upon the vitals of the soul's peace? Why are we ever visited by the compunctious recollections of undischarged duties, and lost opportunities for the performance of kind and generous deeds? And why, too, do we weep when others weep, and rejoice in their rejoicings? Why do our hearts burn with rapture, or sink in sorrow, as we contemplate the joy or grief of our kindred natures? And why is there a continual forth-going of the spirit to the world without, and the world above, if it is akin to none of the good and beautiful things which God hath made, and possesses of itself no moral loveliness, and no capability of exhibiting virtuous action, or of laying itself a free gift, upon the altar of eternal Mercy?

We suspect there is more of inconsistency, in common religious views than most of you imagine. At one time, it is declared, that we are only the personifications of sin and moral imbecility, having before us, at the close of our probationary existence, a prospect of the most appalling and heart-chilling kind. Then, by the next breath, or in the next paragraph it may be, we are assured that, by the proper use of our better energies, and of the means which God has liberally given us, we may work out for ourselves a great and glorious destiny—one which shall, indeed, forevermore, "chain our spirits to the gates of Paradise."

Now, then, here are two extremes, both of which are equally removed from the truth. We wish to direct you along between them. On the one hand, you will undoubtedly find much to sigh over—on the other, much which should cause you to feel grateful and happy. You will neither find man a demon, nor an angel; but amidst the thickest darkness which envelopes him, you will behold the occasional out-burstings of the hidden soul—bright manifestations of inherent principles, not foreign to virtue, not unallied to the Great Divinity. If, then, human nature is something on which God has marked out his own image—though it is only human nature after all—if man possesses an inward love of the True and Holy, and has the power of profiting by his better aspirations, what will be the influence of liberal teachings upon his mind? How will he be effected by the discovery of those great truths which have been declared peculiar to Universalism?

We have told you, in substance, that there is something in man—deep down in the heart though it may be—which is alive to goodness and spiritual beauty whenever seen or felt; something which rises up spontaneously to meet the approaches of affection, or to pay its ardent homage at the shrine of virtue. Now, nothing can stir this principle more powerfully, and call it forth more effectually, than the doctrine of which we are speaking. Declaring God to be the greatest and best of beings, presenting the most encouraging and ennobling views of our common nature and future destiny, it has an irresistible claim to the faith and affection of the enlightened and the right-thinking. Minds of this stamp, realizing the justness of the demand, and the favorable tendencies of the system, remembering that like causes produce corresponding effects, will not long doubt the expediency of cherishing the freest and most unrestricted

"Belief
In Mercy carried infinite degrees
Beyond the tenderness of human hearts," and which promises the ultimate beatification of universal men. And it follows, as a matter of necessity, that such a faith would lead to holiness of life. It is known to you full well, that the worshipper, is ever an imitator of the Being worshipped. The more exalted his views of that Being, the more exalted are his feelings, the more godlike his habits and actions. The more extensive the divine goodness, the more general and heart-pervading the cultivated assimilation. There is no retrogression—no stopping point. The devout "soul followeth hard" after God. It resteth not. Virtue after virtue—grace after grace is acquired. Then, the more glorious our religion, the higher and more glorious may be our hopes of man's spiritual progress.

It were superfluous, perhaps, to remind you of the soothing and sustaining influences of this faith in the hour of despondency, desertion, or affliction. Never was there a system so completely adapted to the wants of mourning and perishing human nature, as that of universal grace. It reads you the most consoling and instructive lessons on the benevolence and wisdom of the divine administration. It teaches you to confide in the Supreme Governor as your dearest, unforgetting Friend. It prohibits all ungrateful, fault-finding and unreconciliation, because the just and wise economy of Heaven is predicated upon principles which reach out unto the furthermost borders of humanity, and finally issue in effecting the welfare of the great Whole. The uncomplaining tear of sympathy may be dropped; but it would prevent the indulgence of that unavailing grief, which only serves to procrastinate the bleeding of the wounded heart. Through the mists and darkness which surround the saddest child of misfortune, it directs him to read—what God himself has written—"it is good to be afflicted," and having learned to trust and believe, he will not fail to receive the consolation flowing from such a blessed assurance.

EXAMINATION AND EXHIBITION OF THE CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

MESSRS. GROSH AND HUTCHINSON—

On Tuesday afternoon, August 27, I went to Clinton to attend the "Annual Exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute." Of the character of that institution, and the nature of those exhibitions, I presume the readers of the Magazine and Advocate are well acquainted. That institution needs no commendation from me. It stands upon its own merits, and I am happy in believing that its character is becoming more and more known, and consequently better appreciated.

The exhibition commenced in the female department. Of the merits of the original compositions, with which, (after a prayer by the Rev. Mr. Thayer, of Lowell, Mass.,) the exercises commenced, I cannot speak particularly, for the simple reason that I could not hear. The ladies and gentlemen about the doors, and upon the stair cases leading to the gallery, appeared to think that the numerous assembly, gathered there from various parts of the country for the purpose of hearing the exercises, might become too much interested in those bright beings of youth and beauty, who had prepared themselves to furnish us with an intellectual banquet; so upon the counter excitement principle, they kept up a constant talking and laughing, which in the forepart of the evening drowned almost every thing but the sight of their fair forms. What little I did hear of those compositions, was well worthy of praise. The declamations succeeded better—I mean by this, they were heard better. Several of the speakers were quite young, and that deference which even savages pay to youth and beauty, was paid in part by the ladies and gentlemen just referred to. They were comparatively still. Were I to select any particular gems out of this rich casket, I would say, "The Spider and the Fly," spoken by Miss Fake; "The Musician's Last Hour," by Miss Halleck; "Boon of Memory," by Miss Gillespie; "Scene at School," by several young ladies; "Fashion and Nature," by Misses Curtiss and Henk, pleased me the best; but be it understood, I speak only for myself. These exercises were pleasantly varied by music on the piano.

The next morning, (Wednesday,) 9 o'clock, the examination of students in the male department commenced. As far as I am capable of judging, they acquitted themselves well. One thing I was particularly pleased with—the questions and answers were not stereotyped. The questions were selected at random, and the answers indicated an understanding of the branches to which they referred.

In the afternoon the young men's exhibition commenced. The pieces spoken were original; embracing a variety of subjects, all indicating cultivated minds, and some of them depth of thought, and talents, which can not fail to be a passport to the temple of fame in after life. Of these pieces, the oration entitled "Investigation," by O. Cole, and another on "Moral Sublimity," by W. R. Biddlecom, and the "Colloquy—Real Life," by J. M. Elwood, (author,) V. N. Carr, W. R. Biddlecom, and B. Birdsall, were entitled to high praise—so in fact were they all, but my limits will not permit me to remark upon them in detail. A critic might possibly have thought that the "Loafer" in Mr. Elwood's "Colloquy," rather injured the effect that his otherwise good acting would have had upon the audience, by attempting to represent two characters, viz., a windmill as well as a "loafer." At least, I never saw a "loafer" swing his arms quite as much as he did, which led me to the conclusion that by them he meant to represent the windmill. This was all well enough; though I suppose it was rather more than the author bargained for. Or it might have been an involuntary motion without any design, as he put his hands in his pockets very frequently, for the manifest purpose of keeping them there, though he could not; and, upon second thoughts, I do not wonder, for if I recollect right, his pockets were mere pockets in the abstract, having no bottoms to them. Be that as it may, the piece was good, and it was well represented. The exhibition was interspersed with music by the band of the Utica Citizens Corps, and concluded by an address from the Rev. S. R. Smith. This address, I rejoice to hear, will be published.

In conclusion, I may say, that to me, and I believe to all, "it was a feast of reason." And as I look back upon the scene—upon those bright young beings—upon their excellent and talented principal—when I think of the honest pride, and the depth of feeling, with which in the language of the Roman mother, he pointed to those evidences of his well spent labors, and said, "These are my jewels," I feel an increased assurance, that when they come to act their part in the world, their influence will lend stability to our institutions, and their accomplishments scatter roses along the pathway of life. There is a curious plant, (the aphyteia hydnora,) which is a native of Java, in the East Indies. On account of the elegance of its leaves, the beauty of its flower, and the exquisite odor it diffuses, it is plucked by the inhabitants, and suspended from the ceilings of their rooms, by a silken cord. Here it continues to put forth new leaves and new blossoms, from year to year, excited alone to new life and action, by the stimulus of the surrounding atmosphere. We need not object to the idea of God's existence, because we can not comprehend him; for how this plant lives upon nothing but air—how it contrives to convert the gases of the atmosphere into the most beautiful flowers, and perfume the air with its delightful odors, is equally incomprehensible to finite intelligences. THE MORMONS.

Utica, Michigan, June 22, 1839.

Br. Grosh—As some of your readers desire to know what are the religious opinions of the "latter day Saints," I will attempt to give you a part of the information, derived from an attentive perusal of some of their publications; and more especially from a several days' protracted and very friendly conversation with one of their Elders, (Hiram J. Brown,) who, though not a literary man, seems to be very well acquainted with our Bible, and with latter day Saints literature in general.

They attempt to prove their doctrine by the Old and New Testament, upon which we build our faith, which they interpret in the most literal manner. And though I have been a diligent student of the Bible for years, and expected to have involved my friend in a labyrinth of inextricable difficulties and contradictions, I assure you that my expectations were utterly disappointed.

The answer to Br. J. Shrigley's interrogatory (Magazine and Advocate, June 7) is, that though the punishment, or rather the places of it, (hell and lake of fire,) will exist as long as God, yet none of his creatures will remain in it beyond a certain time, longer or shorter according to their several demerits. They say that after the "first" resurrection, when death and hell shall be cast into the lake of fire, (Rev. xx: 14,) all sinners will be liberated from hell, cleansed from all evil propensities, except the false prophets, whose character, they say, is described in Heb. vi: 4, 5, 6, and Matt. xii: 31; and even these, who had received the priesthood, of which they can never be deprived, and by virtue of which they are enabled to work miracles, etc., (Rev. xix: 20,) are to be restored to the celestial kingdom so soon as they make a public and sincere acknowledgement of their error. Thus you see that the latter day Saints are restorationists to the fullest extent.—They argue that all punishment not intended to, or which in its nature can not, reform, attributed to God, accuses him of tyranny; and that there is no escape from deserved punishment, and no substitute can suffer it instead of the guilty.

They believe there are three heavens; the Telestial, the Terrestrial, and the Celestial; in the last of which God and Christ reside, and where alone, absolute perfection can be attained by the Saints, and which will be located on our earth after the second resurrection with the New Jerusalem, fifteen hundred miles square and of the same height. Rev. xxi: 2, 3, 16, etc. The other two kingdoms (heavens) are in other spheres, and will be freely opened to all mankind after the second resurrection, where they will enjoy a degree of glory far transcending any thing that has ever entered the mind of mortal, even in the Telestial, which is the least glorious kingdom. Their joy does not consist in any kingdom in "the rapturous gaze," as some poets have it, but in activity in all, and progression in wisdom and knowledge in the Celestial and Terrestrial without end or limit; though these can never arrive at perfection, nor ever be introduced into the Celestial kingdom, to enjoy the immediate presence of God and Christ, and enter on the work of creating, in which all its inhabitants are engaged. And here they appeal to the changes going on in the universe, as revealed by the science of Astronomy. Nor are they alone in this hypothesis:—Professor Dick, from whom they frequently quote, has treated it largely in his Christian Philosopher, Philosophy of religion, and of a future state.

They say, God does nothing in vain; nor does he act like a child building up and destroying its own works; but argue that he goes on creating, renovating and purifying his works in endless succession—that whilst the inhabitants of one planet attain such a state of purity as to be introduced through the resurrection into a higher state of glorious existence, those of another are progressing towards the same, and those of a third may be in the infancy of their existence—hence the necessity of a continued existence of a prison to reward every inhabitant of those other planets and other systems according to their several deserts.

They believe no person can enter the Celestial kingdom without baptism by immersion, administered by one who has received the priesthood in regular order from God, an angel of celestial order, or another priest of the order of Melchisedec, (Christ,) and who has received the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands, who confers the power of prophecing, working miracles, etc., etc. The only exception (Acts x: 44) was absolutely necessary to convince Peter that the Gospel blessings were intended for Gentiles as well as Jews.

The great whore, (Rev. xvii: 1, etc.,) they say, signifies the church of Rome; and the harlots, the Protestant denominations: and taken together they compose the great city Babylon, the mother of harlots, etc., Rev. xvii: 5, composed of fifteen kings, (verses 10, 12,) nations, peoples, multitudes and tongues, (15;) she sitteth upon seven mountains, (9,) and upon many waters, (1.) For, say they, Babylon signifies confusion, and who will deny that confusion reigns among them all?

They say certain signs, which are enumerated by Christ. Mark xxvi: 17, 18, and by Paul, 1 Cor. xii: 8, 9, 10, should follow those who believed the apostles' testimony, which are not only not found among the sects in our day, but all denominations, except the latter day Saints and the Irvinites of England, deny that any such signs do, or ever will follow believers again; though they did follow the apostles, those who believed the preaching of the apostles, (Acts x: 46, and xix: 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6,) and the seventy, (Luke x: 17,) and the gift has never been recalled by the Giver. These signs following believers, say they, is the testimony of Jesus, (Rev. xix: 10,) and constitutes the power of godliness; and all who deny it have nothing left but the form, (2 Tim. iii: 5,) which has no better foundation than tradition, which can never constitute knowledge, whatever may be the evidence upon which it rests. This power, they say, was lost soon after the apostle's time, when the Gospel began to be adulterated with heathen traditions; but is now measurably restored to the latter day Saints, and will be exercised in its pristine splendor so soon as they attain a greater degree of faith and holiness. They are already able to heal their sick, and are in constant intercourse with the celestial world, having the spirit of prophecy, of visions, of discerning spirits, of speaking with tongues, and of interpretation, etc.

With regard to our planet, they believe there will be millenium of a thousand years duration, (Rev. xx: 4, 5.) which will commence in 1847, by the rebuilding of Jerusalem, etc. At the commencement, the devil (they believe in a personal devil) will be cast into the bottomless pit, (verses 2, 3,) and during its continuance those high wrought descriptions of Isaiah (xi, and xii,) will be literally and exactly fulfilled. But before the ushering in of this long looked for period, nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and, aided by the plagues described in the Apocalypse, will destroy one another till only one third (Zech. xii: 8) of all the inhabitants of the earth remain. Then will this remnant make war against the latter day Saints, who have remained spectators, and they (the Saints) will arise, aided by the Israelites, consisting of the descendants of Ephraim and Manasseh, (who were the sons of Joseph,) namely, our Indians, and the ten tribes inhabiting the north polar region, who will all have been converted by the Gospel; and one of this army shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, (Josh. xxiii: 10; Deut. xxxii: 30,) before their commander Christ Jesus riding the white horse, (Rev. xix: 11); and the prophecies (Rev. xiv: 20; xix: 21; Isa. xiv: 2) and a great number of others, which never have been, shall then be literally fulfilled. From these dreadful calamities the latter day Saints are desirous of saving us. This last paragraph I have inferred from hints dropped in conversation, and from my friend's, quotations; it may therefore not be exactly stated as he believes it, as he declined stating minutely.

Their prophecies prohibit the latter day Saints from making war, but if assailed they are commanded to offer peace to their enemies three times; and if still persecuted, they must consult God before they defend themselves. Their revelations enjoin a peaceable and quiet conduct, good morals, and kindness towards all men. They are very strenuous advocates for the pursuit of knowledge. And instead of being persecuted and put to death, as some infamous fanatics have done, they should be treated as friends belonging to the great human family.

They are guided in all their important pursuits by direct revelations, (as they believe,) have visions, see signs in the heavens, such as armies on horseback, the appearance of blood, etc., etc., in which they place implicit confidence, and are surprised at our not seeing the same. In all of which I believe they are sincere. Those who are best acquainted with the history of the human mind, know best how greatly a person, whose mind has been long occupied with such contemplations, may be deceived. Volumes might be filled with such instances. The history of Baron Van Swedenborg alone, is sufficient to convince any one of the fact. Nor do I doubt that they have often succeeded in curing certain forms of sickness among their adherents. The body is very much under the influence of the mind, and every well informed physician knows of what importance it is to secure even a share of his patient's confidence. How much greater, then, the effect where faith is stronger than death? The metallic tractors of by gone years, and the infinitesmal doses of Haneman's medicine have cured thousands on this principle. But when the dead are raised, where faith can have no influence, we are bound to acknowledge the interposition of Almighty Power. H. R. Schetterly.

P. S. Mr. Hiram J. Brown has been separated from his brethren without knowing where to address any of them; if this should meet their eye, they will confer a favor by addressing—"Utica, Macomb county, Mich."

THOUGHTS FOR THE THINKING.....NO. III.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

How long will the children of men treat with coldness and indifference the things best calculated to make the current of life flow smoothly, and cause it to mirror brightly all the happiness that may be enjoyed by erring humanity. I am inclined to believe that with mankind these things are often underrated by permitting things of far less importance to occupy their attention; by disregarding every finer feeling and holier affection of their nature, and suffering the light of reason and revelation to be clouded by apathy and unconcern. Such feelings are often but preludes to misery and unhappiness—cradles, by whose rockings they are lulled to repose, from which they are afterward awakened, but to experience greater and more lasting horror and dismay.—They are too prone to forget how frequently they labor for that which satisfieth not, and which, if their efforts to attain it do not end in disappointment, is often but a perishable prize, that only mocks them with the emptiness of their desires. They are slow to learn that virtue and holiness are the companions of the truly happy, and that their guides are the star-like radiance and beauty of reason and revelation. They foster the feelings of coldness and disrespect for humanity, and breathe the poisonous breath of malevolence, ill-will and hatred, towards the world, which sweep like the angry blast over the chords of affection, destroying every social tie that binds mankind in the common bond of brotherhood, and severing the soft and gentle ligament of tenderness and love in the domestic and family circle.

Let all the children of earth whose souls have been warmed by the genial rays of Christianity, and animated by their life giving spirit—whose minds have been rendered cheerful and joyous as they dwelt upon the brightness of that tenderness and compassion, which flowed in the language of the Saviour—and whose spirits have felt the influence of that charity and good will which he breathed alike upon the vicious and the good, the wayward and the peaceful—learn that he whose name they bear, did not heap scorn and contempt upon those who had wandered from the beaten track of morality and uprightness; but, rather, used mildness and persuasion to reclaim them from their evil course. Let them learn that a manifestation of reproach and bitterness towards those who have gone astray, only serves to plunge them deeper and deeper into degradation and vice, and gives a new impetus, to hasten them onward and quicken their pace in the downward road, towards misery's uninviting and dismal goal—learn that to despise those who have become lost in the gloomy caverns of iniquity, and have plunged themselves into disgrace and infamy, is so far removed from the power of bringing them back to the paths of holiness and peace, as to urge them onward in wickedness, and is not in accordance with the teachings of him who said unto the child of sin and transgression—"Go thy way and sin no more."

ESSAYS ON WAR.....NO. IV.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"There are, who count it glorious to subdue
By conquest far and wide, to overrun
Large countries, and in field, great battles win,
Great cities by assault. What do these worthies,
But rob, and spoil, burn, slaughter, and enslave,
Peaceable nations?
Made captive, yet deserving freedom more
Than those their conquerors, who leave behind
Nothing but ruin, wheresoe'er they rove,
Then swell with pride, and must be titled gods,
Great benefactors of mankind, deliverers—
Till conqueror death discovers them scarce men,
Rolling in brutish vices."

In my last number, I mentioned two causes of war. I now proceed to enlarge on the same general subject

I. A fruitful cause of war, is, that many suppose victorious war to be a blessing. Hence nations rush into it, in hope of an imaginary good, not thinking that even if obtained, it must be at the sacrifice of the dearest interests of others. On this point, let me cite the words of Napoleon, in one of his conversations at St. Helena. "England and France held in their hands the fate of the world, and particularly that of European civilization. What injury did we not do to each other? What good might we not have done? Under Pitt's system, [he says nothing about his own guilt,] we desolated the world, and what has been the result? You imposed on France a tax of fifteen hundred millions of francs, and raised it by means of Cossacks. I laid a tax of seven hundred millions [probably meaning pounds sterling] on you, and made you raise it with your own hands by your parliament. Even now, after the victory you have obtained, who can tell, whether you may not sooner or later sink under the burden?"* Here it will be perceived that Bonaparte throws out the very idea on which we are enlarging, that victorious war may finally be the ruin of England. Who does not know that Great Britain, with all the wealth of her cities and the grandeur of her nobles, with all the resources of her commerce, and the unrivalled skill of her manufactures, finds it difficult to conceal from the world, that her giant footsteps are treading on the brink of bankruptcy. If she falls, it will be the result of war, of victorious war; for war is destructive to the victors as well as to the vanquished. A thousand facts might be cited to show that victorious war is not a blessing. The very wealth gained by nations in this way, will corrupt and drag them down to destruction. What nation was ever more victorious than Rome? Her eagle waved its pinions over the length and breadth of the ancient world. The proudest and the mightiest monarchs were chained to her chariot wheels, and she sat and claimed the high title of mistress of the world! Yet she fell, and victorious war was her ruin. But we can not enlarge here. We close this paragraph with the remarkable observation of a leading actor in the tragedy of war: "a defeat is the worst thing I ever knew; a victory the next worst."

II. Another cause of war, is, that many maintain it to be necessary in order to remove the depraved, and the refuse of society. How horrid does all such language appear, when we call to mind that we are all brethren, and that Christ hath died for us all. A writer, in reference to this point, says, "A fine compliment to the dignity of human nature in general, and to the army and navy in particular! But fact speaks in a contrary doctrine, and assures us that where one vagabond is disposed of in war, ten others are made; to say nothing of the brave, the generous, and humane, who, infatuated by a love of fame, rush blindly into the same vortex. That war corrupts the public morals and lowers the standard of morality, is proverbial; so that a nation that engages in war for the purpose of mending its morals, acts as wisely as the man who subjects himself to a loathsome disease in order to purify his blood." But we will not enlarge here, for that man who contends that war is necessary to "drain off the refuse of society," must be himself exceedingly depraved, and beyond the effect of calm reasoning.

This essay having been extended sufficiently, two other causes of war are reserved for our next.

ILLUSTRATIVE ANECDOTE. NO. IV.

"Good morning, stranger friend," said I, as I entered his door one Sabbath afternoon, "as I am a traveller in a distant land, I thought I would step in a moment if it would be no intrusion, and beguile a brief time in conversation, and form a new acquaintance." "Walk in Sir, and be seated," was the reply. "This is a day of religious devotion," said I, "and I suspended travel to attend the house of worship, and have been greatly entertained in the attendance of your prayer meeting this afternoon—I found kindred sentiments and spirits there." "I am very happy to hear it," said the stranger of the house, as he drew nearer to me with a meaning smile upon his countenance, "you are then a professor of religion?" "I am," I replied. "Is it not strange" said I, "that the world will not receive and enjoy the soul feasting faith imparted by the evidences of the truths of Christianity, when those evidences are so plainly exhibited?" "It truly is," said he, "if the Christian faith prevailed all would be happiness, light and life; but alas, how many are without the true faith, and in darkness." "And indeed," he continued, "among many professed followers of Jesus, there are many who have no experimental knowledge, and whose prayers are abominations, not being dictated by faith." "Sadly so," replied I, "but after all, it is joyful to reflect and know that in the dispensation of the fulness of time, all shall be gathered together in Christ, and come to a knowledge of the truth and be saved." "Why, Sir," quickly vociferated my friend, "are you of such licentious sentiments?" "Have I said any thing," inquired I, "at variance with your belief? I have stated my views, and what I have said is in accordance with the prayer you made to-day in meeting." "Sir," said he, "I am a Methodist, and not an infidel Universalist; and you must no advocate Universalist sentiments here before my children." "I am greatly mistaken, Sir," said I, "and I beg your pardon. But you must only censure me for believing what you prayed for—you prayed God to hasten the happy time when the ends of the world should believe; when all the lost sheep of the house of Israel should be saved, and there should be but one Shepherd and one fold. I supposed you prayed in faith, and hence I considered yourself and myself of one faith, and thus I account for my calling upon you. But I wish your pardon." "If you believe all of the wicked Israelites and Sodomites will go to heaven, I do not think you a very worthy citizen," said he. "I will not trouble you, Sir—again I say, excuse my mistake—recollect what you said about abominable prayers. Good day, Sir." R.

MARRIAGE....NO. III.

[Before the reception of Br. Sadler's strictures, I had written the following number, and prepared the outlines of the succeeding one; but some other matters intervening, I laid them aside, and almost forgot them. For the purpose of completing the work I began, and partly flattered by finding that the first numbers (perhaps the only ones worthy of the honor) were copied into several sister periodicals, I have concluded to publish these two numbers also.]

"If the wise and benevolent Creator of mankind has implanted in our very nature those faculties which impel us to marry, and which render marriage necessary to our greatest happiness, and to the full developement of our constitution, why urge it so earnestly on our attention—why not leave it to our nature?" Because man is apt to err, and, mistaking his error for truth, he departs sometimes even from the principles of his own nature. Man's moral nature is framed in accordance with God's moral government; yet, misled by ignorance and false education, he violates the moral laws and renders himself very miserable. Man's physical nature is framed in accordance with the laws of the material universe around him; yet, ignorant of his own real wants, and misled by passion's voice, he transgresses those laws, and broken limbs, diseased frames and ruined constitutions are the consequence. So in relation to marriage. Man sets up a false standard of his own, pursues it as a right one, and dies a discontented, uncared-for bachelor. Woman despises worth for wealth, solid sense for empty frivolity, and finds to late, that her day for refusal has gone by, and she is destined to end her days an old maid.

Let me not be misunderstood. I allude now, to those only whose false judgments have, unhappily, led them astray. To the man who, perhaps, has formed in his mind an ideal standard of female beauty, worth or perfection—forgetting that he is deficient himself in these very respects, and has no right therefore to require in the life-partnership of marriage, more of his partner than he himself possesses—and who pursues for many anxious years, this phantom of his imagination, to the neglect and contempt of the many, very many amiable and excellent substantialities that every where surround him. Or, to the female who, probably, has set so high a value on her charms, accomplishments or "priceless love," that nothing but a Chevalier Bayard, an admirable Crichton, or a Sir Charles Grandison is deemed worthy of her hand, and who, therefore, rejects, one after another, dozens of our most worthy men, of any of whom it might be flattery to say she was worthy.—Believe me, the shores of that cold and cheerless ocean, celibacy, is full of grey heads and withered hearts, that now ache and throb with vexation, on discovering too late their undue self esteem and folly. And if their early conduct is to be censured, their late condition deserves our deep pity; for, generally speaking, they are least qualified to render happy the lonely condition to which they have consigned themselves.

Others there are, but very few in number, who as falsely underrate their own merits, or unduly exalt those to whom they would gladly ally themselves. Humility is a virtue, but abasement is not humility—it is weakness. To honor others is a duty, but it is not a duty to estimate fellow mortals as angels. And, after all, it is but a doubtful compliment to a female that has given you her esteem and friendship, (and perhaps her love; for you do not know till you offer your hand,) to suppose her so deficient in discernment—so blind to, and so ignorant of, your real character—as not to know that you are worthy of her confidence and esteem. Believe me, Sir False Humility, I would sooner trust her judgment than yours; for it is to the full as difficult for some men to know themselves, as it is for a correct minded and clear sighted female to know the character of one with whom she is well acquainted.

And there are still others of a more strong minded class, who err from a wrong estimation of the sacrificing spirit, humble desires, and capability of endurance of the opposite sex. Forgetting that woman may deem herself most happy in promoting the happiness, in sharing the lowly lot, and aiding the humble toils, of the man she loves, they coldly turn from her, and leave her to live on that existence for which God never created her, and from which her mind, her affections, her hopes and desires, all revolt. Or, framing in imagination a world of ease and careless bliss—where every want shall be supplied and every wish gratified—as the one which only, is worthy of or acceptable to the partner they would gain, many a one directs his aim at the accumulation of splendor or wealth first, intending to marry when he shall have procured a palace for his bride.—He toils, and toils away the best years of his life in this heart-wearying pursuit, while, perhaps, many a fair one in succession sighs for such an industrious husband, and at the last, he makes his wealth his mistress, or failing in his efforts, sinks to degradation for the want of a winding tendril to bind up his shattered feelings, and to soothe to calmness his wounded pride and bitter disappointment.

The most of young men who abstain from marriage for what they call "prudential motives," err most in their estimates of present means and future wants. If they could lay aside an expensive vanity, and a perhaps too costly pride, and bring down their present expenditures to their reasonable wants, and divest their wishes for the future of all that did not belong to actual necessity and a bare sufficiency of comfort, there are hundreds of young men and women now reluctantly turning their backs on matrimony, who are more abundantly able in a pecuniary point of view to enter it, than many were whose domestic happiness, ease and comfort they now envy or admire. For what is required to maintain one vice or foolish habit, or fashionable folly, would often, very often maintain with decency and comfort, a prudent reasonable woman, or half a dozen well attended children.

Frequently will the newly married man wonder at the amount he foolishly spent, and which his wife now saves. Only be certain of one thing, if your savings are few your income small, and your lot one of toil and care—that is, that the partner you intend taking for life, is fitted and prepared to aid you in economy, to spare you in expense, to make the most of a small sum, and to share generously in your toils and cares. In short, see that she is a "help-meet." If you can be certain of these matters, I would lay it down as a rule, that whenever you can accommodate your wishes to your present and probable circumstances—whenever your character for industry, honesty, and fitness for your business is established—when you have sufficient to furnish a home, and a reasonable prospect of steady employment at good or sufficient wages, you are in a situation to marry any prudent, amiable and industrious woman that will be willing to be to you what a wife should be. Ask nine out of ten of the prosperous and happy grandfathers and grandmothers around you, how much they had more than I have enumerated, when they were married, and you will find my catalogue of "this world's goods" considerably larger than their possessions were 40 or 50 years ago! Yet they are now comfortably off in health, wealth, domestic felicity, and peace of mind. Do you wish to be where they now are, when you shall attain to their years? Imitate the humility of their desires and expectations—their simplicity of dress and manners—their industry economy and prudence—their virtues and affections, and singularly unfortunate must be your lot, if you do not succeed, in a great measure, in attaining to competency, respectability, and a reasonable share of happiness, before you reach the age of sixty years.

PHRENOLOGY AND THEOLOGY.

When any new discoveries are made in science, which appear to conflict with long established opinions in theology, the first efforts of theologians are to discredit, overturn and reject the discoveries, however numerous the facts on which they are established. When this fails, (and fail it must, sooner or later; for no speculation can ever stand against fact,) the next effort is to suddenly receive the discovery into great favor, and (since the world will receive it) to become its especial patrons, admirers and advocates—to see in it no contradiction or refutation of the long cherished speculation—nay, even to twist and pervert the discovery, and by sophistical reasonings so to warp and bend it, that it will even seem to favor their dogmas. Thus science becomes corrupted, as Christianity has been, by those friends who, while its enemies, could not overthrow it—at least, it is drawn aside from its legitimate province, and by having its voice carried to the world through an antiquated and time-cracked gallery, its lessons reach its newer votaries in hollow and disguised tones, instead of its own clear and simple voice.

This has been, and is now, eminently the case with the new theory of mind—with Phrenology. No science has been more bitterly assailed by the old school theologians than this—none more vituperatively denounced as atheism—infidelity—materialism—falsehood—folly—charlatanism—humbug. But it has gone onward and upward—paving its pathway with demonstrations and illustrations that could not be resisted, and piling facts upon facts until they could no longer be denied, or passed by without notice and acknowledgement. And what is beginning to be the result? Why, the very class that opposed it, because they feared that it would overthrow their Christianity, are beginning to receive it because (they say) it is a powerful supporter of their peculiar views. Finding that Phrenology will speak, and that the world will hear her—that they can neither gag her mouth, nor stop the ears of her audience—they suddenly become very anxious to aid her—to carry her voice further among the audience—and hence they clap a theological speaking trumpet to her lips, and in very love of science ask her to speak through it, and allow them to interpret for her, the hollow and unmeaning jargon which the voice of truth must ever make when sounding through a tube supplied by error!

Now, be it understood, these men may be very honest—very sincere—truly convinced in their own minds, that their cause is the true—the correct—the best one, both for the cause of Phrenology and of Christianity.—I impeach not their motives, but the correctness of their conduct, and the truth of the results they aim to bring forth thereby. Phrenology has to do only with mind as organized in this fleshy tabernacle, and as manifested in the circumstances of this mortal being. Based only on facts, it can not reach its demonstrative hand to the future and unseen world, and draw proofs and illustrations from thence, with which to enlighten its votaries in this world. All it can do, is to draw inferences relating to immortality, from facts observed in mortality. And these inferences will be most probably true or false, as they make or refuse to make allowances for the differences which obtain between the worlds of matter and of spirit. On inferences thus made, under these allowances, the Universalist need never shrink from meeting his antagonists—indeed, on such inferences he may be certain of gaining triumphant concessions in favor of his theological views—of the doctrine of universal holiness and happiness.

WORKS AND CONSEQUENCS.... NO. III.

Experience has taught the Christian world that mankind are prone to extremes in their estimation of good works, both in regard to their importance and end, and the qualities necessary to constitute them. That it is necessary to do good, all candid persons will admit; but one wants the privilege of deciding what is good, another, how far it is necessary. But are these matters really so undecided as to be left to every man's opinion? Has our blessed Saviour set us an example which is unworthy of our consideration, or beneath our adoption and imitation? If not, let us not claim to be ignorant of our duty, nor wanting in all the instruction, necessary to establish our opinions of the nature and character of good works. I doubt not but many Christians are sincere in the limitations which they attach to human deeds; for it is undeniable that they make these limitations a part of the general characteristics of their religion. It is to be expected, therefore, that they will regard that depreciation in the merit of good works, which ignorant or dishonest theologians have long since pretended to discover in the efforts of the creature, with a sort of religious veneration. Nor, since works of some kind are necessary on the part of the Christian, can we wonder that they should attempt to dictate to their followers, what shall constitute the goodness of their works.

But these limitations, and this arbitrary and unauthorized proscription, are more in theory than in practice. If men do teach that good works have no influence upon their happiness; and if they do teach that the sinner is happier than the Christian, thank God they do not now generally act so. If we regard their theory with any degree of charity, we are compelled to adopt the conclusion, that they have one system of faith, designed, in their estimation, especially for eternity, and another, accompanied by works designed for this present state of existence. While they cling to one system they practice the other, and know, and if honest, will acknowledge, that they are happy only when they "cease to do evil and learn to do well." And their testimony is in our favor. For every moment of enjoyment which they acknowledge, is proof of the peace giving power of good works.

There is another class of men whose inconsistencies are as prominent as any we have noticed. I mean those who profess to be convinced of the necessity of a well ordered life and godly conversation, as a means of promoting the peace and prosperity of the world, but forget that they are a part of the world, and as much bound to set the example as any other person. I have seen the drunkard revelling in his cups, and acting the ridiculously assumed part of an adviser to others. And I have heard him, in his sober moments, declaiming against drunkenness, owning that he did wrong, and that he ought to abandon his beastly habits. But there was still not one single cool, effectual resolution to reform. And I have heard the profane man, after having corrupted his children by his examples of profanity and violent passion, endeavoring to teach them how bad certain language sounded, coming from them, but which they would hear him use again in fifteen minutes.—Nor does it need a spirit of prophecy to divine how perfectly futile would be the efforts of such a teacher.

The truth is that he who is continually moralizing upon what he knows to be his duty, and is at the same time as continually indulging in sin, is paving the way for the most summary degradation, as well as misery. He is not only losing the confidence of community, perverting the morals of his unthinking associates, and rendering himself a nuisance to society, but he is losing power over himself and his habits, with every step he takes; and the more he lulls and deceives himself, the deeper he will sink in vice and misery. Let him, therefore, who knoweth his Master's will, do it, and he will escape the necessity of being beaten with many stripes.

A. R. B.

BE NOT DECEIVED.

Three times has the apostle Paul urged the above warning upon the attention of his brethren, for the purpose of guarding them against indulging in any hope of escaping the punishment of sin. They were not to be deceived into the hope that they should inherit the kingdom (or reign) of heaven, without abandoning their unrighteousness. And so well known to many is this truth, that they almost think it superfluous to repeat it. But I presume there is as much danger in our day, that people will deceive themselves in this respect, as there was in the days of Paul. And besides this, if the natural inducements should prove insufficient for this purpose, we can find plenty of teachers who will help us along. It is not alone in the case of the hardened and reckless sinner that we see this false hope exerting its deleterious influence; though perhaps we may see it most prominently there. We may see it also in the less hardened, and more enlightened transgressor.

Nor are those who have named the name of Christ, and covenanted to depart from iniquity, an entire exception to the imputation. If some kind friend was able to scan the motives, and feelings, and hopes of him who strays from his Master's precepts, and disobeys some duty that is enjoined upon him, what think you, reader, would be the report he would make to us? Would he not say that that transgressor had been doing wrong under the impression that it was so slight an offence, or so seldom repeated, or so something else, that he might escape any disagreeable consequences? Following up this rule, then, how many professed Christians would be implicated? More, alas! than is for the honor of the cause they profess. Let every person who is in the habit of urging some petty excuse for neglecting to attend public worship, soberly examine the effect of his negligence and lukewarmness, upon himself: of his example, upon others; and the stigma which he casts upon religious worship by his indifference. Let him think of the weariness which he feels in thus virtually dragging himself over the Sabbath; and of the gradually increasing distaste which he experiences towards all religious, and I might say, towards all ennobling themes, until he feels an inclination to throw off all restraint, and become a criminal—a universally condemned criminal, in the sight of God and men. And when he has examined faithfully into these matters, let him ask if he did not flatter himself in the commencement, that he should escape all these consequences.

The same course may be pursued with reference to the Sabbath breaker, the slanderer, the drunkard, the extortioner, the "abusers of themselves with mankind," and indeed all other transgressors; and if I mistake not, we shall find that they have been deceived, or have deceived themselves, in relation to the certainty of their punishment. Upon all such, therefore, I urge the language of Paul—"Be not deceived; God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.—For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

Another mistake which properly belongs to this subject, I may briefly notice. It may be seen in some whose conduct has been, as far as human judgment could penetrate, perfectly unimpeachable. They have endeavored, most strictly, to obey the two great commandments of our Saviour. Spirituality has characterized every emotion of the soul, and kindness and charity every action of their lives. But, alas! there is something wrong in their faith. They have been deceived. They have been taught that all these qualities, and all these virtues may be exhibited, and they be destitute at the same time of every particle of the religion of Jesus. They may have faith in the divine mission of the Saviour; they may be followers of Christ as dear children, if we understand the phrase in a practical sense, and not be Christians after all. It requires something mysterious, indescribable, to ensure their safety. These things have been taught to them, and their poor, credulous hearts have believed it, and concluded that they are still far from the kingdom of God. It has pained me to see some of the best examples we have of Christian character, lacking in this one point, by giving more confidence to the creeds of men than to the declarations of Holy Writ, and wasting away their lives in fear, and trembling, and anxiety, because their virtue, and their charity, and their integrity, and their love of God, did not come up to that deceitful standard of mysterious and inexplicable religion, of which the world boasts.—Would to God that such might be undeceived, that they might journey through life as happily as they are useful.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Colman's Monthly Miscellany.—A valuable literary journal, somewhat on the plan of Bentley's London Miscellany. Two numbers have been published already, filled with articles of an interesting character, among which we would particularize two by John Neal, Esq., of Portland, Me. We have not room for an extended notice, but recommend those who wish to see it to call at our Bookstore and examine it for themselves. Price, five dollars per annum in advance.

Sawyer's Letters to Remington.—An excellent work from an excellent pen. It occupies the whole ground in controversy between us and the Methodists. As Mr. Remington plagiarized heavily from Luther Lee's book, those who wish to see Mr. Lee ably refuted need only turn to Br. Sawyer's Letters contained in this neat little volume. For sale at this office—price 50 cents.

Causes of Infidelity Removed.—We are happy in being able to say that this valuable work from the pen of Br. S. R. Smith, and well known to our constant readers, is highly (and justly) commended by our Editorial brethren generally. Orders are coming in for copies, and we trust will continue to come in, as it occupies ground different from that occupied by our brethren who have heretofore written on the subject, and from its manly refutation of the principal errors general in the Christian community, (which are assigned as prominent causes of infidelity,) it is a valuable work for placing in the hands of our Christian opposers, as well as of our infidel opposers. Will not our friends in this section see to it, that this strong work of a strong writer, is duly circulated in this region? We sell them at $6 per dozen, 63 cents single.

CHANGE, ETC.

We perceive by the Trumpet, that Br. A. C. Thomas has accepted the unanimous invitation extended to him from the second Universalist society in Lowell, to become their pastor, and has entered upon his pastoral duties. Br. L. C. Browne, also, in accordance with the invitation of the Universalist society in Nashua, N. H., will assume the pastoral charge of that society on the second Sunday in October. Br. Alonzo A. Miner, of Unity, N. H., has consented to take charge of the Universalist society in Methuen. Br. John V. Wilson, of Alstead, N. H., takes charge of the Universalist society in Brewster, where he preaches three-quarters of the time—North Dennis enjoys the remaining quarter.—Br. William S. Clark, of Calais, Me., has been invited to the care of the Universalist society in Chatham, Mass. Also, Br. S. P. Landers, of Brooklyn, Pa., has accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the Universalist society, in Andover, Mass. Truly this is a chapter on migrations; and I am almost tempted to seal up the sayings of this "copy," lest they should need correction before they are allowed a place upon the "gally." This is certain, however, that our eastern brethren appear to remember the preacher. And I should not wonder, if our opposers in the east, raised the cry which was heard in the far east, many centuries ago—"These that have turned the world upside down, are come hither also." Peace be with preachers and people.

GENERAL CONVENTION.

For a third or fourth time I have resolved to visit the Eastern States and be present at a General Convention. Unless compelled to do otherwise, I shall leave home for this purpose on the 9th, and go to Portland, via New-York and Boston. It would give me much pleasure to attend the Western Association of Massachusetts, at its formation, in Cheshire, on the 11th and 12th inst., but other circumstances prevent it.

Editorial business will be attended to by our careful Br. Bartlett—and, as lots of Editorial from my own pen and Br. Montgomery's, have been prepared in anticipation of my absence, I am in hopes that none of our readers will miss me from my post.

UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

We are requested to give notice, that the ministering brethren and delegates who may attend the Convention, are directed to call at the Steam Boat Office, Steam Boat Wharf, or at the Farmer's Hotel, Congress-Street, where members of the Committee of Arrangements will be in attendance to receive and conduct them to places of entertainment.—Trumpet.

ERRATUM.

In an article by Br. Underwood, published in number 31, current volume, a typographical error occurred, which, in justice to the author, should be corrected, as we did not follow copy. Instead of St. Paul saith, it should read, St. Peter saith—we have also a more sure word of prophecy, etc.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TO DEATH.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

When shalt thou visit me,
Pale king of the tomb?
In the winter of age,
Or life's spring-time bloom?
When will thy coming be,
At morn, noon, or night;
When day-god shineth free,
Or lendeth no light?

Shall stranger's careless hands
Close these failing eyes;
When thou breakest earth's bands.
And all kindred ties?
Or will a mother's love
Lend its healing balm;
Speaking of peace above,
And strength in Heaven's arm?

What shall be visioned then,
To my inward sight?
Views beyond the cloud-clime,
All blissful and bright?
Meetings of friends above—
Pilgrims from earth's gloom;
Freed by the power of Love,
From sin and the tomb?

Answer, answer me these,
Thou cold terror-king;
Ere my heart's blood shall freeze
By thine icy sting:
Tell, tell me when and how
The conflict shall be;
That, fitly I may bow,
To thy stern decree.

MY MOTHER'S GRAVE.

There is one dear, one sacred spot,
My thoughts have ne'er one hour forgot,
'Tis in the grave-yard near the gate;
(I love to lean upon the grate;)
A low white pale stands close around,
To guard that hallowed piece of ground.
And green's the sod upon the bed,
Of her who slumbers with the dead.
Rest! Mother rest!
While I gaze on yon glorious star,
How sweet thy gentle slumbers are!

Oft when we two have sat alone,
And Venus clear, and brightest shone,
Of all the stars in the blue dome,
She'd speak of Heaven her last sweet home,
And say, "Child, when I sleep in death,
Remember what thy mother saith,
Oft as you see yon glorious star,
Think sweet thy mother's slumbers are."
Rest! Mother rest!
I now behold that glorious star,
And sweet I know thy slumbers are.

Sleep on! sleep on! this world is vain!
And our great loss is thy great gain;
Thy griefs and pains are now all o'er,
Thou'lt feel their poignancy no more.
Sleep on! till the last trumpet's sound
Shall wake the millions under ground.
Then burst the bands of death, and rise,
To meet thy Saviour in the skies!
Rest! Mother rest!
Now brightly shines yon glorious star,
And sweet thy gentle slumbers are! MODESTA.

ROMANCE AND REALITY.

There are many persons of a pious turn of mind, who strongly condemn every thing of a romantic nature. Novels, which throw an ideal lustre around the common events of life, are received as the text book of satan; and even poetry is regarded as superfluous by some, especially if it rise above the common place modes of thinking, feeling, and reasoning, and carry the mind beyond the contemplation of plain matters of fact. Yet it is somewhat remarkable, that the same people who condemn these flights of fancy, can see no harm in a studious attention to the useful in nature, and to many things which may never be of any real service to those who dwell upon them. One of these individuals would see no harm in studying natural history, in learning all about the habits of the snail, the porcupine, the black ant, the ring-tailed monkey, and the Newfoundland dog. In all these, there is nothing beneath our attention, and if we spent nine-tenths of our time in the acquisition of knowledge pertaining wholly to this mundane sphere, there is no harm done. Nay—a close attention to business is not condemned by these sticklers for matter of fact. A man may rise early and late, may pierce himself through with many sorrows—from the cradle to the tomb—with the sole object in view of laying in a store of knowledge, whose only purpose can be the accumulation of worldly goods, and the feeding of this perishable body. His mind may be wholly engrossed by these worldly pursuits—and so that he keeps clear of the sentimental, so that he eschews the productions of genius, there is no hazard to the mind from its close contact with mere earthly things.

It is somewhat singular that the religion of one who taught us to take no thought for the morrow what we should eat and drink, and what we should put on, should be more honored in the study and pursuit of the most gross and material objects, than in the contemplation of themes, which, although they do not lead the spirit up to the gates of the celestial city, do still elevate it above mere brutal gratifications, and inspire it with feelings that are not wholly perishable, and which often have in them "less of earth than heaven." There is scarcely a poet, or even a novelist, who, when arraying his subject in a more ethereal garb than earthly minds can conceive, does not feel himself, in some degree, led to the contemplation of holy things, and to a more pure and faultless state of being than is to be found on this earth. Let these objectors bear in mind that if the flowers of genius do not blossom in heaven, it is still more difficult to carry a blacksmith's anvil, a piece of woodland, a rail road, or a side of sole leather, within its pearly gates.

WORDS OFTEN MISPRONOUNCED, OR JACK DOWNINGISMS.

In the London Quarterly Review for April, 1835, there is an article on the "Letters of J. Downing, Major, Downingville Militia, Second Brigade," in which it is gravely asserted, that the "Letters" furnish "the most amusing, and it must be allowed, the most authentic specimen, of the ACTUAL COLLOQUIAL DIALECT of the Northern States." The article further asserts, that "the representations of gibberish, for which Mr. Matthews, Mrs. Trollope, and other strangers have been so severely handled by the American critics, were, in fact, chargeable with few sins, except those of omission. The most astounding and incredible of their Americanisms occur, passim, in the work of Major Downing; but it is as obvious, that the wealth and prodigal luxury of his vocabulary put the poverty of theirs to shame, as that he applies the particular flowers and gems of republican rhetoric, which had caught their fancy, with a native ease and felicity, altogether beyond the reach of any superficial and transitory admirer, not 'to the manner born!'"

We hope those teachers of our Common Schools, who are not ambitious of the honor of being considered graduates of Downingville college, will see the importance of correcting the subjoined list of errors.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, August 29th, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. DAVID JOHNSON, of Otsego, to Miss BROOCSANIA HUNT, of Hartwick, both of Otsego county.

In this city, on the 28th of August, by Rev. Mr. Hill, Mr. CHARLES TANN, to Miss SARAH SANDS, all of this city.—[The Printers were kindly remembered.]

In Rome, August 22d, by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. MARCELLUS FARMER, of Montgomery, Ala., to Miss CORNELIA ANN MOSLEY, daughter of Charles Mosley, Esq., of the former place.

DEATHS.

In this city, August 14th, Mrs. BETSEY BACKUS, mother of Elisha Backus of this city, aged 85 years.

In Rome, N. Y., on the 15th of July last, Mr. ALBERT S. STACY, aged 28 years and 9 months. Mr. S. had gradually been wasting away for some months, under that apalling disease called the consumption. And after many fruitless efforts had been made to remove the disease, he, in company with his mother, started on a journey to the east, by the advice of his friends, to improve his health. But after he got as far as Rome, it was thought imprudent to proceed further, as his disease increased; and after lingering a few days in the most excruciating pain he expired, resigned to the will of God, meekly trusting in the wisdom and goodness of God. He was an only son, whose parents live in Geneseo, N. Y., whither he was conveyed, and where he was interred on the 18th of July. A discourse appropriate to the occasion, founded upon the words in Isa. lx: 20, was delivered at Lakeville, August 11, to the mourning relatives and a numerous congregation of sympathising friends, by O. ROBERTS.

In Lima, August 17th, Mr. WICKES SMITH, aged nearly 66 years. Three years and a few days prior to this his wife departed this life, in the consolations afforded by a faith in the universal goodness of God. And now, in the possession of the same faith, Br. Smith has left this world and all terrestrial things. Oh! it is a consolation most devoutly to be wished for, to die believing in a reunion with our departed friends and companions, where dissolution can never reign! Such was his belief, and such sustained him in his sickness—which was but of short duration, though painful—and supported him in the last hours of trial. His funeral was attended by the writer on the 19th, when the words of hope and consolation were offered to the surviving relatives and sympathising neighbors. O. R.

In Tully, August 22d, of consumption, Mrs. SILVIA HICOCK, aged 19 years. Although the last part of her sickness was severe, yet she bore it with much composure and resignation, and yielded up her spirit rejoicing in the prospect of heaven and happiness for herself and all mankind. She regarded the end of this life as a passport from earth to heaven, an introduction to life everlasting and joys eternal. H. C.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED.....NO. VI.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TO HUSBANDS.

DUTIES OF HUSBANDS.

"Man is born to be a doer of good."

The field which opens before me, upon this subject, is one of great extent—so wide, indeed, that in the limits to which I must confine myself, I can but glance at some of the general and more prominent features of the subject.

To enable him to discharge his duties in a proper manner, the husband must realize the responsibilities which rest upon him as the guardian of the family. The same laws of necessity and propriety, which place him at the head of the domestic circle, and commit its interests in a great degree, to his keeping, impose upon him certain weighty and important duties, which he can not neglect, except at the expense of the happiness of all connected with him. I would not, by any means, have the husband uninterested in the welfare of mankind at large, or hesitate to co-operate in all laudible measures for the benefit of the community in which he resides. All subjects of this character should receive a proper share of his attention. But still, I would have him realize that his family should be the chief object of his solicitude and care, and that to them and their interests, he is bound to devote whatever power, ability or skill, he may possess. I have heard noisy politicians and open mouthed declaimers profess great love for the people, and deep solicitude for the public welfare, who, at the same time, were negligent of their own private affairs, and inattentive to the wants of their families. But I always doubt the protestations of such men. There is good reason to suspect that their love for "the dear people," rises and falls in proportion to the ability and willingness of the people to bestow honors and emoluments upon them. An individual who is really interested in the public welfare, will exhibit a still deeper interest in the welfare of his own family—for the former feeling, when cherished to any considerable extent, is but an emanation, or rather an enlargement of the latter. It is well known to agriculturists, that a small farm well cultivated, is more profitable than one of large dimensions with imperfect cultivation. In like manner, let every husband devote his care and attentien more particularly to his own family—let him there sow the seeds and cultivate the plants of pure religion, morality and republicanism—and he can do for the public, more good—much more—than by directing all his efforts to a larger circle of operations.

The primary duty devolving upon the husband, is to provide for the comfort of his household. This is peculiarly his province. His constitution, habits, education—as well as law, custom, propriety, and the whole frame-work of society—make it obligatory upon him to procure for his family, shelter, food, raiment, and all that pertains to their enjoyment, their improvement, and general welfare.—To neglect this natural demand upon his protection, is to overlook one of the chief obligations of matrimonial union—is to violate one of the most sacred duties of life. I know of few human beings more despicable, than the husband who, through sheer indolence, or the worse evil of intemperance, so neglects the affairs of his family, as to compel his wife to labor and toil in the service of others to procure subsistence for herself and children, and perhaps, even for her unworthy companion himself. Yet many such have I seen, who have thus shown themselves destitute of all the promptings of propriety, generosity and manhood!

To provide for his family in a proper manner, the husband should pursue some stated occupation. This is necessary, even though he may have inherited great wealth. To say nothing of the manifold advantages in respect to health of body and mind, which would accrue through some profession or occupation, he is constantly liable to lose his possessions, and become so reduced as to depend upon his own personal exertions for a livelihood. I need not state the advantages of some profession or business skill to a husband in such circumstances, rather than to be entirely lacking in the prerequisites of experience and tact in any business whatever. The world is full of instances illustrative of this subject, in both respects. But where no wealth is inherited—where the individual is dependent upon his own exertions—the advantages of a distinct occupation or profession, are very manifest. There are those who endeavor to get along through the world without adopting any particular business, but who trust to chance and circumstances to secure the means of support for themselves and families. But this is adopting a hazardous and unwise course. Where one of this class succeeds in obtaining wealth or even a competency, an hundred toil along a life of poverty and want.—Prudence as well as duty, calls upon the husband to pursue some definite, stated employment, upon which he can depend for an adequate income, such as the comforts of those depending upon him may require. The particular nature of his business is a matter of minor consequence, so long as it is honorable. And all occupations that are actually useful to mankind, are alike honorable and respectable in the sight of those whose estimation is of any value. The wise and the candid allow their respect for men to be guided, not by their occupation, but by their moral character. The divine, the legislator, the lawyer, the physician, the merchant, whose conduct is immoral and unprincipled, they will condemn, and disapprobate, and despise, while they will approbate and respect the poor, but honest and industrious mechanic or wood-sawyer. Hence a certain young lady of good standing, who consented to wed a respectable mechanic, exhibited more pride than wisdom or reflection, in remarking—"It is a great misfortune that Mr. —— is a mechanic, but he does not associate with other mechanics!" Now, what this lady considers a misfortune, is one of the most favorable circumstances connected with her husband's condition. For, being a man of industry and good habits, he will undoubtedly afford her a much more comfortable maintainance, than he could in any other occupation—and it is quite probable that in a few years he will acquire a good degree of wealth. His occupation being a useful one, all the unhappiness which the lady gives herself in respect to it, arises from an entire misconception of the true origin of gentility and respectability. Wives should endeavor to entertain proper views upon this subject. They should never through the promptings of vanity, allow themselves to urge their husbands to abandon a useful pursuit, simply because they apprehend it is not as fashionable as some others.—Many individuals in endeavoring thus to step higher, as they imagined, have mis-stepped, and fallen from comfort to want, from riches to poverty! I repeat, a useful occupation is an honorable one. "Pin-making is a minute affair, but will any one call the employment a mean one? If so, it is one which the whole civilized world encourage, and to which they are under lasting obligations daily.—Any useful business ought to be reputable, which is reputably followed.

While there are many husbands who fail in affording a suitable support to their families, through indolence and other bad habits, there is another portion who are deficient through sheer parsimony. This class are not at all lacking in industry, perseverance and economy. But the great aim and object of life with them, is to accumulate riches. This is the all-absorbing theme of their thoughts by day, and of their dreams by night. And to gratify this desire to hoard up wealth, they hesitate not to sacrifice their own convenience and the comfort of their families. They will allow them the necessaries, and perhaps a few of the comforts of life, but none of those advantages which alone make wealth more desirable than poverty. With them every question, to possess any interest, must either begin or terminate with money. Every proposition in regard either to the comfort, the improvement or the amusement of the family, is made a matter of dollars and cents, and depends entirely upon expense. If it exceeds a certain meagre sum, it is forbidden, however necessary or important it may be.

When a miserly love of gold strikes its roots deep into the human heart, it seems to absorb all the generous and noble traits of our nature—it destroys the freshness, the sensibility of the soul, and renders its votary dead to every humane and tender susceptibility. Speak to such a man of the sweets of friendship, of the ties of consanguinity, of the claims of humanity, of the improvement of society, of the importance of moral and intellectual cultivation, and your voice falls upon leaden ears. But utter the words "money," "profit," and he starts into life and activity, as the war-horse ereets his ears and paws the earth with impatience at the shrill sound of the trumpet.

"O love of gold, thou meanest of amours!"

It is astonishing how hard the heart becomes, and how dead to the promptings of nature and to the most sacred calls of humanity, when enslaved by the degrading love of riches. An instance in point can be found not distant from my own residence. I allude to an individual who, by a long course of successful mercantile operations, has acquired an immense fortune—far more than he can enjoy during the short remnant of his days, and enough, it is to be apprehended, to ruin those who will inherit it. Within a half hour's ride of his princely mansion, may be seen a low, decaying hovel—one of the most wretched of those abodes in which poverty seeks to hide its rags. In the discharge of my parochial duties, I recently had occasion to enter this hut. I found an aged couple, who had seen more than four-score years, residing within—the poorest of the miserably poor. The husband, for many long months, had been stretched in helplessness upon the bed of sickness, (which will soon prove his bed of death,) with none to attend upon his wants and relieve his distress, but his decrepit companion. To say nothing of the comforts of life, the little delicacies so necessary in sickness, they had hardly sufficient of the coarsest necessaries to support their miserable existence—a stinted "johnny-cake," baking upon a few embers, was all, I have no doubt, they had for their evening repast. And have they no relatives able to assist them? Yes; the wealthy merchant of whom I have spoken, is their near connexion—is the first cousin of that aged matron—the blood of his own fathers courses in her veins! What a rare and favorable opportunity is here afforded for him to show the generosity, the benevolence of his nature; to testify, by granting relief to the poor and destitute, his gratitude to that watchful Providence which has allowed him such unbounded success in all his enterprizes,—what a proper occasion for him to realize that highest of all possible enjoyments which earth can bestow, of feeding the hungry and clothing the naked—when the smallest favors would be gratefully received, yea, when the very crumbs which fall from his luxurious table, would be accepted and devoured with the utmost avidity and thankfulness! Does he improve this opportunity?—does he show that he possesses the common feelings of humanity, even towards a relative? Alas, no! So far as I could learn, he is as unmindful of their condition, and as uninterested in their welfare, as though they belonged to another race of beings. And while he continues to luxuriate in his palace, and reposes on his bed of down, they will linger and die in their hovel, amid penury and want! Oh, holy Father! if such are the influences of wealth—if to obtain riches, I must have all the fountains of benevolence, pity, and mercy, dried up in my soul—if I must have those gentler susceptibilities of my nature, which impart so much of heaven in their exercise, steeled into deadness within me—if I must be condemned to part with my heart of flesh, and carry with me in its stead, a heart of ice—I pray thee in thy great mercy, save me from wealth and keep me in poverty!—better, far better, to enjoy the nature which thou hast given me, even though I have but a dry crust and a cup of cold water, than to be reduced to that state of deadness where the voice of humanity can not reach me, though surrounded by all of India's wealth?

Such being the influence of an inordinate love of riches, it is a duty which the husband owes to his Maker, his family and himself, to guard strictly against it. If he is successful in business, he should allow his generosity to increase with his wealth—and while keeping strictly within the bounds of prudence, let him manifest by deeds of charity and benevolence, that his soul has not contracted, but enlarged with his means. And so far from adopting the dishonorable and sordid principle of acquiring wealth at all hrzards, even at the expense of the comfort and improvement of his family, it is his duty to adopt the reverse, and make the comfort and improvement of his family, an object of the first importance, and the acquisition of wealth a secondary consideration. To hoard up perishing riches is not all that we are made for, neither should it be all that we would live for in this world. Let the husband remember this, and act accordingly. Whatever is necessary to satisfy the reasonable wants of his family, it is his duty to procure, so far as his means will allow. I do not call upon him to indulge them in luxury, or in artificial wants, or in wastefulness. These should strictly be guarded against. But there is a wide distinction between luxury and comfort, between wastefulness and a generous, yet prudent expenditure.

It is the duty of the husband to allow his family to live in a manner commensurate with his means, and enable them to make a respectable appearance in community—avoiding alike the extremes of frivolous and expensive fashion, and an exhibition of pinching meanness! Especially is it his duty to furnish them with all the means of moral, religious and intellectual cultivation, which his circumstances will permit. In this respect the wise husband and parent will not be deficient. So much of the happiness, and respectability, and success of his family depends upon their general cultivation and knowledge, that he will strive diligently to secure all needed facilities to this end.

It is also the duty of the husband to furnish his family with the opportunity and means for consistent and proper recreation. I mean not that he should permit them to run at their own discretion, to theatres, balls, routs, and other places of dissipation, but that he should allow them all rational, moral and healthful amusements, that are within the reach of their circumstances. He who keeps his family so closely employed either in labor or study, as to preclude proper recreation, is blind to his own interest and to their welfare. These are topics, however, which will be more maturely considered in another branch of these Essays.

Another duty devolving upon husbands, is to set proper examples before his family. From his station, he will naturally exercise a great influence upon those intimately connected with him. They will look up to him, and to no small degree imbibe his spirit, manners and habits. Hence whatever he would have them become in their characteristics, he must first become himself. Would he have the wife, the children, the domestics, become industrious, economical and prudent? He must himself exhibit these virtues. If he would have the family affable, polite, and well behaved in all respects, his daily walk before them, must be of a corresponding character. When he is low, and vulgar, and ungentlemanly, in his usual deportment before them, how can he consistently anticipate that they will rise superior to himself?

So far from being indifferent in regard to the nature of his duties, and negligent in their discharge, the husband should be deeply interested in this subject. Itshould be his aim to seek out and ascertain, all the duties which devolve upon him, as a husband, a parent, a citizen and a Christian.—And having ascertained them, it should be his firm resolve to discharge them faithfully, in no other fear but the fear of God, and with no other object but the welfare of those placed by Providence under his protection, and the good of mankind at large.

As method is very essential in the efficient discharge of duty, I insert a few rules from the pen of Timothy Flint.

"If a system of living and occupation were to be framed for human beings, founded on the exposition of their nature, it would be something like this.

"1. So many hours a day would require to be dedicated by every individual in health to the exercise of his muscular and nervous systems, in labor calculated to give scope to these functions. The reward of obeying this requisite of their nature would be health, and a joyous animal existence; the punishment of neglect is disease, low spirits, and death.

"2. So many hours a day should be spent in the sedulous employment of the knowing and reflecting faculties; in studying the qualities of external objects, and their relations; also the nature of all animated beings, and their relations. The reward of this conduct would be an incalculably great increase of pleasure.

"3. So many hours a day ought to be devoted to the cultivation and gratification of our moral sentiments; that is to say, in exercising these in harmony with intellect, and especially in acquiring the habit of admiring, loving, and yielding obedience to the Creator and his institutions.

"This last object is of vast importance. Intellect is barren of practical fruit, however rich it may be in knowledge, until it is fired and prompted to act by moral sentiment. In my view, knowledge by itself is worthless and impotent, compared with what it becomes when vivified by elevated emotions. It is not enough that intellect is informed; the moral faculties must simultaneously co-operate—yielding obedience to the precepts which the intellect recognizes to be true."

HOPE AND MEMORY.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Hope and Memory are the companions of mankind. They both commence with us when we enter upon the journey of life, and continue till the golden tresses of childhood are exchanged for the silver locks of three score and ten winters. How fondly do we cherish, and how dearly do we prize them? Hope gently leads the way, and often, like some golden winged bird, ascends, harping sweet music in our ears, as she flies. If clouds of sorrow obscure our path, and life's day darken upon us, she is a creature of sunshine, and of noontide splendor, whose beams illuminate all before us, and smile in beauty and loveliness on our pathway. Though she moves before us, gilding the rough features of existence with the tints of imagination, yet we never lose sight of her in any of the walks of life, or the vicisitudes of fortune. Memory travels hand in hand with us, and faithfully registers every action and token. Her spells are all deeply set, and can not easily be erased. And should there chance to flit across our sky, deep shades of darkness while Hope was engaged with her magic skill, weaving out its promised bliss, yet these shades are almost lost sight of in the midst of the splendor which succeds them; and we only remember the sunshine and beauty, half forgetting the gloom occasioned by the passing of the momentary shades. Thus memory treasures up every token of sorrow as well as joy—grief as well as delight; but Hope's gilded beams, shining upon the tokens of sorrow and grief, destroy half their sadness and gloom, while they add new beauty and loveliness to the tokens of joy and delight. Hope beckons us onward with her lilly white hand, in which she holds some golden promise, when we might otherwise be lingering along by the gulf Despair; or still more unfortunate, when we might be contending hopelessly with its overwhelming waves. Her task is never accomplished, but always to be wrought. Her promises are bright and lovely as the rainbow-hue; but, alas! for human life—how many a promise, bright and fair, erected as it would seem, upon the foundation of living rocks, has at the first touch of the pointed finger of reality, crumbled into ruins!

While beholding the long wished for prize, and almost thinking ourselves in possession of it, often, too often, we find ourselves fatigued and panting beneath the scorching beams of disappointment, with Fate, stern and inflexible, standing by our side, and darkly smiling in scorn and contempt upon our vain efforts! But yet, from the ruins of these blasted promises, and the mouldering ashes of the long sought for, though fleeting prize, there comes a magic spell which converts the very cheat into a charm—a melody which falls upon our ears, sweet and beautiful, as if from music's thrilling lyre it sprung, leaving us almost enchanted with its tones—into a glow of richness which makes us half forget that they are the wrecks of many a goodly promise, held out by Hope to beguile us from weariness, while we wander over the monotonous path, around which Memory loves to linger. Memory is a tablet, on which is engraved many a long cherished token—a storehouse, filled with countless and costly treasures. She is busily plying at her task in our night watches, when all is hushed in voiceless silence. When languishing upon the bed of sickness, we awake from a restless sleep to the endurance of pain and anguish more severe, she is still by our side—or when the feelings of despondency creep over us, and our bosoms are pressed by sorrow's hand, she then presents her page for our inspection, on which is faithfully recorded each deep-loved token, and each dear-prized treasure, that we may read the history of the past in burning capitals, from whose brightness we may gather a halo of joy and delight, to cheer and console. And Memory never entices us into folly, by inspiring us with the idea of obtaining pleasure and enjoyment, but she is our sober companion, and journeys with us as such. Never does she create a feverish and longing anxiety in our bosoms for something beyond our reach; neither does she borrow the costume of imagination, with which to clothe her objects, that we may be lured and beguiled by their blandishment. But Hope is our gay and mirthful companion, always smiling before us like an angel of love. She too, is beside us in sorrow, sickness, and death. When we press the thorny pillow of grief, and sleep the restless slumbers of exhaustion, she is with us—when night after night has witnessed our cheeks bedewed with tears, and day after day has seen us almost loathe the sight of another, that brought only the same monotony of sorrow, she leaves us not—and when the wasting hand of disease has laid hold of our frames, and each successive hour has been conscious of our languishings, she is still by our side, casting a mocking blissfulness upon the bed of sickness—and yet 'tis not mocking; but an emblem of that purer and diviner bliss, which gives composure and calmness to the death bed, and cheers the last hours of the dying. Then how dearly should we prize, and how fondly should we cherish these companions—these kind associates, which all mankind at least, bear forth with them into the wide world, as ministers to them in all seasons, and in all the vicissitudes of fortune. Let hope move on before us to light up the way with her smiles, to gild the rough and bleak appearances of existence with her star-like beauty and loveliness, to drive away the gloom when clouds of sorrow lower, and to beguile the sting of death when the sands of life shall have run out. And let us take Memory for our bosom friend, to walk with us through the journey of life, to call up departed joys—sweet, because they now give us new pleasures—to cast a halo of brightness upon the vista of the past, and to afford us additional comfort and consolation as we approach that goal, designating the bounds between time and eternity, by presenting to our view her threads, which have year after year been weaving themselves into the texure of a spent life.

THE PRUNER.

EXCUSE FOR NOT TAKING A PAPER.

Being a short time since at the house of a friend, who was surrounded by a numerous family, advancing rapidly towards maturity, and whose worldly abundance was apparent from all about him, and who withal is a strenuous advocate for the faith of the restitution, I asked the privilege of looking at his last Magazine; and judge my astonishment on being told he did not take it.

What, thought I, a man worth his ten thousands, and take no paper devoted to the inculcation of that faith which works by love and purifies the heart! A strange compound here, truly! After the first shock had subsided, I asked him to take the "Magazine and Advocate," or some kindred periodical, and what, think ye, was his excuse? "He had no means—would like the paper much," etc.!

And yet, strange to tell, during the same visit, he talked of buying a farm worth fifty thousand dollars! He had means enough for this; but for a silent-winged herald of the cross, he had no means, not even twelve shillings to spare!

I pressed the subject gently, when he said "his family was large, and he must be economical in order to give them a start in the world!"

What singular views people have of giving their children a start in the world! Lace and ribbons are too often the highest motives of the mother in starting her daughters into the world; and the father sometimes thinks that a few dollars and cents, will not fail of making a man of his son! Such base views will start young men in the service of mammon, but never in the service of their Maker. He might as well have said, "Give me money, and I want no more; that will minister to my animal nature, and this I prize far above aught of a moral nature." His large family was a reason why spiritual food should have been provided, that their moral powers should no longer lie a "desert waste," but pure religion be mingled with their young minds, and grow with their growth, and strengthen with their strength.

Thirty pieces of silver had more influence with Judas, than the love of his Master, or he would not have betrayed him. And at this day, he who prizes "filthy lucre" above the means of Gospel grace, will be sure to choose the former, and sell the latter at all times to the highest bidder. Unholy branch of selfishness, thou shouldst fall by the hook of

REVIEW OF OLD MANUSCRIPTS.

BY MRS. U. M. USHER.

There is something pleasing, and yet somewhat melancholy, in perusing a packet of old manuscripts. There are many, perhaps, that will smile at the subject I have chosen, but to me it brings with it something of a deep and solemn reflection. Often, as I review them, it brings fresh to my mind the scenes of my earlier youth, the playmates of my school-girl days. And where are they, the companions of my youth, over whose epistles I have so often shed the tear of friendship or of sorrow? Alas! we are separated by that vast distance which time always makes with ripening and more advanced years. Some, however, sleep that long and dreamless sleep which can not be broken, till the last trump shall reanimate their lifeless clay. Even now I hold in my hand one written by a relative in a gay and lively mood, who a few months since was in the possession of fine health, and who I once thought would outlive many like myself, but who now sleeps a stranger in a distant land, far from his home and kindred. Here is another epistle, that contains a portrait and a lock of hair. It is the friend of my juvenile days, the highly gifted and accomplished H——. Dear, cherished mementoes! how often I retrace the first dawn of our early friendship, and of the many happy hours we have spent in climbing the beautiful yet somewhat rugged hills of New-England, to watch the setting sun, as it sunk to its evening rest in the golden horizon, and wonder if beyond this vale of tears a more resplendent sun could shine. But she is now in heaven. That glorious orb of light and life, which we have together so often admired, is but a dim shadow of that resplendent glory which she is now permitted to behold! Alas, what changes will time make with all things around us. This packet of old manuscripts is all that remains of many warm and cherished friends, in whose society I have spent many, very many pleasant hours, and whose remembrance can never, never be forgotten! Alas, we live in a world of changes!—change and decay is written on every thing around us; "we meet, and heart is knit to heart—to-morrow, and we are doomed to part to meet no more." And so it is, and so it must be. We must gradually have our affections drawn from earth, to show us that this is not our abiding place, but that we are pilgrims here, traveling to a country not subject to changes, where perennial spring will bloom, flowers never fade, friends never change, and the heart of the afflicted and sorrowing will find rest.

UNIVERSALISM IN ROCHESTER, N.Y.

I have for some time wished to give you some information relative to the condition of our cause in this city, but have not done so in consequence of not being able to make up my mind in regard to our prospects. But I now feel justified in giving you the following statements.

Before, and at the time, I accepted an invitation to settle here, I had many doubts and fears in relation to the progress of our cause in this place. Several trials had been made without much visible success, and our few friends had nearly despaired of keeping up a meeting. But feeling anxious to do all in my power to promote the interests of a cause which I love, and in which I have made no inconsiderable sacrifice, I enlisted, though with much fear and trembling. Our house was filled to overflowing; but there was a general religious excitement, and I feared that, when the excitement subsided, the zeal of many would grow cold. But I have thus far been happily disappointed. Our house continues to be well filled with attentive and respectable hearers; our friends are constantly increasing in number and zeal, and I am happy to say our condition is prosperous.

We have, as you are aware, a very convenient house of worship, for which I regret to say, we are considerably in debt. This is one discouraging circumstance, and is not easily overcome, considering the extreme pressure in money matters. But our brethren are sanguine in the opinion that the debt can be cancelled. Patience and perseverance will work wonders in a good enterprise. I have no sure means of stating the precise number embraced in what we may reckon as our society; but I think I may safely say that there are at least 150 of both sexes, who are ready and willing, when the call is made, to subscribe to our constitution. This, however, is but a part of our usual congregation.

We have a very interesting Sabbath school, embracing over 80 scholars and teachers; in addition to which, we have a good Bible class, comprising particularly the teachers of the Sabbath school. We are likewise about organising a "Female Benevolent Society," which, I think, will prove pleasing and profitable. Our music is good—our friends, particularly many young gentlemen and ladies, are engaged and willing to go forward; and I think we have good reasons for hoping that our cause in this city has finally attained a firm and respectable establishment.—When I contemplate the struggle which we had last March, with the boasting and abusive Goliah of slander, vulgarity and falsehood, in the person of him whose name I can not conscienciously write, except as the Persians write the name of their "god of evil"—thus: ɹɐʌuʎɯ—I am more than ever convinced of the truth of that saying—"The wrath of man shall praise Him, and the remainder of wrath he will restrain."

CONFERENCE AT PERRY.

Br. GROSH—At our Conference, held in Perry, on the 10th and 11th days of July, we had a very interesting and happy meeting. Thirteen preachers were present, and five sermons preached on the occasion, by Brs. Flagler, Whitcomb, Sadler, Pickering and Qucal. The preaching was of that kind calculated to instruct the mind in the principles of the Gospel of Christ, and warm the feelings with the spirit of that Gospel. Br. S. Barnes was ordained on the second day of the meeting. The ordination services were as follows:—Introductory prayer, Br. A. Kelsey. Sermon, Br. Wm. Qucal. Ordaining prayer, Br. T. J. Whitcomb. Charge and delivery of Scriptures, Br. D. Pickering. Right hand of fellowship, Br. O. Roberts. The meeting was well attended, and many were the hearts to exclaim—"It is good for me to be here."

Notwithstanding we have much and bitter opposition to contend with here, our cause is onward; and we feel to thank God for his blessings which have attended our exertions to advance the interests of Zion in this part of our Master's vineyard. May the Lord continue to prosper this people.

A HINT TO YOUNG MEN.

The young man, whether minister, lawyer, doctor, or what not, who allows self-conceit to rank itself among his predominate faculties, is certainly to be pitied, rather than made the object either of scorn or satire. His private feelings, however agreable to himself for the time being, can never be to him a source of that real satisfaction, of which he might otherwise be a happy recipient. He has no criterion by which to ascertain his true estimation, and can seldom, if ever, be made certain that he has his superiors within the circle of his intimate acquaintances.—He is a little lower than the angels, he admits; but considers his associates a little lower—a little inferior to himself in intellect. No one but himself possesses strength and comprehension of mind, penetration of judgment, or power of discrimination. No mortal but himself, is able to wield a pen, or shine in the galaxy of eloquence. He views himself as an image of perfection, and imagining himself possessed of that enterprising genius, which distinguishes superior from inferior beings, he swells himself like un crapaud—and breathing not a little of the atmosphere of the regions of fancy, ranks himself with the "greatest, the wisest of mankind."

THE BLESSEDNESS OF THE PURE IN HEART.

EXTRACT FROM A SERMON.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

"Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God."

We had intended to exemplify the truth of our text by the experience of an individual with whom we were once acquainted, and with the hearer's permission we will now endeavor so to do, although it is a departure from our usual manner of sermonising. The individual to whom we allude was a young lady—one of the excellent of the earth—who has now gone to her long home, to her final rest in the "spirit land" on high. All who knew her—and they are many—will bear me record that she was one of earth's noblest gems; one of the brightest ornaments of human nature. The innocence of the untarnished, uncorrupted infant, was painted upon her countenance, and shadowed forth in her life; and the frail tenement of clay seemed to enshrine within, the holy fount of gentleness, benevolence, and moral purity, from which flow all those living streams of moral excellence which cheer and brighten the rugged pathway of human life. Considering virtuous innocence and moral purity the noblest graces that can adorn the female character, she constantly endeavored to cultivate the one, and in her life to image forth the other. Wherever she appeared, all was joy and gladness. At her approach, "vice in his high career would seem to stand appalled, and the heedless, rambling impulse," of the thoughtless youth "would," for a moment at least, "learn to think" of nobler and better things than the vain amusements of a transitory hour, or the flattering allurements of what the world calls pleasure.

But dark clouds will sometimes arise, and obscure the brightness of the noonday sun. Unforeseen trials, and troubles, and perplexities, will oftentimes come up in the mind, and throw a shade of sorrow and sadness over the heart of the most innocent and pure on earth. It was so with her. Endowed with a mind of keen perception, and possessed of the tenderest sensibilities of our nature, she could not long remain unconcerned, or inattentive to the claims of religion upon the children of our God. But it was her lot, as it has been the lot of thousands to have her attention first called to this important subject under the most repulsive and forbidding circumstances. She was in the midst of party spirit and sectarian zeal. She heard and saw the character of our heavenly Father, painted in the most unlovely colors. Instead of being a God of boundless love, and unfailing mercy, he was depicted as clad in robes of vengeance, and consigning untold numbers of those whom he had created in his own image, to the dark regions of endless despair, where no ray of hope could ever come, but where misery, and wo, and anguish would be their portion as long as God himself should exist. Oh! how long, how long will men continue to degrade the character of the God of heaven, by ascribing to him conduct that would brand a human being with the stigma of everlasting reproach! Such sentiments could not find a congenial home in the bosom of one whose heart was so pure, and who, in her daily walk, so much exemplified the beauty, the glory, and the power of gentleness, benevolence, and love; and she shrunk from them with instinctive horror. Meanwhile the different parties which held to these general principles, but differing upon minor points, were each in their turn endeavoring to persuade her to become reconciled to their peculiar faith, and join their church, and worship God in their way and manner. And so earnestly did they urge their suit, and so forcibly did they work upon the sensibilities of her heart, that her mind became bewildered, and she found herself lost in a wilderness of contending feelings, and knew not whither to direct her course.

Yet God had not forsaken her. The impress of his image was inscribed upon her heart, and she could behold him in every thing around her. To her all nature spoke of the existence of an Almighty Maker, wise and good, and she could not adopt the cold and cheerless faith of the unbeliever. Neither could she believe it reasonable, or consistent with the character of a God, all powerful, wise, and good, to call intelligent beings into existence, either designing that they should, or knowing that they would, spend but a brief period here on the earth, of alternate joy and sorrow, and then lie down in the hopelessness of endless despair. The latter was as uncongenial to her soul, as the former was unreasonable to her mind. And yet she was not fully satisfied that "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself," and "that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he will gather together in one all things in Christ."

Such was the state of her mind when fell disease prostrated her upon the couch of sickness, from which she never arose, until her spirit ascended "to God who gave it." While in this situation, when her physical nature was racked with pain, her mind became calm and serene, and confiding, and then she realized the promise—the blessedness of our text. She saw her God in all the beauty, and glory, and excellency of his character, as a being of boundless goodness and undying love—as the universal Father, and Saviour of all our race. Oh, blessed sight, oh, cheering faith, and glorious hope! It was indeed "as an anchor of her soul, both sure and steadfast," and in the gay and sunny season of youth, she was unmoved by the approach of death; for her faith looked far beyond the dark valley and shadow of death, to that brighter, better, ever enduring world, where her possessions were garnered up. And when the tokens of her approaching dissolution caused the tear of sorrow to trickle down the cheek of paternal love, and the tinge of sadness to linger on the brow of maternal affection, she could point them away to the spirit land, and say "weep not for me. Our parting will be but for a short time. This world is not my home. I am going to Jesus. I shall be happier than I am now, and soon I shall meet and see you again." In this delightful and happy state of mind, she fell asleep in the arms of her Saviour, and on the wings of love, her peaceful spirit soared away to the realms of immortal purity, to dwell forever in the presence of God, where she will see as she is seen, and know as she is known, and thus reap the full fruition of the blessedness of "the pure in heart." Oh! who would not wish to meet the "pale king of terrors" thus calm, confiding, and hopeful! Who would fear or dread to die, when such a boundless scene of unsullied bliss and perennial joy opened to the view on the bright shores of immortality! To such, death has no terrors. He is but an angel of mercy sent to conduct us home. 'Tis but the voice of Jesus inviting us to his arms.

"Sweet is the scene where virtue dies."

Youthful readers, from this simple sketch, you and I may learn an important and useful lesson. Life is but short at the longest. Death is certain, and we know not how near may be its approach. Many whose hopes were once as bright as ours, have been cut off and are now numbered with the silent dead. And we know not how soon the same fate may be ours. Would we go off the stage happy, confiding, and hopeful, as did she whose experience we have thus faintly portrayed—let us cultivate inward purity of heart. To each and every one we would say—let virtuous innocence be the glory of thy life. Look upon God as your Father, upon Jesus as your Saviour, and upon heaven as your home. Then, through life, in sickness and in health, in adversity and in prosperity, in the solemn hour of death, and throughout the endless ages of eternity, you will "see God," and enjoy the blessedness of "the pure in heart."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER TEN.

KINGS—These books, called Kings, were compiled by Ezra from authentic records, written near the time of the transactions, several of them being expressly referred to in these books, and also in the Chronicles, as the "Acts of Solomon"—chap. xi; the "Books of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah and Israel." Very frequently too, the book of Jasher is referred to, which contained the acts of Jehosaphat. See 2 Chron. xx: 34. This book contains a history of a period of about six hundred years.

1st Kings ix: 28. "And they came to Ophir and fetched from thence gold four hundred and twenty talents," etc.

Ophir is thought by some to have been a place in the East Indies; but Bruce and Priestly are of the opinion that it was in Africa; which is probably correct.

1st Kings x: 1. "And when the queen of Sheba," etc.

Mr. Bruce, with great probability, places the queen of Sheba in Africa, on the coast of Adel, and supposes her empire to have extended over Abyssinia.

1st Kings xvii: 4. "And I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there."

Instead of ravens, some suppose that the word so rendered is the name of a neighboring people, the Orbim; and in that part of the country there was a town called Aorabi or Orbo.

1st Kings xvii: 22. "And the Lord heard the voice of Elijah, and the soul of the child came into him again and he revived."

This is the first miracle of the kind on record. All that is meant here by his soul's coming to him again, is, that his life or breath returned.—Much as has been said in relation to this miracle, and in opposition to the doctrine of the resurrection; surely no Christian who believes in the existence of God, and that he is the creator of man, will doubt that he can take life or restore it whenever he pleases, and as many times as he pleases.

2d Kings vi: 25. "And the fourth part of a cab of doves dung for five pieces of silver."

It was no doubt vetches, or some course food usually given to asses or fowls, that was so dear. Bochart says that vetches were called doves dung.

2d Kings viii: 10. "And Elisha said unto him (Hazael) go say unto him, (the king of Syria,) thou mayest recover: howbeit the Lord hath shewed me that he shall surely die.'

At first view this would appear a plain contradiction; but all that Elisha meant was that Benhadad's disease was not naturally incurable, and he would not die of it; but from a different cause. He foresaw that he would die by violent means.

Verse 13. "And Hazael said, but what! is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing?"

Hazael thought it impossible that he should ever be guilty of such shocking cruelties, or have it in his power to commit them; yet when he was king of Syria he actually did these very things. We see by this, how much the disposition and conduct of men depend on the circumstances in which they are placed, and the influences to which they are exposed.

2d Kings xxi: 10. "And the Lord spake by his servants, the prophets," etc.

Hosea, Joel, Nahum and Habakkuk, and, as some think, Obadiah, prophesied in the reign of Manassah, son of Hezekiah; and Isaiah is said to have been sawn asunder by his orders. This was before the Babylonian captivity, and justbefore the restoration, or reformation of the Jewish religion under the reign of king Josiah. This was in the year 656 before Christ.

2d Kings xi: 8. "And Hilkiah the priest, said unto Saphan the scribe, I have found the book of the Law in the house of the Lord."

This was probably the original copy of the book of the law, which had been laid up in the holy of holies. Whether Josiah knew of the existence of this book is not certain; but if he did it had probably been very much neglected, not only by him but by all the people. After becoming acquainted with the words of this book, he engaged in the work of reformation with great zeal, and finally succeeded in saving the Israelites from the idolatrous worship of the heathen, and restoring the ancient Mosaic institutions, in which they continued throughout his reign. This shows the powerful influence which the precepts of the Bible have in correcting the vices and follies, not only of individuals, but of communities, and even whole nations.

2d Kings xxv: 7. "And they slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, and put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Babylon."

Thus were fulfilled two prophecies, which apparently contradicted one another. Jeremiah prophecied that Zedekiah would be carried to Babylon; see chap. xxxii: 5, and xxxiv: 3; whereas Ezekiel had said he would not see Babylon. See chapters xii, and xiii. He was carried thither blind, having his eyes put out; hence he was carried to Babylon, though he did not see Babylon.

2d Kings xxvth chapter. In this chapter we have an account of the taking of Jerusalem, and the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar.

This is what is called the Babylonish captivity, and took place in the year 600 before Christ.

COMMENT ON GENESIS III: 14 AND 15:

In which it is shown that the common notions about the Serpent must be incorrect—that the Serpent is not a wicked, fallen spirit, as many have supposed.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

"And the Lord God said unto the serpent, because thou hast done this," i. e., beguiled the woman.—It is here evident that all the curses which follow in these verses, were inflicted on the serpent because it had done this act.

"Thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field:"—As a punishment for one act, the serpent was to be made more wretched and miserable, than any other animal.

"Upon thy belly shalt thou go,"—As this is a punishment inflicted in consequence of beguiling the woman, it is evident the serpent did not previously perform locomotion in this manner. And in what way did he go? "Did he walk about erect like a man? If so, he must have cut a curious figure, truly, travelling about upon the end of his tail!"

"And dust shalt thou eat."—"Dust shall be the serpent's meat;" hence the serpent can not be an immortal spirit, for such a spirit, surely, would not feed on dust, and the words, "All the days of thy life," certainly imply that the life of the serpent should come to an end. Hence not an immortal spirit.

"And I will put enmity between thee and the woman."—Hence they must have been previously on terms of friendship.

"And between thy seed"—The serpent was of the feminine gender, and was destined to bring forth multitudes of young serpents. She could hardly have been a fallen angel, for we have no evidence that such have any gender, and she could not have been the old devil himself, without a change of sex: and if she was immortal, and has multiplied her seed as fast as mother Eve, what a host of young devils there must be now!

"And her seed,"—That is, the offspring of the woman.—The woman and the serpent was to be at enmity, and their offspring were to be at enmity. If Christ is particularly referred to, by the seed of the woman, as many suppose; and as no enmity could have existed between the parties, before this condemnatory sentence, if the serpent had not beguiled the woman, Christ would have been on terms of friendship with the old serpent and her young ones.

"And it shall bruise thy head."—The offspring of the woman, in consequence of the enmity which existed, would effectually destroy the serpent and her seed.

"And thou shalt bruise his heel."—Wound and torment the seed of the woman.—If the serpent be the devil, and her seeds be her works, or sin; and the seed of the woman be Christ; then, the devil and sin are to wound and torment man, but man is to come off victorious: for they will ultimately sink to eternal oblivion, and be known no more forever.

"The second man from the dust, Restores the ruins of the first:"
"The woman's seed shall be my son;
He shall destroy what thou hast done." AMEN.

CHOICE OF INSTRUCTORS.

Had I the whole world to range over, and had the power to place my family with whom I would, to be educated, where and to whom would I send them? Passing by thousands whose professions and fair exterior are imposing, I would seek out an humble, a rational, a practical disciple of Jesus—a real Christian—a man of an almost unworldly tone of feeling. Instructed under the influence of the precepts and example of such a man, my children would imbibe and carry with them into the world, a prevailing sense of the constant presence with them of their Father—the expressions of his will would be investigated and reverentially adhered to in life—the thought of him would be uppermost in their minds—every event and every object around them would bear their thoughts upward to him. This constant remembrance of their heavenly Parent—this reference of every thing to him—this rational understanding of the constitution and laws under which he has placed them—and the formation of their dispositions and habits in correspondence with these views, would constitute the greatest boon which I could confer upon them—the richest inheritance I could leave them. Now as I can not range the world, or send them wherever they will, I must endeavor to be myself the thorough Christian I should seek after, to exhibit in all circumstances, and at all seasons of gaity, relaxation and business, that habitual sense of the presence of God—of superintending Beneficence and Wisdom—with which I should rejoice to see the bosoms of my children imbued. As those who adopt the profession of teaching, stand, perhaps, next to parents in the influence which they exert on the formation of character, I should exert all my influence in elevating and ameliorating the character of these helps to parents. All movements of this kind deserve my attention as a parent and director of youth; my consideration, my co-operation. Further, whatever I can do to aid the amelioration of the youth of the land who are to be the companions and co-actors with my own family, is indirectly improving the latter. Whatever I can do in disseminating works of an elevated standard, and in creating a taste for the highest productions of Christianized intellect, I am, so far, surrounding my children with aids the most favorable to their improvement in virtue, and to their happiness.—My faculties need never stagnate for want of something do do, while such a field of noble exertions is before me in the single capacity of parent! BR. T. F. KING.

Br. King has been declining for some time, being afflicted with a disease of the stomach which has reduced him very low. At the last information he was confined to his bed. We devoutly hope he may yet be restored to health, to his family, and to the ministry of reconciliation, of which he has been a worthy and able minister.

P. S. Since the above was in type, we learn by a friend from the east, that there was little or no hopes of Br. King's recovery, the first of this week.

BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATIONS....NO. VII.

"And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment."—HEB. ix: 27.

It is a very humiliating fact, but not therefore any the less true, that many people are unacquainted with the Charter Book of Christian faith—the Scriptures of eternal life. Many there are, who array themselves under the banner of Jesus, and pretend to be active citizens in the kingdom of divine truth, who do not understand the doctrinal and moral laws promulged by Christ and his apostles—but who depend on hearsay, and whose faith, if faith it can be called, is a mere assent to certain ill-defined propositions, advanced by some favorite teacher, or handed from father to son, as a matter of course true, because others have believed them. Hence it is that people, on a subject of the most tremendous importance, I mean that of ceaseless wo, frequently imagine and advance as proof of that sentiment, such passages as these—"As the tree falls, so it shall lie; as death leaves us, judgment will find us"—"If ye die in your sins, where God and Christ are ye can never come"—"God out of Christ is a consuming fire"—"There is no repentance in the grave." The text likewise, in this desire to have the Scriptures prove peculiar notions, is so altered at times by sectarians, that the author of it would scarcely know his own child. How frequently it is quoted in this form—"It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after death the judgment!"

All these instances are corruptions of the common version, so twisted and altered, that they may well be called, "home made Scripture"—which is but saying, that man, instead of taking divine testimony as it was given Christ and his apostles, emphatically frames it anew after the traditions and fables of men—consequently, in many instances, faith, instead of being a robe of spotless white, which clothes the "spirits of just men made perfect," is but the coarse sackloth which hides the hideous deformities of broad error. It is truly to be lamented, that the Bible is so much neglected and so many opinions received on trust—for if the Bible was cherished as the only creed-book which a Christian should acknowledge; if it should be perused often, attentively and prayerfully, simply with the desire of ascertaining what it does teach; if all sides should be heard with candor and soberness; then the thousand sects and biting contentions would cease, from the fact, that they would have no fuel to feed them; while truth would be discovered in all its essential parts, and be diffused like light, to the improvement of the condition and morality of community.

But in the absence of such investigation, with creed-books in place of the Bible, and hearsay misrepresentation of one party from their enemies, instead of examining their own defence, we must expect divisions among men, and the Christian world to be divided into unaccommodating and sectarian parties. Hence, we lament that the Bible is so much neglected. Under such circumstances, it becomes us all to lend our exertions in the great cause of disabusing the public mind, to labor ardently for the truth, and to constantly hold it up before the eyes of men with a Christian spirit, that they may be induced to shake off that persecuting, implicit faith, which so distinguished the dark ages of popery, and so much of which still lurks beneath Protestant banners. With the desire of advancing truth, we approach the text; and while we freely acknowledge that we see no just grounds for the common notions drawn from it, we trust that our reasons for such dissent and the elucidation of our views of it, will be read with candid attention and be duly weighed in the balance of reason. In endeavoring to fix the precise meaning of the apostle, three important propositions will be particularly considered.

I. Let the inquiry be urged—what is there about the term "judgment," from which the idea of interminable wo can be drawn? Does that term, of itself, embrace such an idea? It will be observed that this term is all that there is about the text, which can be supposed to countenance such a notion. But, be it remembered, that the term "judgment" simply means a decision upon any given subject. The judge upon his bench is expected to pass judgment upon all cases which may come before him; but his judgments are not only in some cases, judgments of condemnation, but in other cases, they are judgments of acquittal. The mere fact that he will pass judgment, is, of itself, no indication what the nature of the judgment will be, whether of acquittal, or a long or short period of punishment. It is true, that in some instances, the word "judgment" in the Scriptures, is used in place of punishment—but in no instance does it denote the duration of the punishment itself.

It is used to denote what is due from us to the stranger, the widow and the fatherless. Hence, in the law of Moses it is said—"Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow; and all the people shall say, Amen."—Deut. xxvii: 19. It is used to denote wisdom. When two women, one of whom had lost her child, appeared before Solomon, and he debated which was the mother of the remaining child, he hit upon an expedient to find the true mother. Hence, he commanded that the child should be cut in two, and half given to each. This called out the affection of the real mother, who, rather than have the child killed, begged that her opponent might be permitted to take it. What then did Solomon say? "Give her the living child, and in no wise slay it; she is the mother thereof. And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged."—1 Kings iii: 27, 28. It is used to denote the laws of God. "My soul breaketh for the longing it hath unto thy judgments at all times."—Ps. cxix: 20. It is used to denote the word of God—"Behold my servant, whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my spirit upon him, and he shall show judgment to the Gentiles."—Matt. xii. 18. It is used to denote that all people will be rewarded according to their deeds. "To execute judgment upon all."—Jude 16. That is, reward the righteous and punish the wicked. It is used to denote the afflictions which came upon the primitive followers of Christ, while defending the truth—"For the time is come, that judgment must begin at the house of God:" 1 Peter iv: 17.

From these instances, and they might be multiplied to a great extent, it must be seen that the meaning of judgment is a decision; but that the nature or quality of the decision, is not found in the term itself, but in the subject wherein the term is used. Hence, when the judge passes judgment in a number of cases, we know that the nature of the judgment in each case, is determined by the statute book. Admit then, that the death of the text is natural death, the separation of mind and matter by death, and that the judgment comes after that death, even then it does not prove ceaseless wo, for does the text say what the judgment is? For aught the text says, it may be a judgment of acquittal and admittance into heaven, or a judgment of limited punishment for reformation.

I now remark, that those who draw the idea of ceaseless wo from the text, do not themselves believe what they think it proves. They tell us that all men are to be judged—hence the text is frequently quoted thus—"It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after death the judgment." If they suppose that judgment means endless misery, what is the consequence? Why, all men will be lost, for all are to be judged. Do they believe this? No, they do not—for they believe that the judgment to the righteous will be for good, but to the evil it will be for evil.

II. Let it be carefully observed in the elucidation of his matter, that the text is used as a comparison for the illustration of some other truth connected with it. Paul states first a truth—"But now, once, in the end of the world, hath he (Christ) appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself"—that is, in the ending of the Jewish world, age or economy, Christ appeared and was sacrificed for the deliverance of his people from their sins. He then adds—"And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin unto salvation." The words "as" and "so," are terms of comparison. What says the Psalmist? Observe—"As the hart panteth for the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God," etc.—xlii: 1. The soul of David panted for the worship of God—how?—as the thirsty deer panted for the water-brooks. In the 24th chap. of Matt. it is said—"For as the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so also shall the coming of the son of man be—for wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." That is—as lightning, beginning at the east, shines at the west, so should the power of Christ be manifested in the Roman armies for the destruction of his murderers, which armies should enter Palestine on the east and traverse it to the West.

The words "as" and "so," are as certainly used for terms of comparison in the text, as in the two instances just mentioned. So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many—how?—as men died and afterwards the judgment. There are three points of comparison—1, between the men who died and Christ—2, between their death and his death—3, between the judgment and his appearing without sin unto salvation. These are the points of comparison, which Paul attempted—but admitting the common notions to be true, they are no points of comparison at all—for, can there be any comparison between Christ and all men simply as men—between their death and his death—between a judgment which sentences men to ceaseless wo, and his appearing without sin unto salvation? In the true light of the subject, however, this want of comparison ceases.

CAN GOD SAVE ALL?

"Not consistently with the free agency which he has given to every man," says an Arminian. Let us examine whether the negation is correct. We admit, then, that men are free agents—that a salvation against their wills would, in effect, be no salvation at all. But we lay it down, as a self-evident proposition, that it is easier to sway and ultimately control the will of one perverse man, than it would be to sway, and ultimately control the wills of a succession of perverse men—that is, allowing the one to be under influence for 1000 years, and the successive persons to be 40 in number, and each to be under influence for only 25 years. Take a savage—one who bows to idols of wood and stone, and placates their wrath by smearing their altars with human gore. Preach to him the Gospel—bring its influence to bear upon him in the gradual progress of civilization, for 25 years. He then passes from the operations of the Gospel, and his son takes his place. For twenty-five years, the same influence operated slowly upon him, surrounded as he is by evil examples and operated upon by unfavorable circumstances, and the evil influences of hereditary bias and early education. Another succeeds—another—and yet another—until the forty have passed through the slow, unsteady and unequal process. Thus the descendants of the ancient Gaul, German, Briton and Dane have been brought up to the height of religion and civilization where they now stand—and their children, and their children's children, each starting where the parents left off, will continue, on the whole, to go onward and upward, till the highest earthly destination of the human race has been reached.

Now suppose that one of their remote ancestors had been gifted with a self renewing constitution 1000 years ago, and had lived on all this time, operated upon by the same influences that have changed his descendants from barbarism to civilization. Would not his greater experience, (better than historic or legendary lore,) the knowledge of his gradual advancement, and the conviction arising from a continual comparison of the present with the past—would not all these advantages cause the influences of the Gospel to carry him onward and upward, faster than they carried his descendants? Certainly they would!

Well—if the descendants have been thus improved, and are improving as a whole, without any violence being offered to their free agency, does it not follow that if God will only continue men free agents in the future state, and continue as good to them there as he was and is here, all mankind must ultimately be saved in accordance with their free agency?

Add to this another fact.—In the future state, the propensities and desires of the flesh will no more exist to cloud, or bewilder, or lead astray the mind—gold will not be there to excite avarice, nor avarice exist to lead to theft or oppression—alcohol will not be there to tempt a depraved appetite, nor thirst exist to drink to drunkenness—and consequently, all sins originating in fleshly wants and desires must cease. Now, tell me, how long must these influences operate amid, and aided by the realities of eternity, before mind freed from fleshly lusts, would be saved from sin, without any violation of free agency?

THE MORMONS AND THE INDIANS.

I feel some delicacy in introducing this subject—because I believe the Mormons to have been grievously injured and persecuted by the State of Missouri, and to be quite sufficiently unpopular among all denominations, without my adding to the amount of public disfavor by my remarks; and also, because the subject is not altogether one becoming our columns as a wholly religious paper. But if my fears are well founded, the subject is so all-important to the union at large, and to the western frontier in particular, that it demands some notice at my hands.

In our last was an article from Dr. H. R. Shetterly, of Utica, Macomb county, Mich., an intelligent and candid man, giving probably as full and correct a statement of the opinions of the Mormons as has ever appeared in any of our periodicals. There is in that account one paragraph, which I here republish, because I wish attention drawn to it very particularly.

With regard to our planet, they believe there will be millenium of a thousand years duration, (Rev. xx: 4, 5,) which will commence in 1847, by the rebuilding of Jerusalem, etc. At the commencement, the devil (they believe in a personal devil) will be cast into the bottomless pit, (verses 2, 3,) and during its continuance those high wrought descriptions of Isaiah (xi, and xii,) will be literally and exactly fulfilled. But before the ushering in of this long looked for period, nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and, aided by the plagues described in the Apocalypse, will destroy one another till only one third (Zech. xii: 8) of all the inhabitants of the earth remain. Then will this remnant make war against the latter day Saints, who have remained spectators, and they (the Saints) will arise, aided by the Israelites, consisting of the descendants of Ephraim and Manasseh, (who were the sons of Joseph,) namely, our Indians, and the ten tribes inhabiting the north polar region, who will all have been converted by the Gospel; and one of this army shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, (Josh. xxiii: 10; Deut. xxxii: 30,) before their commander Christ Jesus riding the white horse, (Rev. xix: 11); and the prophecies (Rev. xiv: 20; xix: 21; Isa. xiv: 2) and a great number of others, which never have been, shall then be literally fulfilled. From these dreadful calamities the latter day Saints are desirous of saving us. This last paragraph I have inferred from hints dropped in conversation, and from my friend's, quotations; it may therefore not be exactly stated as he believes it, as he declined stating minutely.

Mr. Catlin, in his most valuable and intensely interesting remarks, made while exhibiting his wonderful collection of Indian portraits, curiosities, etc., in this city, two years ago, said that the Indians on our entire western frontier could bring 30,000 warriors into the field, if they ever combined their forces for that purpose. Thirty thousand Indian warriors, led by a talented and crafty chieftain, whether a red or a white man, would be a formidable—an almost irresistible force in their first onset. For, if they combined and prepared for the war secretly, as they probably would do, they could at once overpower all our military force at the West, paralyze the defenceless and unsuspecting inhabitants with the war cry of havoc, the murders, fires and desolation which they would spread on either hand as they rushed forward, and so might succeed in making one black desert of fire and gore from the western confines of our white settlements, eastward to the Mississippi at the South, and its upper tributaries at the North. For the whites being taken by surprise, would scarcely be able to act in sufficient concert, and with requisite coolness, until thus driven together by their merciless foes.

Now comes the question which has, for sometime, agitated my mind. May not these Mormon leaders, (some of whom are undoubted men of particular talent and influence,) attempt to carry out their faith as developed in the above extract, even before the Indians are converted to Mormonism? They feel themselves injured by our popular denominations, as the Indians do by our nation. The Indians, too, have a strong inclination to superstition and fanaticism, which these Mormon leaders might easily get hold of, and work up into a patriotic and religious frenzy. And if such a union can be effected, as the Mormons affect to believe will take place, must not the consequences be terrible to our western country?

The Mormons have their civil and religious rights, and those rights should be respected, most strictly, by our National and State governments The violation of this duty by a sister State is already likely to cost us much. Let the future witness a better performance of it than the past. But while the Mormons are thus protected in the exercise of their clear and undoubted rights, the United States should be constantly on the watch, to see if any clouds are arising in the west, and to prepare forces sufficient to meet and disperse them when the proper season arrives. Let those who live in the vicinity of Mormons, watch closely their doctrines and their movements, and report truly any causes of complaint to the proper authorities, that every thing may be done that can be done constitutionally, legally and righteously, to frustrate any improper designs which they may manifest—and there will be no danger.

WEDNESDAY AND THURSDAY.

These are the days on which our Associations and Conferences generally hold their meetings in this and the eastern States. There have been good and sufficient reasons for selecting these days in preference to others. In former times Universalists were few in number, and widely scattered, and our Associations embraced a large extent of territory; so that Monday and Tuesday were required for travelling to reach the place of meeting from extreme points, and Friday and Saturday for returning home again. Besides, in the newness of the settlements, the roads were bad, and required a longer time to traverse some 50 miles than it now does to go twice that distance, especially on a rail road!

Times have changed. Associations are numerous and generally embrace but a territory that can be travelled, from one extremity to another, in one day, without even a locomotive. Preachers and lay believers are numerous, and more closely settled than they were twenty years ago. In almost all cases, all who wish to attend an Association or Conference, and spend the preceding or succeeding Sunday at home, can reach its meeting on Monday night, or, at farthest, on Tuesday morning in time for public services, and could return in one day also, or, at most, in one day with the addition of a few hours borrowed from the preceding evening.

These considerations bring us to our intended suggestion—which is this—I propose that hereafter, and whenever circumstances permit, our Associations and Conferences be held on Tuesdays and Wednesdays, instead of Wednesdays and Thursdays, as at present.—The advantages of this alteration would be, briefly, the following.

1. It would not break up the week into such small fragments of time as the present mode. Now, Monday is the only laboring day before the Association—Tuesday and Friday are spent in going to or coming from it—and Saturday is the only laboring day after the meeting. But on this plan, Friday and Saturday, two days together are gained for labor. Monday, the day on which a school-boy reluctance to go to work infects almost every body, would be spent in going to the meeting, and Thursday in returning from it.

2. Preachers in particular feel "Mondayish," and are then in excellent tune for travelling. But on the present mode, these feelings evaporate in lounging about at home, and on Tuesday comes the desire to sit down to write and to study, rather than to travel. And again, on the present mode, as the preacher can not prepare sermons on Monday, the preparation for the next Sunday is put off till his return. And who ever wrote a good sermon on Saturday, and that, too, just after his return from a journey? The congregation, in such cases, must expect to suffer some, unless their preacher can remember, so as to preach to them, some of the good sermons he heard at the Association! And to compel a man into doing this, is not altogether fair; for what business has he to be preaching other men's sermons?

For these, and for other reasons that might be named more seriously, I am in favor of altering the meetings of our Associations and Conferences to Tuesdays and Wednesdays.—The State and General Conventions are different meetings. They are attended by persons from such a distance, that, probably, the middle of the week will accommodate the greatest number. But for the others, I move they be altered. Who seconds the motion?

PROPOSITIONS, QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Proposition.—God is infinite in goodness, illimitable in power, and unbounded in wisdom.

Question.—In view of endless misery, I ask, would the infinite goodness of God permit his illimitable power to create a finite being, when his unbounded wisdom foresaw that the end of that finite being would be wo; the heart-breaking, inconceivable and horrible wo of anguish accumulating on anguish world without end?

Answer.—"The Lord is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all his works." Ps. cxlv: 9. "The Lord will not cast off forever: but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies: for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." Lam. iii: 31, 32, 33.

Proposition.—It is not the pleasure of God, that any of his children should be destroyed. Eze. xviii: 23.—But yet, for the pleasure of the Lord all things are and were created. Rev. iv: 11. And it certainly is his pleasure that all should be saved, inasmuch as he sent Christ to be a "ransom for all." 1 Tim. ii: 1-7.

Question.—If, then, it is not the pleasure of the Lord that any of his children should be destroyed—if all things were created for his pleasure—if it is his pleasure that all should be gathered in Christ—will he act contrary to his pleasure, and send millions of his children to endless and inconceivable torture?

Answer.—"I am God, and there is none like me; declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done; saying, my counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Isa. xlvi: 9, 10. "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself: that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth: even in him." Eph. i: 9, 10.

Proposition.—It is a truth that all human beings will rise from the dead, and in Christ put on immortality, that as they have borne the image of the earthy Adam, they may also bear the image of the heavenly Adam, Christ; while their spirits will return to God who gave it." 1 Cor. xv: 22. Eccle. xii: 7.

Question.—If all are to rise from the dead—if they are to be made alive in Christ—if they are to put on the image of the heavenly Saviour—if their spirits are to return to God who gave them—will any souls rise in the likeness of satan, put on the image of blasphemous fiends, be made alive in agony, and go down to the blackness of despair forever?

Answer.—"So also is the resurrection of the dead.—It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption: It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power: It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body." 1 Cor. xv: 42-44. "Jesus answered and said unto them, ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven."—Matt. xxii: 29, 30.

THE WANDERER MADE HAPPY.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

Across a bleak and thorny wild,
A weary pilgrim sadly strayed;
No friends his devious wanderings cheered,
They slept beneath the cypress shade.

The cheerless shades of Autumn night,
Hung like a pall o'er earth and sky,
No star beam trembled on the wave,
But gleamed the lightning flash on high.

Loud moan'd the tempest o'er the plain,
The leaf went whirling on the gale,
And spirit-voices, wild and shrill,
Blent sadly with the thunder-wail.

By the wan tempest-flame reveal'd,
Dark boding phantoms hover'd near,
The foaming torrents wildly raged,
The pilgrim's heart grew chill with fear.

Suddenly through the rifted clouds,
More bright than Brazil's costliest gem,
Smiling upon the tempest's brow,
Appeared the star of Bethlehem.

Beyond the darkly rolling wave,
Fair sunny vistas ope to view,
And amaranthine bowers appear,
Where pleasures bloom forever new.

There crystal founts of endless joy,
Flash in the rays of changeless love;
And perfumes breathe from fadeless flowers,
Fann'd by the wing of Zion's Dove.

No more he madly strives to shroud
Hope's beaming star in rayless gloom,
But glories in the light that dawns
O'er the dark confines of the tomb.

FRIENDSHIP.

"How pure is friendship! how divine!"
How bright "its emanations" shine,
To cheer life's toilsome day;
A beauteous flower of radiant bloom,
Whose fragrance sheds a sweet perfume
Of odors on our way.

Without its aid, this life would seem
A dungeon dark, without a gleam
To cheer the human soul;
Anger, and strife, and mortal wo,
From man's dark passions dire would flow,
Did not its power control.

When grief or worldly cares oppress,
'Tis friendship's part to soothe, to bless,
And cheer the drooping heart;
To shed the sympathetic tear,
For every child of wo and fear,
And soothe affliction's smart.

'Tis view'd with pleasure from above,
Where angels round a throne of love,
In love and friendship dwell;
Its pure, celestial, sacred fire,
Shall warm the heart, shall tune the lyre,
Where songs of rapture swell. COLA.

CHARITY REWARDED.

A FACT.

B. was a native of Alsace; and, on a journey he made to K———, he married. He inhabited a small house without the gates of the town; and his employment barely subsisted him, though he constantly worked for rich and respectable people in the city. He was a painter and a gilder. Every evening he was accustomed to bring home with him, for his family, the produce of his work. It happened, however, once, that he did not receive money. Although God has expressly commanded, "that the sun shall not go down before the laborer receives his hire," yet the degenerate Christian pays but little attention to the commands of his Maker. Very many, and clergymen amongst the number, are not even acquainted with all his written commands, more especially those in the Old Testament, notwithstanding Jesus Christ has absolutely declared in Matt. v: 18, that all shall be strictly observed, and not a jot or tittle thereof shall fail. Now could the poor gilder no longer be paid by his employers. For sometime, however, he was enabled to carry home bread with him as usual, to his hungry family; but at length every source was exhausted. Throughout the day, during his work, he put up an inward prayer to God, that he would graciously dispose the hearts of his masters in his favor, so that they might not allow him to go home pennyless; but the day passed, the term of labor finished, and the poor husband and father had nothing, nothing at all to take home with him! Melancholy and sad he entered the suburbs where he lived, with a heavy heart and downcast eyes. Some one going toward the city met him, saluted him as he passed, and slipping a piece of silver into his hand, glided by him. He stood stock still, astonished; and shouting aloud, with eyes uplifted, tears ran down his cheeks; and he bitterly reproached himself for his vile unbelief in that God who feeds the ravens, and numbers the very hairs of our heads.

Passing onwards, his way lay through a path between two hedges, where he heard a faint voice in a mournful, complaining strain; and, as he looked around him to know from whence it proceeded, he saw a young man, who had the appearance of a traveller, lying on the grass, pale, weak, and emaciated. "What is the matter my friend?" asked the poor painter. "Sir, I am a travelling mechanic, and am going towards home. I have yet far to go. As my money run short, I was obliged to act with the utmost frugality, and expended daily only what my most urgent necessities demanded; notwithstanding, my money is all gone. The whole of this day have I pursued my journey without tasting food; and my strength is so entirely exhausted, that I can go no further." What was poor B. to do? He had nothing but the small piece of silver; should he give him that? But what would remain for his hungry expecting children? Perplexed, confounded, almost mechanically, without knowing what he said, he demanded of the young man if he had no small money about him, even of the most trifling value, to give in exchange for his little piece of silver "O, my dear Sir, would I had; I should lie no longer here!" The heart of poor B. felt a terrible conflict. At last, shrugging his shoulders with great sorrow and heaviness of mind, he pursued his way, but went not far; his piece of money burnt like fire in his pocket; he hastily turned back, gave it to the poor traveller, and with great agitation turned away quickly, weeping, sobbing, and almost reeling like a drunken man. He had not proceeded far before he met a man with several loaves of bread, which he carried under his arms, coming directly towards him. As they approached each other, the man saluted him in a friendly manner; and passing him slipped one of the loaves under his arm, and putting a dollar into his hand, hastened away. The poor painter threw himself on the grass and wept aloud.

Who can read without the deepest emotion this wonderful relation of the gracious providence of God towards the necessities of his children! The worthy painter acted with pure humanity, and the hand of God so visibly interposed, that while we are compelled to bestow our warmest approbation on his conduct, we are led to offer our humble adoration at the throne of grace. Such tales as these are like apples of gold in dishes of silver—and though at all times, and in our days especially—a word in due season. If the pure Christian is led to further perseverance in his confidence in God, who hears and answers prayer, and the weak believer taught to blush for his unbelief, this memorable instance of God's paternal care will not have been recorded in vain!—Swiss Magazine.

TENDERNESS.—Boerne, a celebrated German author, who died a few months ago in Paris, once being in a society where the merits of a gradual reform were spoken of, related, when he was asked his opinion on the subject, the following story: "Somebody lately presented me with a young dog, which I gave to my servant, ordering him to cut off its tail, and to nurse it well. At the end of a fortnight my next door neigibor, came and conjured me, for God's sake, to turn out my dog, which was continually whining and howling. I went for the first time to see after my dog. 'Is the poor creature sick?' asked I of my servant, 'or do you not well treat it?' 'The thing is very poorly,' answered he, 'though I take great care of it; and thinking the little thing too weak to bear the operation which you commanded me, of chopping off the whole tail at once, I have even had the precaution of only chopping off a little bit of its tail from time to time as he could bear it.'"

TAKING IT COOLLY.—"Sir, you are a fool!"—"Do you call me a fool, Sir?"—"Yes, Sir!"—"You do, Sir?"—"Yes, Sir, I would call any man a fool who behaves as you do."—"Oh! you would call any man a fool. Then I can not consider it personal. I wish you a good morning, Sir."

WALKING.—Walking is the best possible exercise.—Habituate yourself to walk very far. The Europeans value themselves on having subdued the horse to the use of man, but I doubt whether we have not lost more than we have gained by the use of that animal. No animal has occasioned so much degeneracy of the human body. An Indian goes on foot nearly as far in the day, for a long journey, as an enfeebled white does on his horse, and he will tire the best horses. A little walk of half an hour in the morning, when you first rise, is advisable. It shakes off sleep, and produces other good effects in the animal economy.

SARDONIC SMILE.—The term sardonic smile, in so general use, must have obtained a signification quite different from its original meaning. This smile, produced by a poisonous plant, was, as Pliny informs us, an involuntary motion of the muscles of the face, the effects of which was retained on the countenance of him who died of the poison, long after death, giving it the appearance of a smile.—Literary Gazette.

Turning a Shin-plaster into Silver.—The Baltimore Transcript relates the following anecdote of a fellow who peddles a polishing composition about the city:

"Look here ladies and gentlemen," said the composition pedlar, rubbing a brass watchcase. "This is the greatest thing ever discovered, it will turn every thing into silver."

"Is that a fact, Sir?" asked a countryman.

"Yes, Sir—look at this watch-case, it was brass just now, but it's changed to silver."

"Well, I swow!" exclaimed the countryman, handing him a modern shin-plaster: "I wish you'd rub a little of that 'ere stuff on this bill, and turn it to silver."

INDEPENDENCE.—A beggar, while drinking some cider at a farmer's house, down east—which, by the way, was hard enough to make a pig squeal—was asked if he would accept of a little bread and cheese. "No, I thank you," said the codger, "its as much as I can do to drink your cider, letting alone your victuals."—Dedham Patriot.

Her death was somewhat sudden, and unexpected to her friends, but not so to her.—She had a presentiment of approaching dissolution when in usual health, and often spoke of it to her husband, with the utmost composure. She was one of the excellent of the earth. When questioned closely, a few hours before her death, by one of her friends of a limited faith, she manifested the utmost confidence in God as the Saviour of the world. Her decease is severely felt by all who knew her. R. C.

RELIGION, vs. BIGOTRY.

A TALE.

Near the foot of the Allegany Mountain, in Huntington county, Pa., and a short distance north of the road leading from Frankstown, through Burgoon's Gap to Loretto, in Cambria county, on a rising knoll or plat of ground, some fifteen or twenty rods from Gap river, stood, not many years ago, an ancient stone mansion, not so striking for its symmetry, and proportion, and beauty of construction, as for the long, deep and heavy stones, composing the edifice. It was reared in times of Indian warfare, by the grandfather of the occupant at the time our tale commences. It had but one door for ingress and egress—made of thick oaken planks—covered over on the outside with sheet iron, securely fastened on; and thus guarded, originally, were the window shutters. This stone mansion was, in cases of emergency, resorted to by the people of the neighborhood, as a kind of asylum, when the red men appeared upon their borders. On every side of the mansion were left, in its walls, interstices, or port holes, of about a foot square, through which the deadly rifle might be aimed. These port holes, in times of safety, were filled up by a block of wood, fitted exactly for the purpose, shoved in end wise to keep out the cold.

Burgoon's Gap (so called) cuts the Allegany Mountain, in this place, nearly in two. In the deep chasm thus made, tumbling over one ledge, and passing on to another, rushes Gap river—forming cascades in its way, and sending up mist, at times, as dense as the smoke from a furnace. On the margin of this ravine, and in some places cut through the solid rock, runs the road from Frankstown to Loretto.

In the stone mansion (at the time I am speaking of) dwelt Dummer Lilleybridge. His paternal grand father was from the "Emerald Isle;" but his own blood had become mixed by marriages, with a little English, or native Pennsylvanian, and a streak, or vein or two, of Dutch.—Dummer had but one child, a daughter, whose surpassing beauty was the theme and admiration of the whole neighborhood. I shall not attempt to describe the beauty of Rosalia Lilleybridge—it would be beyond my power of language to do it justice. Suffice it say, that she was called, by the villagers, the Rose of the mountain, and the Lilley of the valley.

Mr. Lilleybridge had but an ordinary education—being bred a farmer, he aspired to nothing which the world calls great. Yet nature had blessed him with a strong mind—which he exercised with much reflection, and to the advantage of nature's philosophy. He was charitable, liberal and friendly to all who stood in need of his kind offices. On the subject of religious creeds, he thought as all rational men should think.—Although bred up in the Calvinistic system of religion, he could not understand, or feel its efficacy; and often, when young, used to question his father on many points of its doctrine. "I can not," he would say to his father, "discover the goodness in a supreme Being, who would create intelligent creatures on purpose to render their immortal parts forever miserable." His father had it not in his power to explain the enigma, nor the patience to endure such questioning; but would fly in a passion, at what he called in his son, carnal reasoning; which, he said, opposed Scripture doctrine, and was an evidence that the doubting, on such sacred subjects had been doomed, from all eternity, to ceaseless and never ending torments!

Time rolled on. The old man was gathered into the garner of the dead. Dummer was left to think, and to act, for himself; and his liberal principles increased with his age. Within this time he had married, and at the birth of Rosalia had become a widower. Thus left, he took into his house a maternal aunt, some years younger than his mother would have been, had she lived to this time—but she had died some time before his father, with that fatal disease, the consumption. This aunt superintended his household affairs, and took charge of his little Rosalia, whom he loved with increased affection from the loss of her mother.

In the neighborhood of Dummer Lilleybridge, lived Robert Glenn, a Scotchman by birth, who had settled in this country some years before our tale commences. He was an old school Presbyterian, of the first water; and the greatest bigot, perhaps, in existence. He marred greatly the peace of the neighborhood, by his continual complaints against his neighbors, who appeared to think less of the forms in religion, than of the reality—while Glenn stuck to the shadow, and lost sight of the substance. But nature has strange freaks—or education makes it appear so. Robert Glenn had an only son, Albert; whose sprightly conduct and manly character were the praise of the whole neighborhood. Albert and Rosalia had been educated in the same neighborhood school, from their earliest days of going to school, to the age of about fifteen years with Rosalia, and sixteen with Albert. Here they formed an intimacy and friendship which time strengthened, and death, alone, could sever.

About this time, the father of Albert, returning home from a short visit he had made to his neighbor Lilleybridge, entered his house in a foaming rage, and calling Albert before him, said—"Albert, my son, I am now convinced that Dummer Lilleybridge is an infidel. Never being able to ascertain his belief in religious matters, I called at his house to-day, to question him on that subject; and what do you think were the questions he proposed to me?—and what think you was the turn he gave to my answers? Hear them, and never tell me again that Lilleybridge is a Christian! First. He asked me, What was the design of God in creation—was it a good, or bad design—or partly good, and partly bad? Second. Will the design of God in creation, be fully effected—or has the Deity created or permitted the existence of a power by which his design in creation can be defeated? Third. Did the design of God in creation embrace the eventual happiness of all his rational creatures? I was not aware of any difficulty in answering these questions; and to the first I replied—that the design of God in creation must have been wholly good. To the second—that God has neither created, nor permitted, the existence of a power capable of defeating his designs. And to the third—that it was not the design of God in creation, to embrace, eventually, the happiness of all his rational creatures—for he had created some on purpose to be eternally miserable!"

"How, then," said Lilleybridge, "could the design of God have been good—to create sentient and intelligent beings on purpose to plunge them into the most excruciating misery, and in this situation to keep them, as long as God, himself, exists?"

"Now, my son, was not this carnal reasoning? It was outrageous—and I could bear with him no longer. And now, young man, I forbid your going any more to the house of Lilleybridge.—I have seen, of late, too great an intimacy between you and Rosalia, which might, in time, grow to something of more consequence. This intimacy must be broken off entirely. I will have no heretics connected with my family. Therefore, if you do not wish to be disinherited, an out-cast and a curse to your father; break off all connection with that accursed family!"

A clap of thunder, an earthquake, or the bursting forth of a volcano from the Allegany Mountain, would not have forced Albert into greater astonishment and dismay. It was some time before he could open his mouth to utter a word; and when he did begin to speak, his voice trembled, at first, so as hardly to be distinct. "Father," said he, "how know you that Rosalia Lilleybridge is an infidel? Does she not go to the same church that you do? Is she not benevolent and charitable to the poor—kind and affable to all her acquaintance? Nor is she more famed for beauty, than she is for goodness and virtue."

"How know I that she is not an infidel?" said Glenn—"as the old cock crows, the young ones learn. Go to the same church that I go to!—scoffers do the same—charitable say you?—And who is she charitable to?—ALL that stand in need. She makes no distinction between the true believers, and those who have no religion at all! Call you this charity? I say it is no evidence of true religion—it is contrary to the dealings of God, who made some on purpose to endure eternal misery, while others he elected, from eternity, to the enjoyment of heaven, and never ending happiness:—and should we not copy, or follow, that course of conduct, and the examples to us from on high?—and manifest our kindness and charity to true believers, and not to the world's people, and the irreligious?"

"But, father," said Albert, "How know you the elect from the non-elect? Is there any particular or distinct mark put upon those favorites of God?—who, it seems, be they ever so bad in this life, are sure to go to heaven, in the end; but how they are to be made holy and happy, I can not understand. Father, this doctrine of election, you are so often speaking about, seems to me to be a mystery of partiality—more in conformity with the character of satan, than with that of our heavenly Father. The Scripture saith, 'God is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works.' Is this true—and yet this good and merciful God, has been so cruel and unmerciful, as to create intelligent creatures on purpose to plunge them into a lake of fire and brimstone?"

The father could hold in no longer—and with the countenance of a demon, he stamped, and cried out—"Reprobate!—away! never let me see your face again—BEGONE, I say—leave me forever!" The mother of Albert was meek and affectionate. The tyranny of her husband had broken down her natural energy. She fainted—while her husband was leading her son to the door, and casting him out into the wide world.

Albert had enough of his father's resolution, but not a particle of his bigotry. He had been too much with Lilleybridge to believe that the God his father worshipped, was the true God of heaven and earth. And although at first astounded and awe-struck, he was unable to resist, if not unwilling; but the violent shove his father gave him at the door, landed him over the steps, upon his hands and knees. This was like an electric shock to Albert. He recovered not only his feet, but his spirit, in an instant. "Father," he cried —"you shall be obeyed—you shall see me henceforth no more, till your blessing is freely offered." And turning, with a quick and hasty step, he marched off in the direction to Lilleybridge's.

The father of Rosalia was cut; but the flushed face and flashing eyes of Albert, frightened the young damsel, and deprived her of speech, for the moment. She motioned Albert to take a chair, and seated herself upon a settee. A moment, however, brought her father into the house—who seeing his daughter as pale as death, and Albert as red as a burning furnace, cried out—"Ha! master Albert, what's the matter now? Have you been trying to jump over the Allegany Mountain, or across the ravine of Gap Run, that you look so wild and strange? And what means your ghastliness, my daughter? Has Albert broke an arm?—his neck, at least, appears to be sound, and somewhat stiff? Explain—explain what this flushed countenance on the one side, and ghastliness, on the other, portends?"

These rattling interrogations from Lilleybridge, loosened the tongue of Albert, and he proceeded to give to his friend a detailed account of the scene he had passed through at his father's. The tears were streaming down the fair face of Rosalia, all the while. Ending his story, he observed —"And here I am, an out cast from my father's house, and my home—forsaken and destitute!"

At the recital of Albert's story, Lilleybridge was so astonished and confounded, that it was not in his power, for a moment, to utter a word. At length he exclaimed—"Oh, bigotry!—Can it be possible that the most endearing cords that entwine round the hearts of the human family, can be severed by thy ruthless hand? Art thou the standard of paternal sympathy, and the connecting link that unites parental affection with love to his offspring? Nay—were it so, in reality, thou wouldst drive every reflecting man into Atheism! Thanks be to God, thou art not the golden cord that binds man to man; but an iron hook—jagged with barbs—inflicting torment upon all who are so inconsiderate as to swallow thy bait!—But, my boy, what art thou to do now—what course wilt thou take in this sad and sorrowful situation?—An out cast thou art; but forsaken thou shalt not be."

"I would go to Scotland," said Albert, "if I had the means to defray expenses. I have an uncle in Glasgow, who has twice written to my father to send me over to him. He is in the mercantile business, and reported to be in good circumstances."

"Thou shalt not lack the means, my young friend," said Lilleybridge—"I will supply them. I know the stubborn nature of your father—set in the false glitter of bigotry, nothing can be expected from him. When wilt thou set off?" "To-morrow—or even now, if it please you," said Albert. "Would that I could see my mother before I go, but that can not be—my father's unrelenting disposition would, should I attempt to see her, render her situation more deplorable than it now is."

Rosalia had not as yet uttered a word since Albert entered the house—sorrow sat upon her countenance, and tears were yet in her eyes.—She had always thought of Albert more as a brother, than in any other light. She knew not that a more tender passion had been taking root in her heart. Indeed, she was too young to understand and define her own feelings. The intercourse between Albert and Rosalia had been, as should have been, that of a brother and sister.—Albert, however, was becoming sensible to a more tender passion, and it wrung his heart to the core to think of parting with Rosalia. But, the die was cast—there was no other alternative, and he must leave her.

Albert having found means to obtain his clothes from his father's house, the next day after being turned off he set out for Philadelphia, to seek a passage to Europe—not, however, before he found an opportunity to say to Rosalia—"I will return, sweet maiden. Forget not the happy days of our childhood—forget not the happy hours we have spent together in rambling up the glen of Gap Run; and O, forget not Albert Glenn."

Albert was fortunate in obtaining a passage to Europe. We shall leave him now on the broad Atlantic, and return to his father's house.

On shutting the door upon his son, Robert Gleen, on turning round, discovered his wife on the floor in a swoon. He raised her from the floor, and placed her upon a bed, calling at the same time for help to restore her. It was sometime, however, before Mrs. Glenn recovered strength of mind to know what had been the matter. Her first movement was to look around for her son—she then faintly inquired—"Where is Albert?"

"He is a reprobate," said Glenn, "and I have cast him off as one unworthy to remain in his father's house!" It was with great difficulty Mrs. Glenn could be kept from swooning again. The pitcher at the fountain of life (if not broken) had been overturned—the silver cords of mutual affection were scathed by the consuming fires of bigotry. And the wretched mother lingered in heart broken despair for about three months, and then was gathered to "that bourne whence no traveller returns."

But how fared it with Robert Glenn? He affianced himself to seven devils, worse than the former, if that could be possible. He raved—he ranted, and dealt out damnation (in words) to all in the neighborhood that would not submit to his bigoted notions of religion. The prince of darkness himself might have felt ashamed of such a coadjutor. In short, in less than three months from the death of his wife, old Glenn became a raving maniac, and had to be confined to a room in his house! And here we shall leave him for some time to come.

We must now "slip over" about six years from the time Albert left the vale of Gap Run to go to Scotland.

In the year 18—,

> 'Twas in that blooming month of May, when Spring
> The sweet embryo of the blossoms swell;
> And roseate flowers thence began to bloom—

that a tall, handsome young gentleman, was seen riding up to the gate of Dummer Lilleybridge, and to alight from a noble looking steed, which he secured by a fastening to the gate post. The avenue to the house was on its south side—the door being in the centre of that side, with a window in the centre space each side of it; and between each window and the door, and between each window and the corners of the house, were growing bunches of lilac shrubs, which Rosalia at this time was pruning. Albert (for it was him) walked up the lawn before the door, strugging hard to keep the palpitation of his fluttering heart in subjection. Coming up to Rosalia, and bowing gracefully, he addressed her—"Fair lady, you seem to be sweetly employed—may a stranger so far trespass upon your time as to beg the favor of a drink of water?" Rosalia looked up, blushed, and curtseying timidly, replied—"Certainly, Sir. Walk with me into the house;" and leading the way, they entered the mansion without farther ceremony. Rosalia, desiring the stranger to be seated, hastened to procure the water, which was soon obtained, and with a trembling hand presented to the stranger. Rosalia could not account for her agitation. And by this time, too, Albert had become extremely nervous; and between them both, more water was spilled upon the floor, than was drunk. Returning the glass, Albert observed—"Yon mountain to the S. W. (pointing with his hand in the line of the window, with the Allegany Mountain) reminds me, fair lady, of the Grampian hills, and high Ben Lomond, in Scotland." Rosalia started. There was something in the tone and voice of the stranger, that brought to her recollection by-gone years. And looking full at the speaker, and with an agitated voice, she inquired—"Wast thou ever in Scotland, Sir?" "It is but little over a month, fair lady, since I left the 'father land' of the famed Fingal and Ossian." Rosalia gazed upon the stranger with intense scrutiny—she trembled from head to foot, and faintly articulated "Albert!"—She would have fallen, but Albert, springing forward, caught her in his arms—"My sweet Rosalia, dost thou remember Albert?"—"O, Albert, thou hast returned: but—but—how strangely altered?" "For the worse, dear Ros'a?"—"Nay—nay, I did not say so; but thou art much taller—somewhat embrowned in thy face, and more of manhood in thy looks, than when I last saw you."

It is not the intention of the writer to enter into a full detail of a love scene. Suffice it to say, that time (if not space) was annihilated, from any account that was noticed by the lovers.

The sun was descending behind the blue ridge of the Allegany mountain, when Dummer Lilleybridge returned from Frankstown, (where he had been that day on business,) and entering his house, interrupted the pleasing tete-a tete between Albert and Rosalia. They hastily arose, and Rosalia, rushing forward, cried out—"O, father, here is a gentleman from Scotland." "And he brings news from Albert, or thou art bewitched by the fair face of a stranger," said her father.—"Question him," said Rosalia. Lilleybridge measured Albert with his eyes, from head to feet. Rosalia looking on in ecstacy, and hardly able to contain herself—Albert, blushing and bowing all the while, to his old friend—hoping to be excused for his intrusion, as he had news to communicate from Albert Glenn. Lilleybridge seemed to be lost in thought—rubbed his eyes, and gazed in wonder and astonishment. But the illumined countenance, and smiling face of his daughter—together, perhaps, with some family marks on the face of Albert, opened the eyes of Lilleybridge. "Thou art Albert Glenn, himself," said he; and grasping his hand with the grip of a vice, shook it so violently that his wrist and shoulder were not in little danger of being dislocated. "I am happy to see you, Albert, very, very happy indeed. Ha! boy, didst thou think to catch an old bird with chaff?" As well might you have scaled Bald Eagle Cliff, and robbed the eyrie of the eagle of its young, as to deceive me. How long hast thou been here?" Albert, turning his head to a clock that stood in a corner of the room, in some confusion replied—"I must confess, Sir, I have been here longer than I was aware of; I came here about two o'clock, and it is now nearly six." "What! and thy noble steed has been eating post meat all the while?" said Lilleybridge. You ought to go without your supper this night, master Albert. Rosalia, how shall we punish this 'Highland laddie,' for leaving his steed so long a sentinel at the gate!" "Father, perhaps I have been the most to blame," said Rosalia—"I wanted to hear what Albert could say about bonnie Scotland, and time flew on the wings of—of—romance." "Ah, I see how it is," said her father, "Albert must have his supper, at all events; but first our horses must be seen to;" and calling a man from the garden, he ordered them to be taken care of.

"Now, Albert let us hear how you fared in Scotland," said Lilleybridge. "Well, Sir, I had a prosperous voyage across the Atlantic—arrived at my uncle's house in less than thirty days from the time I left Philadelphia—found my uncle in tolerable health, although somewhat depressed in spirit. About six months before my arrival, he had lost his wife; and having no children, he had about concluded to 'wind up' his business concerns, and retire from the busy scenes of active life. When he heard my story, he clapped me on my shoulder and said—'Well, my boy, we will go on together. I will at least initiate thee into business before I retire from active life. I will take the helm, and you shall trim the sails; and if you do your duty honestly and faithfully, there will be no fear of failure. As to thy father, he has not only 'sown the wind,' but he has mounted 'the whirl wind'; and there is no truer saying than this—'that he whom the devil drives, is sure to go too fast.'

"My uncle received me into his house, or firm, as a partner, allowing me to represent half his stock; and we went on harmoniously together, until about six months ago, when he was taken sick and died, leaving me his sole heir.

"And now, my kind friend, here I am again; and if you will be so good as to give me Rosalia, here will I remain, and spend the remainder of my days in my native village." "Well, well," said Lilleybridge, "we will see to this in due time. I suppose, however, the matter is already settled between you and Rosalia—while your steed was feeding on the gate post, eh?" Rosalia blushed, and Albert hung down his head. "But," said the kind old man, "hast thou inquired for thy father, my boy?" Albert and Rosalia looked at each other in some confusion; and Albert, turning to Lilleybridge, said—"I came to your house, my dear Sir, to make this inquiry, and was not aware that time had been passing so rapidly. Excuse me, if you please, and be so good as to inform me of the situation of my father." "Your father, Sir, is alive, and dead, too—dead to all enjoyment among the living. In about three months after I wrote to you of the death of your mother, your father's religious frenzy proved too powerful for his mind—he became deranged—raving mad, and had to be confined. In this situation he has been ever since. I took charge of his farm—got a tenant to work it on shares; and the product has nearly paid the expense of a man and woman who has taken charge of your father.

"Dear Sir," said Albert—"I owe you many thanks for the cares you have taken of my father; besides, I am not only able, but perfectly willing, to remunerate any expense you have been at, in this troublesome concern." "Ah, no doubt," said Lilleybridge, "by taking Rosalia off my hands, and taking charge of her in return, ha!—I am not certain, young man, that I shall agree to balance the account in this way. Rosalia, although somewhat of a giddy girl, is not half so crazy as your father has been. But we will think of this matter more at our leisure; we must now to our supper, and then on a visit to your father. Lately, in his most lucid turns, he has frequently called on the name of his wife and his son.—Should we find him in this mood, your presence may wholly restore him to reason."

Supper was soon over, one or two of the party, at least, had not much appetite for the repast—and Lilleybridge and Albert set off for the visit. It was agreed that Albert should not enter the house of his father, till his friend had prepared the invalid for the interview. Glenn was found in a convalescent state, so far as it respected delerium; but very weak, and nearly exhausted in bodily strength. He looked at Lilleybridge more complacently than he had ever done before, since he first became deranged; and feebly reaching out his hand, he said—"Neighbor Lilleybridge, I find that I am fast sinking down to the grave.—My body has now become too much exhausted, and too weak, to control the spirit within. I do not know how it is, but I see things different from what I ever did before—I am fully convinced that I have wronged you—will you forgive me?"—"Most assuredly I will—indeed I do, with all my heart," said Lilleybridge. "I have understood your situation from the beginning. Although 'we all sprang from the same stock, partake of the same nature, and share the same hope,' yet we do not do so in the same degree. The passions in some are much stronger than in others; or, suffer me to say, the influence of our earthly character—the carnal mind, which I consider to be the old serpent—the devil that deceived our grandmother Eve—is the great cause of the variety of conduct we discover in mankind. And this influence is much stronger in the nature of some than it is in others. And this difference, too, is aided not a little by education—linked with the prejudice and practice of those whom, in our youth, we are naturally bound to look up to for instruction. But because our fathers, in order to balance grain in a bag across the back of a horse, put the grain into one end of the bag, and a stone into the other end, would it be wise in us to follow the example without investigating the propriety of such a practice? So in all matters, and especially in religion, the most important to our peace and happiness; we have the right to examine for ourselves into the truth of any anterior postulate, or dogma, handed down to us, even under the sanction of John Calvin, or John Knox. You say that you see things different from what you ever did before. This is an evidence that the mortal coil is losing its power, and that the immortal part in the connection is gaining strength and the ascendency. Be calm—let not a retrospection of what has happened, disturb you again, and you will die in peace."

"But oh!" said Glenn, "my son, my Albert! How I have wronged my boy! My wife, too—I am not certain but my rashness destroyed her—how can I be calm—how can I be at peace, with this heavy load of guilt upon my conscience?" "You thought, Sir, that you were doing God service in all that you did. You was mistaken, but you acted from ignorance. You are now sensible of the wrong you did, and surely God will be as ready to pardon you as I have been. Albert you will see again. I have heard from him to-day—he will be here in less than a month."

"It will be too late—before another month comes round, I shall be numbered with the dead. O that I could see and bless my son, before my eyes are closed forever." "You shall see him, then; even to-night, if you choose." Glenn started—"He has come, then; let me see him—let me see him!" Lilleybridge went out to Albert, and in as few words as possible, gave him to understand the situation of his father. They entered the house together. Albert rushing to the room where his father was confined, kneeling by the side of the bed upon which he was lying, said, "Your blessing, my father—your blessing!" It was some time before the old man could speak. The sudden appearance of Albert had such an affect upon him, that it was with much difficulty that the breath of life could be kept in his body. When he did recover so as to speak, he poured out a most fervent blessing upon his son. "Albert, I have dealt harshly with thee—I have acted the part of a tyrant, in turning you out of my house, and your natural home. I now see the impropriety of such a course, and am astonished at my conduct. I have wronged thee greatly, my son." "Say not so, my father. It has has proved to my advantage. Besides, the happiness of your blessing this moment, is greater than the misery I endured, when you cast me off. I know that we should not do wrong, expecting that good may come from it; yet we are all liable to err. Although an out cast, I was not left destitute. I found a friend—yes, two friends—your neighbor here, and your brother, in Scotland; with whom I lived till his death." "Is my brother dead! Well, God's will be done. Albert, I have endured the pains of hell for a long—a very long time. I cast you off, because I thought you predestined to never-ending misery. I did as I supposed God had done, in principle. My object was to copy after his conduct! But surely I must have mistaken his character. I know not why it is, but I now see things in a different light from what I ever did before. It may be as neighbor Lilleybridge says; that the mortal part, from weakness, ceases to operate, to influence, and take the lead. Be this as it may, I feel that my mind is changed; and I feel much happier, too, by this change. I have heard, formerly, much said about bigotry and superstition; but I always supposed them cant phrases, coined by infidels to ridicule religion; but I begin to suspect that the terms denote a reality, and that I have been a bigot myself." By this time the sick man was exhausted, and ceased speaking.

Albert continued with his father, and nursed him with the greatest care and attention; occasionally assisted by his friend Lilleybridge; whose conversation not only soothed, but enlightened the mind of the invalid. He lingered for about three weeks, and then breathed his last.

My tale is now near its end. The moral of which, it is believed, will be easily discovered. We might leave to the anticipation of the reader, the finale of the story, as well as the moral; but the writer can not forbear to mention, that in due time, Albert and Rosalia were made as happy as mortals could be made, in the changing vicissitudes of a world, in which nothing is certain but death.

JESUS "HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL."—NO.V.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

Let us now for a moment contemplate the precepts of the divine Teacher. These were uttered with an authority and impressiveness which at once declare the divinty and the benignity of his mission. In them, as before observed, there is no exclusiveness. They are but few, yet co-extensive with humanity. They are calculated for man in every condition and relation of human life. They are not merely the precepts of Jesus, God's beloved Son—they are principles of eternal truth, of undeniable justice, and everlasting righteousness. "They are like heaven speaking above, or conscience speaking within us. His voice but gave articulate sound to the dictates of experience, of reason, of history, of nature, of God. His consciousness of this imparted to his manner, a superhuman dignity." To love God supremely as our Father and unchanging Friend; to obey him whose commandments are not grievous; to worship him with the living sacrifice of a pure and honest heart, "in spirit and in truth;" to exercise love and good will to man as our brother and fellow-heir to immortality; to do as we would be done by; and to forgive as we hope to be forgiven—these are injunctions which carry along with them the demonstrations of their own truth and reasonbleness, and the power of their own enforcement. In his teaching they never fall with a lifeless sound upon the ear. They sink into the heart, and call forth the purest and holiest emotions of the soul, and render the whole man a "new creature" in Christ Jesus. In the benignity and utility of his precepts the divine teacher is exalted high on an eminence above every other reformer the world ever knew. They lay the axe at the very root of the tree of evil, by going directly to the dispositions of the heart. They seek to root out and expel, all vicious habits, propensities and inclinations, and implant in their stead, the living and enduring principles of virtue, religion, and pure devotion, which shall be in the soul a well of living water "springing up into everlasting life. Surely, then, by precept, Jesus "hath done all things well."

CONFERENCE APPOINTMENTS.

Will our friends notice, that the first Conference of the Otsego Association, will be held on the fourth Thursday and Friday, instead of Wednesday and Thursday, as noticed in our 26th number. This alteration is in consequence of the general parade which occurs at the same place on Wednesday.

The notice from Br. Eaton, of the Conference of the Chautauque Association, and concerning the very magnanimous (?) course of the Methodists and Presbyterians of Sheridan, in refusing to open their meeting-houses, was mislaid, and not discovered by me until this week. The insertion is now useless. I am sorry, but can not help it. A. R. B.

LOVE TO GOD AND MAN....NO. III.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

Having shown the reasonableness and propriety of the first and great commandment, and pointed out a few of the many ways in which this love should be manifested, we shall now attempt a consideration of the latter command—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

If we take up the interrogation of old, and ask, who is our neighbor? an answer is ready. By our "neighbor" we are to understand, men of all nations, and of all ranks and conditions in life.—The ignorant and squalid Esquimaux, as well as the learned and urbane citizen of our own beloved country; the savage and degraded Hottentot, as well as those of civilized and enlightened lands; the heathen, bowing down to his weak and powerless divinities, as well as the Christian worshipping the great Creator in the beauty of holiness; the lonely and despairing prisoner, as well as he who roams abroad in the glorious sunlight of freedom! No matter whether they be friends or foes, Pagan or Christian, learned or unlearned, civilized or uncivilized, bond or free—the people of every nation, kindred and tongue under the broad heavens, are our neighbors. All this being plain, we shall proceed to show the reasonableness of the command—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," and the necessity of cherishing this heavenly principle toward the world of mankind.

The millions of human beings who people this earth, have all one common origin. They were all constituted of the same physical principles, and are endowed with like members, functions, capacities, and powers, both of body and mind. The king on his throne, and the wandering mendicant, originated from one and the same source, and are possessed of like constitutions, like physical conformations, and like mental and moral faculties. It is true their conditions are unlike. The one is exalted, and the other debased. But, perhaps, even the poor, unfortunate being, who is subsisting on the charities of his fellow-men, arrayed in the robes of kingly majesty, and made the prince and ruler of vast dominions, would equally grace a monarch's throne, and gain the same admiration, and the same applause.

It is a fact which can not be disputed, that, different and diversified as the circumstances and conditions of men may be, their origin is one and the same—that they are constituted alike both in body and in mind, and are amenable to the same laws, as physical, organic, and moral beings.—This shows conclusively that there is an equality existing among mankind; and hence it is perfectly reasonable that love should be cherished one toward another.

This equality will further appear, if we take into consideration the fact, that a species of moral depravity infects the whole human race. It can not be denied "that a moral disease has spread itself through all the branches of the human family, in whatever station, or in whatever region of the globe they may be placed." Look where we will, this depravity presents itself in some form or other. In heathen lands it manifests itself in those cruel and bloody rites attendant upon their idol worship, and in their nearly entire departure from those enactments of divine Wisdom, which intimately relate to their intellectual and moral well being. In Christian communities it is displayed in bickerings and animosities; in strife and dissensions; and in those discords and contentions, which have so hindered the march of Gospel principles, and impeded the progress of the cause of Christ. There is no rank, however elevated, that is free from corruption. It infests the higher, as well as the lower walks of life; and is as often displayed in the palace of kings, as in the hut of the peasant—in the splendid mansions of the great, as in the humble dwellings of the poor. Hence, "there is no rank or order of men that have any valid reasons for despising their fellow-creatures, or withholding from them the exercise of love and affection." No one has the least ground for hatred or ill-will, "for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God!"—We, then, should concentrate all our efforts in the endeavor to sway the tide of corruption that is sweeping over the world, and to bring the wanderers in the far off country, back to their Father's house.

Trials and misfortunes are to be encountered by all. The high and the low, the rich and the poor, are exposed to the same wants, to the same vexations, and the same afflictions. The king, as well as the meanest of his vassals, is made subject to vanity. The great are not exempt from sorrow and suffering; and many times theirs is affliction, which those in the humbler walks of life know not of, and the monarch surrounded with all the emblems of royalty, and all the pomp and magnificence of state, is as dependent as the humblest peasant in his dominions.

But not only are wants, and sorrows, and afflictions common to all, and pain and suffering incident to every condition—all are likewise made subject to mortality, and must come to the same "earthly termination of their being." And in the grave there is no distinction. The lord there lies as low as the meanest of his vassals—the prince as the beggar! The head of the king is pillowed as lowly in the dust, as that of the most unworthy subject of his dominions! and the body of the master is as much the prey of corruption and the worm, as the corse of his slave! "Their eyes are equally impenetrable to the light of day—their ears are equally deaf to the charms of music—and their tongues are equally silent in this land of deep forgetfulness!"

Now, when we take all these facts into consideration—that all originated from the same source—that all possess like bodily and mental powers—that all are infected to a greater or less degree with the corruption that is in the world—that all are exposed to the same wants and afflictions, and that all must go down into the grave, where neither rank nor distinction are known—I say when we take all these facts into consideration, the conclusion is unavoidable, that there is a natural equality existing among mankind, and that God "has made of one blood all the nations that dwell on the earth." This being the case, it must be evident to every discerning mind, that it would be very unreasonable for them to entertain angry or hostile feelings toward one another; or for those who enjoy rank and distinction, to look down, with proud disdain, upon those who tread the humbler walks of life.

It is because this natural equality exists between our neighbor and ourselves, that we are to love him—love him even if he be an enemy, and the veriest knave in Christendom. If he pursues a career of sin and ungodliness, so much the more need of our loving him. Manifestations of anger, and proud and disdainful feelings, will never convert him from the error of his ways, but will rather tend to render more hard and obdurate, his heart, and to urge him on in rebellion against the government of God!

Man by nature is a being worthy of our love. As I have before said—I am no believer in the total depravity of the human heart, or in that sentiment which teaches that man by nature is incapable of a good thought or deed. I hold to the contrary of this. I believe that man by nature is amiable, and worthy of being loved. He is a creature formed in the image of God, and the powers and faculties of mind of which he is in possession, ally him to a superior order of beings, and capaciate him for knowing, loving, serving, and obeying God. It is true we behold him yielding to temptation—forsaking the pleasant paths of wisdom, and the peaceful ways of righteousness, and sinning with a high hand and with an outstretched arm; but it is very obvious that all this is contrary to nature—that it is something purely "accidental and transitory," and something which will entirely be done away, by a full development, and an active exercise of the higher powers of the mind. It has been well remarked, that, if man is made after the Divine image, he must be good—i. e., in his nature he must bear some resemblance to that Being who is declared to be "Love." Hence he can not be totally devoid of religious feeling, nor entirely divested of goodness. There must be something in his nature that is amiable, and worthy of being loved—something that will ultimately be removed, far from the contaminating influence of the fleshly propensities, and placed in a situation where it shall be continually going on from perfection to perfection, and from glory to glory!

It is true, as I have before remarked, that man has sinned—has debased himself; but it is not true, that by nature he is totally depraved. If there were found in the natural heart of man "no kindly affections and moral sentiments, he would be no longer responsible for his sins; and every instance of persuasion against the impulse of bad passions, and of conversion from evil unto good, would be nothing less than a moral miracle."* Let men talk as much as they will about total innate depravity—'tis a mere bugbear. Man by nature is amiable, and worthy of being loved, and this is one reason why we are called upon to love him as ourselves. Professed followers of Christ may look with disdain upon those they denominate the "world's people," and whom they believe to be incapable of a good thought or deed; but how many of these persons would, if we knew their histories, "meet our admiration by the ability, worth, benevolence, or piety, which they have displayed in their various pathways through life. How many would excite our warmest interest by their sufferings—sufferings too, perhaps, borne meekly and with true Christian spirit, and more for the sake of others than themselves!"—Suppose they have not made an open profession of any faith—suppose they are not friendly to the interests of this sect, or that denomination, still, they are beings formed like ourselves in the image of God. And let them be inferior to us in every other respect, yet the great common features of human nature remain; and let us never forget how much love and respect is due to the very impress of humanity—the type of the divine nature itself."

THE APOCALYPSE.

BY REV. L. KNAPP.

REV. XX: 11–15.—For an explanatory introduction, see Romans xi: 19, 20. "Thou wilt say then, the branches were broken off that I might be graffed in. Well, because of unbelief, they were broken off, and thou standest by faith—be not high-minded, but fear. For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he spare not thee. Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off."

From this we may expect, that if Rome has not remained in God's goodness, she will experience the severity of God's judgments, as did Jerusalem. And that she has not so remained, and that her sins are nearly, if not quite, equal to the sins of Jerusalem, there is abundant testimony to prove. And, therefore, as Jerusalem was destroyed for her sins, so shall Rome be overthrown for her abominations.

"And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it." This figurative language is suggested by the tribunals of justice among men, and represents God's coming in judgment against Rome, the same as he came in judgment against Jerusalem. With this difference, only, that Jerusalem may be again inhabited, but Rome will never be; for, like Babylon, there shall no more be in her, the voice of the bride or of the bridegroom.

"From whose face the earth and the heaven fled away, and there was found no place for them." Let it be observed, that the prophet is particular to limit or define his meaning of the words, heaven and the earth. This can not be the literal heaven and the earth we inhabit, for what follows in after prophecies forbids it; but the heaven and the earth of the Roman Empire. It ought to be observed, that the prophecies from the 13th to the close of the 20th chapter in Revelations, pertain to the empire of the beast, and contain his rise, reign, character, power, worship, prosperity, adversity, chastisement, and fall; and that the same language respecting heaven and earth, metaphorically used, occur throughout.—This heaven and this earth must pass away, as did that of Babylon, Egypt, Jerusalem, and Pagan Rome; and it is worthy of remark that no place can be found for them. This shows that when Rome shall fall her authorities will not be acknowledged by any nation of the earth, but all shall be free from her yoke; and death to her laws and ecclesiastical institutions is inevitable. As to the metaphorical use (in Scripture) of the words "heaven" and "earth," I must request the reader to consult Isa. xiii: 10–13; Ezekiel xxxii: 7, 8; Matt. xxiv: 29; Heb. xii: 26, 27; Rev. vi: 12–14. As the prophecies to which the above texts allude, have had their fulfilment, and the heavens and the earth yet remain, it will be seen that they were not to be understood literally. And so when the Gentile dispensation has passed away, and a new dispensation arrives, while the heavens and the earth yet remain; it will be evident to all, that the text now before us, must be understood metaphorically.

"And I saw the dead small and great stand before God." For a dead man to stand, to us is unintelligible in the letter of the subject. But that those who have natural life, and are morally dead, may stand before God, is not to be disputed, as all things are open and naked before him with whom we have to do; although to us he is invisible. Agreeably to this, I find the revelator to use this language, Rev. iii: 1, last clause—"I know thy works, that thou hast a name, that thou livest, and art dead." Rev. xi: 18.—"And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to thy saints, and to them that fear thy name small and great; and shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth."

"And the books were opened, and another book was opened which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things written in the books according to their works." "The book of life." This language as used by the revelator, appears to have been borrowed from the ancient city customs of keeping a book in which the names of the living were registered, and the dead blotted out. The faithful in Christ Jesus have their names written here, and as in the destruction of Jerusalem, so now in the overthrow of Rome, the living members of Christ's body escape unhurt. "Come out of her my people, and be not partakers of her sins, that ye receive not of her plagues." "And the books were opened." These books contain the law for the judgment of the fearful, the unbelieving the abominable and murderers, and whore mongers, and sorcerers, and idolators, and all liars. And the judgment according to the law of the books, is that those guilty of the above crimes, shall be cast into a lake of fire. I am persuaded that in the code of laws given to the house of Israel, no one can be found to touch the case now before us; and that in the Epistles to the seven churches in Asia, in the book sealed with seven seals, and in the prophecies delivered by John after he ate the little book, alone is to be found the above law to govern the case. And here it is found, and the above characters are described and their punishment recorded.

"And the sea gave up the dead which were in it." The sea can be no other than the one out of which the beast arose, (mentionod Rev. xiii: 1,) with seven heads and ten horns, and received his seat, power, and great authority from the dragon, that old serpent called the devil. The sea out of which this beast arose, covered with leopard spots, metaphorically represents the sea of Rome, which before God's tribunal must deliver up its dead, to be tried by a more righteous court.

THE CONVERTED UNIVERSALIST.

Vergennes, Vt., July 17, 1839.

Br. Grosh.—Having lately taken up my abode in this place, and made an engagement to preach at Moriah one-fourth of the time, I thought it rather become my duty to answer the inquiry of Br. Whittemore, in the Trumpet of June 15, under the head of Universalist Ministers Converted. I could not at the time of the inquiry attend to it, but yesterday, as I was about to write Br. W., the Trumpet was put into my hand that contained an answer from Br. K. Haven, of Shoreham, Vt. As I have a few words to say in addition to what Br. H. has said, I will direct to you instead of Br. W. of the Trumpet, as your paper is circulated most in the vicinity of Moriah. The Universalist minister said to be converted at Moriah, (as you will see from the pen of Br. H.,) was one William L. Ball, who in 1835, was excommunicated from the Congregational church, Cornwall, Vt. The said Ball did, some time after, succeed for a short time, in deceiving, by his hypocritical pretensions, a portion of the Universalist public. He was fed and clothed by the people of Ticonderoga for a short time; but on learning his character, he was ordered to lay off some of his outer garments (that he had been supplied with,) and he could have so long a time to leave the place. As he had never been fellowshipped formally, no further proceedings could be had against him. That ended his ministry as a Universalist.

After gadding about for a time, getting in debt, and deceiving the people wherever he went, he called at Moriah, where it is said he was converted, and confessed all his former belief and conduct. Query—Wonder if he confessed that he lied, when he said he took the notes of Burchard's sermons, and after copying them and selling one to Mr. B., gave the other to Br. Streeter to publish? Think not; for if he had, I think that Rev. Asa Putney, would not have said in his letter, "this person followed Br. Burchard about some length of time, when he preached in Vermont, and took notes of his sermons for another Universalist. At least it proves that either Mr. P. or Mr. Ball is now a hypocrite; and I think it is the latter; therefore warn the public against this imposition. It is a fact that the followers of Burchard are themselves sick of him. He applied, both at the Baptist and Methodist churches for admittance, and they would not receive him: and to use a figurative expression, the people there say, that he can not be misrepresented unless it is by saying something in his favor!

As to the good Burchard has done, others may judge; I am told that the churches are and have been for some time in a quarrel about their concerns. The Universalists are united, and not one was converted under Burchard; for all his converts who ever called themselves so, acknowleged they never believed the doctrine—thus acknowledging themselves to have been hypocrites. When I went there I found the Universalists, (and much to their credit, too,) sustaining a Sabbath school. May they be strengthened in every good word and work, be instant in season, and out of season, and blessed in the deed. Affectionately your brother,

W. Parker.

"And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment."—Heb. ix: 27.

CONCLUDED.

III. We come now to a direct explanation of the subject. Let it be remembered that Paul was a Jew, well skilled in all that pertained to the laws and worship of the Mosaic Covenant and Institution. Let it also be remembered, that this epistle was written to his brethren, the Hebrew or Jewish converts, who once had been worshippers according to the ceremonies of the Jewish ritual, and were well acquainted with it. One great object in sending this epistle to them, was, to save them from the Judaising teachers who still taught the necessity of adhering to the system of Moses, by showing them that the old priesthood, ceremonies and covenant were abolished, and that they had a better priest, better covenant and better ceremonies. In order to effect this object, he institutes comparisons in many places, from the 1st to the 10th chapter, between the Jewish high priest, the covenant, and its ceremonies, and Christ, the new covenant, and its principles and ceremonies.

In the 1st verse of the 5th chapter, Paul says—"For every high priest taken from among men, is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins." In the tabernacle erected by Moses in the wilderness, and afterwards in the temple raised by Solomon, there was an inner place called the "holy of holies," where was placed the ark and the mercy seat. In the xvith of Leviticus we are informed, that the high priest was to enter the holy of holies alone, (for no other man could enter without death,) with the blood of a sacrificed beast, to make an atonement for the sins of the people. Hence, it is said in the last verse of that chapter—"And this shall be an everlasting statute unto you, to make an atonement for the children of Israel, for all their sins, once a year."—The sacrifice by the high priest was made but once a year.

Before the high priest entered the holy place, he was clothed with a dress expressly prepared for the purpose. In the 28th chapter of Exodus where this dress is particularly described, we find that the priest wore an oynx stone upon each shoulder, each of which was engraved with the names of six tribes of Israel. In addition to this, he wore a breast-plate, which was called the breast-plate of judgment for the children of Israel On his forehead was put a plate of pure gold, on which was engraved, "Holiness to the Lord." Once a year, the high priest was thus clothed, and after he had made a sacrifice for himself, he slew a beast for the people, and with the blood of it, he entered the holy place—what for?—"For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to clean you, that you may be clean from all your sins before the Lord." Lev. xvi: 30. After staying in the holy place the proper season, the high priest came out to the people, having borne the sins of the people by a sacrifice of blood, and then they saw upon his forehead, "holiness to the Lord." But in bearing back the "breast-plate of judgment," there was no curse; for even under the Mosaic system, the priests never curse the people, as some of them do in these days—but they blessed. Hence it is said, by the Deity, to Aaron and his sons—"On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, the Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up his countenance on thee and give thee peace." Num. vi: 23–26. All this pertained to the old covenant.

One object of Paul was, to show that a new covenant had been established in room of the old. Hence he says—"Behold the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant which I made with their fathers, in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and regarded them not. For this is the covenant I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their minds, and write them in their hearts; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people; and they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord; for all shall know me from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness; and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Chap. viii: 8–12. This covenant, so beautifully promised and spoken of, is the Gospel, which was made for both Jews and Gentiles.

Another object of Paul, was, to show that this new covenant had an high priest, who sacrificed for the sins of the people, as under the old covenant. The high priest was Christ, for he says—"Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the apostle and high priest of our profession, Jesus Christ, who was faithful to him that appointed him, as Moses was faithful in all his house." iii: 1, 2. In a number of other places in the epistle, he calls Christ the high priest of the new covenant, who made a sacrifice for the sins of man, by his own blood, and hath entered the holy place of Heaven to intercede for us, being that person of whom John speaks—"If any man sin, we have an advocate with the father. 1 John ii: 2. "Hence, "he is the Mediator between God and men." 1 Tim. ii: 6.

In the whole epistle, Paul endeavors to show the superiority of the new covenant and its high priest over the old covenant and its high priest—superior, because the old covenant and its forms were but shadows of the new—superior, because the origin of Christ's priesthood was higher than the Aaronic priesthood, inasmuch as Christ sprang from Melchisedec, to whom even Abraham paid tythes—superior, because the new covenant was founded on better promises, and had better principles—superior, because the sacrifice for sin was offered but once, that being sufficient to effect the object forever. Now in all this, we discover a perfect comparison between the two systems. And if we approach the 9th chapter, we shall see this comparison more broadly carried out—and we shall see who the men are, what the death is, get a clue to the judgment, and view in them true figures of the sacrifice of Jesus.

After speaking of the ordinances of the old covenant, from the first to the fifth verses, he says—"Now, when these things were thus ordained, the priest went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God: but into the second (holy of holies) went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood (of a bullock or goat) which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people." Verses 6, 7. In verses 8, 9 and 10, Paul shows the insufficiency of these ordinances to purify the conscience, and that they were imposed on the people "until the time of reformation," or the manifestation of truth under Christ. He then remarks—"But Christ being come a high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." Verses 11, 12. Observe the comparison here. The high priest entered the holy place once every year, and there died typically, by the blood of goats, for the sins of the people—but Christ, by a real death, sacrificed his own blood, once, for once only was necessary, and then entered the holy place of heaven, where "he ever liveth to make intercession for us." vii: 25.

This comparison is closely kept up in the 24, 25 and 26th verses.—"For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us: nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with the blood of others; for then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world; but now once, in the end of the world, hath he appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself" Here the comparison is perfect—Christ was not offered every year, as was the high priest; but once, and once only, in the ending of the Jewish dispensation, he was sacrificed on the cross to finish sin, for the angel declared that he should save his people from their sins.

Next comes the text, which is so intimately connected with all that the apostle has previously said, that I do not see how it can be supposed that he suddenly left the subject we have been considering, to speak of endless misery, (an event which has no possible relation with it,) and then at the beginning of the 10th chapter came back again to the comparison of Christ with the Jewish high priest. Besides, is it not inconsistent to suppose that he meant all men, by the term "men," when, in other cases, if he speaks of the whole human family, he does not use the word "men," alone, but "all men?"

We will now give more particular attention to the text itself. "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin unto salvation."

1. Who are the men here spoken of? From the remarks which have been made, it must be evident that the men were the high priests, who from time to time were elected to the priesthood. The point of comparison between them and Christ, is, as they were the head of the old Covenant, so Christ was head and high priest of the new Covenant. This comparison the apostle keeps up in many parts of the epistle.

2. What was the death?—From the 15th to the 20th verses of this chapter, the apostle shows that a testament is not of force, until after the death of the testator—hence, the Old Testament was not in force, except by the shedding of the blood of sacrifice. And the New Testament had force given to it, by the shedding of the blood of Christ. He then says—"For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us; nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others."—In this language, we must perceive that Christ was offered, as the high priest was offered. How was Christ offered? He was offered by a sacrificial death for the sins of his people. So the high priest offered a sacrificial death for sin—once a year he slew a bullock, and by its blood he entered the holy place, and there made a typical sacrifice of death for the sins of the people. This he did once every year—but it was not necessary for Christ to sacrifice as often as did the high priest—but he gave up himself once for all. The point of comparison is perfect.—As it was appointed unto the high priest to die once, and only once in each year, a typical death by blood and entering into the holy place of the earthly sanctuary; so Christ died in the ending of the Jewish Law, a sacrifice, not by the blood of goats, but by his own blood, and then he entered the holy place, not of the temple, but of heaven, where he intercedes for us, as the high priest in the holy place interceded before God for the sins of the people.

3. What was the judgment?—We must remember that the term judgment simply means a decision—that the nature of the decision is determined by the subject itself—and hence, that the simple term can not mean endless misery, because judgments were sometimes decisions of blessing as well as of punishment. We must also remember, that this judgment was manifested after the typical death of the high priests.—Remembering these facts, let us read Exodus xxviii: 29, 30. "And Aaron shall bear the names of the children of Israel in the breast-plate of judgment upon his heart, when he goeth in unto the place, for a memorial before the Lord continually. And thou shalt put in the breast-plate of judgment, the Urim and the Thummim; and they shall be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the Lord; and Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually." When the high priest died a typical death by sacrifice, and went into the holy place, he bore the judgment of the children of Israel. What was that judgment?—When he returned from the holy place to the people, they saw upon his forehead a plate of gold, on which was written, "holiness to the Lord"—that is, through the typical death of the high priests, the people stood free in the sight of God, for an atonement had been made for their sins. Did the high priest, when he came from the holy place, tell the people that the judgment was a curse upon them? By no means! Hearken!—"And the Lord spake unto Moses saying, speak unto Aaron and unto his sons, saying, on this wise, ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, the Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. And they shall put my name upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them." Num. vi: 22 to end. The judgment then, was, that by the typical death of the high priest, the people stood holy in the sight of God.

Let it here be remarked, that the fact compared with the judgment, is the appearing of Christ to them that look for him, without sin unto salvation. Now, admit that the judgment means a curse of ceaseless wo, and is there any comparison between that curse and the appearing of Christ to bless them that look for him, with salvation from sin? None at all! There could not be two objects of greater opposition.

"So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many." In the fulness of time, Christ died upon the cross for the world, and tasted death for every man. "And unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin unto salvation." What second coming is here spoken of, and what is the salvation? Remember, that this epistle was addressed to the Hebrews or Jews—remember, that the Gospel was preached to them from the day of Pentecost until the destruction of their nation—remember, that then the door of faith was shut against them, and they were driven into that "everlasting punishment," which, as a nation, they have endured for eighteen centuries—remember, that our Saviour said to the disciples, "he which shall endure to the end, the same shall be saved;" that is, by patiently bearing the perecutions which would come upon them, while defending his cause, they would be saved from the ruin of the Jews—remember, that his second coming was in power, not in person, at the destruction of the Jewish nation, a destruction declared to be a coming of Christ, by all the Gospel writers; for they record that Christ affirmed, that the generation then living should not pass, until he came in the power and glory of his kingdom—remember, all this; and you can not fail of discovering the time of his second coming.

At this period he was to appear to them that looked for him, without sin unto salvation. In the 24th chap. of Matthew our Saviour warned his disciples to watch the signs which he had pointed out as indications of his second coming in power to punish his murderers, promising them, that if they gave good heed to his instructions, they should be rewarded. In imitation of their Master, the apostles spoke frequently of the same subject. To the Romans, Paul said—"And that, knowing the time, it is high time to awake out of sleep; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand." Rom. xiii: 11, 12. To the Philippians he said—"Let your moderation be known unto all men; the Lord is at hand."—iv: 5. To the Thessalonians he said—"That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter, as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand." 2 Epistle ii: 2. Peter said—"But the end of all things is at hand; be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer." 1 Epistle iv: 7. John said—"Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those sayings which are written therein; for the time is at hand." Rev. i: 3.

These affirmations clearly show that the apostle expected that some great event would soon take place, which they called the coming of Christ. That event was the manifestation of his power in putting away the Jewish institutions, and in erecting the glorious temple of Christianity. This is his second coming—and to all who watched for his coming and obeyed their Lord, the judgment was, holiness or salvation. This was so; in the horrible tempest of destruction which fell upon the Jews, not one of the Hebrew Christians were lost—but they were saved from death, while their enjoyment of the truth became more firm from the fact, that they saw the prophecies of Christ completely fulfilled in regard to the overthrow and scattering of the holy people.—Thus, to them he appeared without sin unto salvation, for their exemption from the evils which came upon the murderers of Christ, was to them an earnest that they stood acquitted of sin in the sight of Heaven, on account of obeying their Master.

In all this, it must be discovered how well the comparison is carried out. After the Jewish high priest had slain the sacrifice and entered the holy place, he returned to the people, with "holiness to the Lord" upon his brow, and with a blessing for the people; for having made atonement for their sins, they stood free in the sight of Heaven. So Christ, having shed his own blood, entered the holy place of heaven, and at the destruction of Jerusalem, appeared in power to his disciples, with the intimation, by preserving them from death, that he had made a sacrifice for their sins, and that they stood acquitted in the sight of God.

Such, we are persuaded, is the true meaning of the language of the apostle—and people, if they would read the epistle carefully, like any other letter, without any regard to the division by chapters and verses, would freely discover the drift of the whole matter, and be saved from applying the passage to prove notions, from which it is as foreign as honesty is from robbery. Divest the term "judgment" of the awful notions which have been flung around it by the hand of error, and every possible ground for applying the passage to a future world, is at once wholly removed. Though people start at the word, as though it was significant of untold horrors; yet they must remember that it is a medium of making known to us some of the best bounties of the Deity. Especially, when we are told that the ways of God are judgment, Deut. xxxii: 4, it conveys to the devotional mind, all that is glorious and beautiful.

After these remarks, I will present a paraphrase of the whole subject, commencing at the 24th verse of the 9th chapter, and ending at the 4th verse of the 10th chapter. "For Christ is not entered into the holy place of the earthly temple made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself to appear in the presence of God for us, as he is Mediator between God and men; nor yet that he should be offered or sacrificed repeatedly, as the high priest entered into the holy place of the temple once every year with the blood of sacrifice; for in this case, he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once, finally, in the end of the Mosaic age, he put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. And as it is appointed unto men or the high priests, to die typically in the holy place, and after this, the judgment of acquittal; so, in like manner, Christ was offered on the cross as a sacrifice for the sins of the whole world—while unto them who watch the signs of his coming, will he appear, when his enemies are destroyed, by saving his followers from trouble, and giving them an increased enjoyment of truth. For the law, having a shadow of good things to come, and not the reality of the things themselves, can never, with those sacrifices which are offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect; for then would they have ceased to be offered, because the worshippers, once purged, would have had no conscience of committing more sin. But in those repeated sacrifices, there is remembrance made of sin every year..... But this man, (Christ,) after offering one sacrifice of sins, forever sat down at the right hand of God; from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool. Heb. x; 12, 13. G. W. M.

FOWLER'S PHRENOLOGY—ERRORS CORRECTED.

One of the best Manuals of Phrenology yet published in this country, is that by Messrs. Fowlers, aided by Mr. Kirkham. The great reputation of the brothers Fowlers as practical Phrenologists, has given to their work a very extensive circulation, and rendered the more necessary a speedy refutation of any errors they may have committed on the great subject of morals, especialy as connected with theology. In my humble opinion, they have fallen into such errors, pages 133 to 136, and by stepping out of their direct road, to build upon these errors certain theological errors more pernicious and demoralizing still, (however popular they may be,) they have brought the whole subject within the scope of our labors in the field of religious truth. Indeed, they have even based on their phrenological errors, a direct attack on a popular [mis]representation of Universalism, and thus rendered it the duty of one "set for the defence of the Gospel," to clear up that misrepresentation, and to show the injustice, as well as erroneousness, of their intended attack.

Deem us not over sensitive on this subject. Universalism is assailed and misrepresented on every hand. Its advocates are very generally believers in, and favorers of Phrenology; while its opposers have as generally at the first, denounced, ridiculed, and warred against the new science of mind. Our books and periodicals have, very generally, from the first, at least, treated Phrenology with candor and fairness, and frequently advocated it as true; and I venture to say, that, in proportion to our numbers, there are, and have been more Phrenologists in our, than in any other denomination in the United States. For myself, from its first introduction in this section, I have not hesitated to use it, to declare my conviction of its truth and usefulness, by voice, pen and press—to preach it in my lectures, in my sermons, and in my public, social and fireside conversations. I feel, therefore, as if injustice had been done to both Phrenology and Universalism, by arraying them against each other, when no contradiction can be made to exist between them but by misrepresenting one, or the other, or both—that it is wrong to endeavor to alienate Universalists from this noble science, by representing it as joined with their opposers in opposing, or rather misrepresenting their theological views for the purpose of refuting them. And as a preacher and defender of Universalism, and an advocate of Phrenology, I feel bound to show my own consistency, by defending both systems from what I believe to be a misrepresentation of the one, and a perversion of the other, however honestly and unintentionally made—and I have no doubt whatever, that in this case, they were thus made; for the very remarks themselves, as I will show, manifest the cause of the error in Phrenology.

The first error of Messrs Fowlers is on page 133, paragraph 2, where they represent the sentiment conscientiousness as a mere officer to arraign the conduct and feelings before a tribunal of the other faculties for judgment, and not as a judge of what is right and wrong—and, also, not as an executioner of the sentence pronounced. They say—"The faculty of conscienciouness does not decide as to what is right or wrong, nor create that moral standard or tribunal by which the feelings and the conduct are tried, but merely arraigns them before such a tribunal as may have been settled by the combined influence of the other faculties, of education, of circumstances, etc."

If by this sentence they mean, that the conscience is not the judge of moral right, so far as it has been enlightened to perceive the moral character of feelings and of actions—and so I understand them to mean—but that it merely arraigns the actions and feelings before the other faculties for them to decide on the moral character of actions—and thus I understand their language—then am I certain that they have mistaken or overlooked the operation and province of conscientiousness, by fixing their attention on some metaphysical or theological theory not consistent with the real view. Indeed, on page 134, paragraph 4, after speaking of the great influence, of conscientiousness upon the conduct and character, they themselves seem to me to contradict what they have stated on the previous page.

They say—"The larger this organ, the more guilty will the individual feel. The reason of this is, that large or very large conscientiousness being always awake, arraigns all the actions, and feelings, and motives before this moral tribunal, [conscientiousness?] and brings them to a much more heart-searching trial, and thus creates a much greater sense of guilt and sinfulness than would be done by weaker conscientiousness, even though the conduct, feelings, and motives from which this feeling of guilt is derived, should, in both cases, be alike."

Here, even understanding them not to mean conscientiousness by "this moral tribunal," (to which nevertheless, the words seem most naturally to refer,) the operations of the faculty are described as, in effect, acting as a moral judge (and even executioner) as well as arraigner, in creating a "greater sense of guilt and sinfulness," when large, than when small. And on page 135, end of paragraph 1, they say—"Conscientiousness has been shown to be THE JUDGE of sinfulness, and not its executioner"—thus contradicting what they said on page 134, that it "does not decide what is right or wrong," "but merely arraigns" the actions before another tribunal for judgment.

In the third place, they contradict their statements, that conscientiousness is merely the arraigner, or, at most, "the judge of sinfulness, and not its executioner," by using phraseology like the following—"the punishment inflicted BY CONSCIENTIOUSNESS is lightest upon those who sin most, and most severe upon those who are least deserving of it, (the theological error of these declarations will be shown in another place)—"conscientiousness inflicts the lightest punishment upon those who are the most guilty"—thus making conscientiousness to be, what it really is, the arraigner of motives and actions before the tribunal of the other faculties, as well as before its own moral tribunal; the judge of sinfulness, or of the moral character of actions and feelings, and the executioner of punishment, in strict accordance with its decisions. That it is the judge and the executioner I have declared it to be I will prove in my next article, entitled "CONSCIENTIOUSNESS"—I need not prove that it is the arraigner, for that is admitted

THE ADVENT AND REIGN OF CHRIST.

"Lo! what enraptur'd" notes I hear,
On Bethlehem's shining plain;
They calm the trembling shepherd's fear—
The Saviour comes to reign.

Behold! behold th' angelic choir,
The joyful news proclaim;
Angels and seraphs strike the lyre—
The Saviour comes to reign.

"Good will to men, and peace on earth,"
Thus sounds the enchanting strains,
Nations are bless'd in Jesus' birth,
The Saviour's come to reign.

And "wide his empire" shall extend,
O'er earth, and sea, and main,
'Till ev'ry knee to God shall bend,
And own the Saviour's reign. COLA.

THE LIFE BOAT.

The night was heavy—cloud on cloud
Hung threatening o'er the sea,
And tattered sail and rattling shroud
Proclaimed the tempest s glee—
Fierce glared the lightnings—fiercer still Pealed out the thunder's roar;
And the mariner gazed—while his heart was chill'd—
At the beacon light on shore.

Another lurch, another crash—
E'en hope's last chain must part—
And then despair sat on each brow,
And chilled the bravest heart.
'Twas then, o'en then, uprose the cry,
"A rescue from the grave!
Cheer up, there's hope, there's succor nigh,
The Life Boat's on the wave!"

She comes, she bears a gallant crew—
She nears us—onward! on!
Aye, lovelier beams her beacon light,
Than Summer's earliest sun;
Why sparkles now the haggard eye?
Why leap for joy the brave?
"The storm may beat, our safety's nigh,
The Life Boat's on the wave!"

So when on Life's tumultuous sea,
By storm and tempest riven,
When dangers press, or pleasures flee,
Still turn our eyes to Heaven;
E'en then, when life looks dark and drear,
And darker yet the grave,
Some still small voice is whisp'ring near,
"The Life Boat's on the wave!"

The storm may burst, the tempest blow,
And toss our fragile bark,
And yawning billows wildly show
Their regions cold and dark;
What fear we then? there's one hath power,
The sinking soul to save,
And in life's darkest, latest hour,
"The LIFE BOAT's on the wave!"

TRUE PHILOSOPHY—THE FARMERS.—Two farmers, who were neighbors, had their crops of early peas killed by the frost. One of them came in to condole with the other on their misfortune. "Ah!" cried he, "how unfortunate we have been neighbor! I have done nothing but fret ever since. But, bless me, you seem to have a fine healthy crop coming up just now: what are these?" "These," said the other, "why, these are what I sowed immediately after my loss." "What, coming up already?" cried the fretter. "Yes; while you was fretting I was working." "What! and don't you fret when you have a loss?" "Yes, but I always put it off until I have repaired the mischief." "Lord! why then you've no need to fret at all." "True," replied the industrious gardener, "and that's the very reason; in truth, its very pleasant to have no longer reason to think of misfortunes; and it is astonishing how many might be repaired by a little alacrity and energy."

HONOR.—A modern writer thus defines honor: Standing fire well, and shooting a friend whom you love, in order to gain the praise of a few others whom you despise and hate.

PROSPECTUS

For the Fifth Volume of the UNIVERSALIST UNION.

This publication has now been before the public so long that its general character is well known, and there would be little occasion of issuing a Prospectus on the commencement of a new volume, but for the fact that it has been found necessary, for its future well being, to change its terms and conditions—to bring it to advance pay. The reasons for this course, in detail, are known to most of our readers, and need not be repeated here. If any have forgotten them, and wish their memories refreshed upon the subject, or more recent subscribers desire to see them, they can do so, by turning to the Union of February 23, 1839, No. 16, of the fourth (present) volume.

The evils and perplexities there adverted to; the great annoyance of frequent and urgent appeals to delinquents, and a firm conviction that the usefulness and permanency of the paper demanded a removal of these difficulties, constrained its conductor to the course there determined upon. ☞ An anxious desire was felt to do away the necessity of continual DUNNING in its columns. ☜ And it now remains to be seen whether the real friends of the paper will sustain him in his present efforts to accomplish this object. To them he urgently appeals, not only for the continuance of their own patronage, but for their aid in procuring other subscribers. Its circulation, heretofore, compared with its expense, has been quite too limited, and must now be still more circumscribed, without special efforts on the part of friends to extend it.

For nearly eight years it has gone forth punctually on each returning week, testifying of the impartial love and grace of God. If in all that time it has, in ever so humble a manner, subserved the cause of truth and righteousness—if it has been useful at all in the denomination to which it is attached, let it now, in a day of trial, experience a fostering hand—let every one, without exception, convinced of its utility, and of the importance of sustaining a publication in this location, be active and energetic in its behalf. Let it be done NOW—let there be no delay! and make returns at your earliest possible convenience. It will be important that we know on what we may rely, early in October—by the first of the month, as far as possible. Take the names of present subscribers, as well as new ones. We wish to make out an entire new list ☞ of those who are willing to pay on the receipt of the first number, or when ordering it.

For the information of those into whose hands this Prospectus may fall, who are not already acquainted with the paper, we may briefly state, that it is exclusively a religious and literary work—devoted, in its religious department, to a candid and temperate explanation and defence of the doctrine held by Universalists—the doctrine that "God is the Saviour of all men, SPECIALLY of those that believe"—a salvation from sin, not in sin, and that a world of lapsed intelligences, will, in the dispensation of the fulness of times, become purified, holy, and consequently happy. To this end its columns are occupied with Sermons, Essays, Expositions of important texts of Scripture, etc., with a portion of lighter miscellaneous reading; all, however, of strict moral tendency.

We would merely add, in conclusion, that every effort, as heretofore, will be made to render the paper worthy of the patronage and confidence of the denomination.

CONDITIONS.

The Union is published every Saturday, on a large super-royal sheet; Quarto form at $2—Octavo form at $2.50.

The money must in all cases accompany the order, or be paid on receipt of the first number, unless the name comes through a known subscriber, agent, or Postmaster, and then payable within three months, or the paper will be promptly discontinued. And no paper will be continued after the time expires for which it is paid, without the subscription is renewed. ☞ Let these conditions be particularly observed, and there will be no trouble or difficulty, as they must be invariably adhered to.

To facilitate the formation of companies and lessen the trouble of mailing and keeping the accounts, eleven copies of the Octavo, (small size,) will be furnished for $25—twenty copies for $40, and in that proportion for a larger number, when they are sent to one postoffice, and to one address, and the money accompanies the order, free of expense.

Clergymen remitting $10, free of expense, shall be furnished with five copies of the Octavo, (small size.)

Individuals will please be particular in designating which size, quarto, (large,) or octavo, (small,) they would prefer; but the conductor reserves the right to dispense with either, should the circumstances of the subscription require it, and hold the subscribers responsible for the octavo, (small size,) should the quarto be dispensed with. They will both be continued, if the encouragement warrants it.

Subscription papers need not be returned. Simply copy names and residences, naming the Postoffices, counties and State. Postmasters will generally return them. Address "Universalist Union, 130 Fulton-st., New-York," post paid or free.

DEATHS.

In Rockingham, Iowa Territory, August 7th, of consumption, Mrs. MARIA G. COWLES, wife of Mr. Anson Cowles, and daughter of James and Mary Gage, of Litchfield, Herkimer county, N. Y., aged 28 years. After a painful illness of some months, which she bore with Christian resignation, she died, as she had lived, a firm believer in the final restitution of all things; and when told by the physician that she could survive but a few days, at most, she said it was what she had expected for some time, and wished to say to her friends, "that though we must part here we shall meet in heaven." Such was the faith of the dying, and we trust that its soothing power will be felt by the living. A Saviour wept, and so may they: but his compassion has taught the afflicted what they would not exchange for all the treasures of earth. Though brothers may be severed from a sister, and sisters have been called to breathe the silent—the long farewell; though parents are permitted to look no more upon the cherished form of a loved one on earth, and the gushing tear drop falls not upon the grave of the far, off sleeper, yet they will meet again—meet in joy and gladness, in brightness and glory. A prayer was made at the house, by Rev. Mr. Meed. A. R. B.

In Greene, August 23d, Mrs. CHRISTINA PERRY, aged 77 years. Her funeral was attended on the 24th, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to her relatives and friends, by Br. Goodrich, assisted by Br. Sherburne.

In Upper Lisle, August 28th, ELMINA, daughter of Loranza and Emily K. Gross, aged 1 year, 5 months, and 19 days. Discourse by the writer. A. G. CLARK.

In Canton, July 22d, Mrs. FANNY PAIGE, wife of Mr. Isaac C. Paige, aged 44 years. She endured a protracted illness with almost unexampled patience, and sunk into the arms of death with perfect resignation, firm in the faith and practice of universal salvation. She has left a numerous family to mourn their loss of one of the best of mothers.—Funeral on the 24th, and sermon by F. J. B.

In Elyria, Lorain county, Ohio, August 25th, Mr. JAMES A. SAWYER, formerly of Jefferson county, N. Y. He had been one of J. Burchard's converts, but lately experienced more extended views of Christianity. His funeral was attended at the Methodist meeting house, by the writer, assisted by a Baptist clergyman. D. TENNY.

In Perry, August 18th, JOHN AYRES, formerly of Vermont, and one of the earliest settlers in Genesee county.—Funeral attended in the Baptist meeting house on Tuesday following, by Br. S. Barnes. T. D. C.

CHANGE.

An oration delivered at the annual exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute, August 28, 1839.

BY FITCH MUNGER.

A single glance at the objects around us, is sufficient to convince us, that change is stamped upon all sublunary things. It is impressed upon whatever pertains to this lower world. It is stamped upon matter, animate and inanimate; nor is man exempt from its ravages. A change constantly and incessantly pervades and agitates the universe, by a law of nature dissolving some things and raising others from their ashes to fill the mighty void. Nor does it seem an unwise plan of the Almighty, that the works of former times should pass away, and that man, proud man himself, should leave this transient abode, that a place might be given for his successor. By this arrangement the skill of the succeeding generations is brought into requisition. The historic page bears ample testimony to the certainty of national change. Nations that once gloried in the extent and greatness of their conquests, and that swayed the sceptre over countless millions, have sunk to the depths of moral, as well as national degradation. Yes, where civilization once reigned in all its magnificence, barbarism now glories in the security afforded by the darkness that surrounds her.

Often has it been the theme of our most distinguished writers, to unmask and bring the causes of these changes to view, but they still remain in the dark; and the great object to be accomplished by these changes, under the direction of Omnipotence, still remains undeveloped. Egypt was the mother of arts, and the birth-place of letters—also renowned as the theatre of the many and illustrious deeds recorded in the sacred writings; but, alas, it has changed! and what remains to tell posterity where she once was? Nothing but the lone pyramid, that lifts its proud head to the clouds, and stands as a lasting monument of other times, and of the skill and industry of its inhabitants. Where is Troy, that proudly bore a ten years' siege? Those lofty walls, those towering edifices, the erection of which cost ages of time and labor? Where that Greece, renowned as the birth-place of the greatest orators of the world—who by their eloquence were able to raise up armies for its defence, and means for its support—who, I say, by their deep-toned eloquence could cause the extended valley to shine with the glittering armory of warriors, and the distant mountain to re-echo with the shout of the hero? Where Rome, once hallowed by the proud tread of the Cæsars—Rome, that raised itself to the proudest and most gigantic eminence of power? Where are these, and many others, renowned in classic lore? They have been exposed to the lashing surge of change, and have not been able to withstand its dire effects.

Bear yourself back upon the swift wing of imagination, and view those cities in their oriental magnificence. You would behold the victorious warrior, making his triumphal entry in all the pomp that ingenuity could devise, or that ambition could invent, and the enthusiastic multitude joining in the wake of the ostentatious display, and causing the surrounding walls to re-echo with loud applause. But they were not long permitted to remain so; for change must eventually bear the sway; and this is either effected by men skilled in the black art of war, or they are left to crumble by the withering hand of time. Let us then visit them. We should behold the beautiful arch and lofty edifice—majestic, although in ruins, and showing forth the skill of the architect—already become the den of wild beasts, and the resort of the jackal, which sings the last but mournful requiem over the ruined fabric.

Man, too, proud emblem of God, is compelled to kneel before the shrine of this prevailing energy. One day we behold him sitting upon his imperial throne; the next, an exile on the gloomy Helena. He lived a ruler, but died a slave. To a casual observer, these changes appear awful calamities; but to a mind that can grasp the future in its conceptions, it "ceases to be a riddle—solves itself into a final good." Behold our country in its native state, inhabited by a barbarous and savage people, making little or no improvement from age to age, or fleeing at the approach of civilized man. Already have they become a disconsolate and feeble race, expiring like the last flickering of an exhausted taper.—Here pilgrims, few and feeble, sought those privileges and that peace which they dared not hope for at home. For a long time they were circumscribed upon the one hand, by cruel and unrelenting savages; upon the other, by the cankering fetters of a haughty tyrant. Few they were, but long oppression had chained down the spirit of opposition, which at length broke forth in resolves, daring within themselves, but as noble as ever were inscribed upon the pages of humanity.—Soon the dark and portentious cloud of tyranny, that had for a long time obscured the horizon of liberty, began to recede before the hastening light of freedom. And behold the change, the most eventful in the annals of the world!—one that is pronounced with thrilling accents, and has become the object of a world's admiration, because of the purity of its every feature, and because it was so glorious in its results—one that caused kings to tremble upon their distant thrones, and awoke a world from the long, deep slumberings of insolent domination. From a savage, it has changed to a civilized nation. From ignorance, it has risen to a proud summit of renown in the intellectual world. From slavery, it has been exalted to freedom. Commerce, instead of being confined to one place, finds its way to every port, and explores the vast seas of earth.

> Oh! ne'er, ne'er have tyrants left behind
> A better history to instruct mankind.

But when change must again sweep over this happy domain, let it not be for the disgrace of this far-famed republic; let it not be effected by discord, charged with the forked lightnings of party spirit, led on by the "whirlwind of mad ambition;" thus bringing a blot upon ourselves and nation, that time can never wipe away; but let it be changed to purer brightness, like gold from the purifying fire, that it may shed its benign influence over the whole of this terrestrial ball, lighting up the flame of liberty in the dark corners of earth, and breaking the clanking chains of despotism. Nor let the change stop here; but let it continue until kings shall have become annihilated, tyrants hurled from their blood-bought thrones, and until the great principle of liberty shall be as universally adopted as it is now respected, and the whole world be able, peaceably to repose under the high floating banners of freedom.

The earth, the grass, the flowers, the shrubs and trees—the stars, the moon, the sun and sky, radiate forth the majesty of nature.

THE TEMPORAL AND THE ETERNAL....NO. I.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

"While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."
Rom. iv: 18.

We are here told that the primitive Christians looked not at the things which are seen—i. e., the visible—but at the things which are not seen—i. e., the invisible—and the reason assigned is, that the first are temporal, and the last eternal. To some it may at first appear paradoxical, that they could look at the invisible—see what could not be seen, and not look at what they did see. But if we will take into consideration the peculiar phraseology of the orientals, the difficulty will vanish, and the meaning of the apostle be apparent. To look, is here used figuratively, to signify the direction of our thoughts and affections. Hence the meaning of the apostle is that their thoughts and affections were not placed upon temporal things, but upon eternal.

The example set us by these early teachers of Christianity, doubtless, to us becomes an obligatory precept; and hence our text has all the force of a command, not to look upon what can be seen, but upon what can not be seen. Not that the world in which we live—the visible objects of creation, and the social and domestic duties of life—should never occupy our thoughts, nor engage our attention; but that these should do so, much less than the immutable objects of eternity. The Hebrews to express a preference of one thing above another, frequently do so by affixing an affirmation to the first and a negation to the last. Hence to express emphatically that our love to Christ must be superior to our love to our relatives, we are required to love the former and hate the latter. Hence the import of our text is that our desires and affections should not so much be placed upon temporal as upon eternal things. Our hearts should be set on the enduring and fadeless realities of heaven rather than on the fleeting and transitory things of earth. For all that surrounds us—all that our eyes behold, or that can be recognized by our natural senses, are temporal in their nature, and will cease to be; but there is an inheritance beyond the skies—though eye hath not seen nor ear heard—which forever is fadeless and bright, and never shall cease to be.

Let us compare these states, and trace the distinguishing characteristics of each. Let us contrast the mortal with the immortal, the transitory with the immutable, and the temporal with the eternal.

Time is that portion of duration which is meted out by change. As long as there is alteration will existing intelligencies have time; as long as one thing is succeeded by another which is different, we shall have events to and from which we can trace duration. Change is therefore inseparably connected with time.

Wherever we cast our eyes, we perceive the evanescent and transitory nature of all earthly objects. Ourselves and the world around us, are rapidly passing and will soon be no more. Nothing is stable; nothing is permanent. "All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of the field." The warm zephyrs of spring breathe upon hill and dale; and lo, the plant shoots forth its tender blade, and bright green verdure clothes the naked earth; the groves awake to melody and life, and the flowers with their thousand rich and variegated hues, fill the air with their delightful fragrance. But mark the transition! the chariot of time rolls on,

"And pensive Autumn walks through natures' bowers,
And weeps o'er faded leaves and withered flowers;
Behold the groves, so late with foilage crowned,
Cast off her robes and strew them on the ground;
Recounts the suns and showers, those beauties cost,
Which now must fade beneath one blighting frost."

Oh, how altered, how changed! Spring's vernal blush has passed away, and all its exuberant sweetness, and gilded embroidery are laid low in desolation and ruin.

We go forth in the morning of life, full of vigor and expectation; but soon the torrid rays of mid day's sun, exhausts our strength, and impairs our health, and the evening of life closes in upon our views, and spreads the darkness over us. To-day witnesses us engaged in the scenes of active life, contending for wealth, honor and fame; to-morrow hears the dust rumble upon our coffin; and the day to which we looked forward with fond anticipations, sees above our quiet rest, the sepulchral yew trembling in the wind. Oh, how painfully do we perceive that "the fashion of this world passeth away!" Oh! how quickly will time run its circling race, and bring round the tax gatherer of humanity to collect us to our kindred dust!

Such is all that occupies our attention or engages our pursuit! such is all human greatness and glory—

"Even as the mists
Of the gay morn before the rising sun,
That pass away and perish."

The mighty works of art to-day, become but the record of history to-morrow. The spacious domes and splendid edifices, which once held our fathers—which once were crowded with all that labor, and science and taste could produce, are now no more. "The ivy clings to the mouldering tower—the briar hangs out from the shattered windows—and the wall flower springs from the disjointed stones." But change and succession end not here. The solid earth quakes and heaves, and cities and countries are swallowed up in its gap: vast caverns are made to yawn, and islands to emerge from the bed of the ocean. Hills are precipitated into the plain, and others are thrown up by the subteranean fires of the volcano; and the rivers are continually changing their currents, and the ocean its bed.

Thus change and decay every where surround us, and there is nothing here below to which our affections may fondly cleave, but what may in a few hours, and must in a few years, at least, be separated from us. But for our consolation will be the thoughts that sickness and sorrow, sin and suffering, had a beginning, and must necessarily have an end in the wreck of matter and the dissolution of all things temporal. These belong to time and must necessarily pass away.

"All things that do to time pertain,
Shall pass away in time again;
All that begins in time, my friend,
In time shall surely find an end."

Unholiness can never enter the eternal state. It belongs only to a temporal and changable mode of being:

"Our spirits soar from whence they came,
But not in sin, and guilt, and shame;
Nothing unclean, can ever bear
Admittance, or an entrance there."

We think it can be abundantly shown, that God will never give perpetuity of being to any thing that is opposed to his perfections. Sin and sorrow will cease with time; these are among the "things which are seen," and which shall perish in the "wreck of matter, and the crash of worlds." If then, the things which are seen are temporal—if they have existed for so short a time, and in so short a time will be no more—if "all flesh is as grass and all the glory of man as the flower of the field"—"if all who live and breathe around us, are the creatures of yesterday and destined to see destruction to-morrow"—

"Then, O! let us look, let our prospect allure,
To scenes that can fade not, to realms that endure.
To glories, to blessings, that triumph sublime,
O'er the blightings of change, and the ruins of time."

Eternity is duration without change—which has had no beginning, and can have no end. "It can not be multiplied, it can not be added unto; you may strive to subtract from it, but it is useless. Take millions and millions of years from it—take all the time that enters the compass of your imagination—it is still whole and undiminished as before." It has no parts and can not be computed. Put together as many limited periods as you please, be they ten thousand times ten thousand ages—involve their sum as many times into itself;—still the product will not be an eternity, or any part thereof. Our minds can grasp any defined length of time, however great; but eternity is beyond its boundaries, and incomprehensible to mortals. It has no bounds, no limits, no divisions; but is unfathomable, immeasurable, and undescribable; it is the rolling sphere of unnumbered ages; the life time of Jehovah!

Eternity is an immutable, immortal, holy, and happy state of being. Whatever is endless in duration must necessarily be immutable—incapable of variation, diminution or increase. The Supreme Being is eternal, and therefore immutable. immutable and therefore eternal. "From everlasting to everlasting he is God;" he changes not, but is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever"—"without variableness or the shadow of turning." What a glorious thought for the consolation of his creatures, that their great Creator will ever remain their friend, father, and benevolent benefactor—that change and decay, can never reach his throne—that neither the mutations of time, nor the sins of man can ever move him—that though all else is changing, he changes not—that though sin towers as the mountains, and expands as the sea, it can not exhaust the mercy of God, nor quench the flame of his infinite love. His perfections will eternally endure, and are equally true, and equally sure, to endless ages.

EXTRACT FROM A DISCOURSE

DELIVERED IN THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH, HOMER, N. Y., AT THE FUNERAL OF MRS. D. PARKER, AUGUST 10, 1839.—TEXT, LUKE XX: 35, 36.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

How true is the declaration of an inspired writer, that "As for man his days are as grass; as a flower of the field so he flourisheth; for the wind passeth over it and it is gone, and the place thereof shall know it no more." Man is here compared to the tender flower of the field, which springs up in evening's silence and solitude, and which, ere it has bloomed an hour, may be prostrated in death on the fond bosom that gave it birth. If it escape the blight and rain by which it was endangered in the morning of its being, still, ere the sun has shone upon it an hour, it may be felled to the dust by the hand of the spoiler, and its beauty and fragrance be swept entirely away. If still it should exist, Autumn's chill and frosty breath, may cause it to droop and fade in an hour, and bow its strength and comeliness to the earth. If still it should survive, stern Winter with his frosts and snows, will suddenly sweep it away, and the place where it grew, shall know it no more!

Thus it is with man. He is brought into existence to spend a few short years, and in the morning of life he may seek the solemn silence of the grave, and his infant form becomes food for the cold earth-worm, and mingles back to dust from whence it came. If he should survive to reach manhood's riper years, in an hour he knows not, he may slumber in death. If his existence be still prolonged, the winter of life is approaching, when time shall prostrate him into the mouldering urn! * * * * * *

Death is continually busy in our world; and his ravages extend from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the end of the earth. The banner of the warrior is furled, "his head is pillowed on its ample folds, his shield and buckler are laid aside and his sword is resting in its scabbard." The student, whose time and energies were devoted to the pursuit of knowledge, has ceased to pore over the classic page; the volume of science is closed, and he is sleeping his "dreamless sleep!" The sailor boy slumbers in ocean's caves. Many a weary day has he spent on the billowy deep, but no more shall he brave the rushing storm, or the tempest's power. "He has made the coral rock his sepulchre, and the towering wave is his monument."

The arrows of death, in every country and clime, are flying thick and fast; and the young, the beautiful, the mature, the aged, are falling around us on every hand, like the "sere and yellow leaves of Autumn." Death enters the family circle, where peace shed the brightness of its presence, and happiness had reared a temple—the shaft is leveled, and a loved one falls. The pulsations of the heart cease; and unearthly paleness creeps over the features; the once active limbs cease to move; the voice of music is hushed, and the sparkling eye closed in a dreamless slumber! And then how many bosoms are made to heave with anguish; how many sighs to be breathed forth, and how many bitter tears to fall! An aching void is felt within, a sickness comes over the heart, and we sit us down and weep, that a world so fair, should yet be a world of vanity! That loved ones should die, and the heart's dearest treasures perish from the sight!

But, after looking on a picture so dark, is there no bright prospect to which we may turn, and on which we may fondly gaze? There is. A quenchless ray of glory has been given to light up the darkest of earth's scenes, and chase away its clouds and gloom! A Saviour has brought life and immortality to light. He became a tenant of the rocky sepulchre, and a pale dweller of the silent grave! But, when his time was come, he burst off the bands of death, and came forth from the tomb in triumph, a victorious conqueror, the resurrection and the life, and the first fruits of a glorious harvest to come! The blessed assurance has been given us, that a period shall ultimately arrive, when earth's sleepers shall awake, and come forth to a state of immortality and incorruption, shall arise in honor, power, and glory, and all unite in lifting the same sacred hymn unto God! For, "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

* * * * * * *

Our text gives us the assurance, that in the resurrection state mankind are to be equal unto the angels, and the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. And these words of our Saviour teach us, that holiness and consequent happiness await the vast intelligent universe beyond the tomb; for they are to be equal unto the white robed Spirits that surround the throne of God. They are sinless—they are pure and holy, and consequently are perfectly happy. And it follows that mankind, when they are raised from the dead, shall be made equally pure, equally happy; and unite in the same thanksgivings, and the same rejoicings! If (as we are assured by a world's Redeemer) mankind are to be made equal unto the angels of God; then their destiny is to be a glorious one, and their final home, the blissful habitations of Heaven. And why should we doubt that this will indeed be! Surely all this is not too much for the might of a Father's arm to accomplish, nor more than we might reasonably expect from him, whose name and nature is infinite Love! And why should we not believe that God will ever be the affectionate Father of the universe; that the smiles of his benignity shall ever surround the erring sons and daughters of humanity; that he shall watch over them in the perilous voyage of human life, and at last take them to a better world than this!

* * * * * * * *

There is something in these truths to rejoice the soul of man—something to bear up the weeping pilgrim in this "vale of tears," and to heal the wounded hearts of sorrow's children. They cause the believers to enter into rest, and lift him far above the clouds and storms of this moral existence. Sorrow may roll her floods in upon his heart, and the sun of his prosperity may be veiled in darkness, but he feels that he is not left solitary and forsaken. He is not yet bereft of consolation; "amidst all this desolation without, there is a peace which passeth all understanding within, there is a holy confidence in God, a hope sure and steadfast, which is an anchor to the soul, amidst all the storms of trouble that beat upon it."

In the final endless holiness and happiness of every child of God, our departed sister in the faith, was a firm believer. She believed that there is a home eternal in the heavens, for the weary pilgrims of this world, that a Saviour shall go on with the work of salvation until it is finished—until he has effected a complete and a universal triumph! And by this belief she was sustained throughout a long and painful illness, and during many days and nights of the most extreme suffering. And in her last moments it filled her soul with peace, and enabled her to triumph over the power of the universal destroyer! The memory of our departed sister is blessed. She was all that makes woman an angel in this world of sin and tears. As a wife, a mother, a friend, and a Christian, she was known to the most of you, and of the excellences of her character, you can all bear witness. The faith of which she was in possession, had its legitimate effect upon her heart and conduct. And it enabled her to bear up patiently under all her trials and sufferings, and to be perfectly resigned to the will of her heavenly Father. But she has gone! She left us, her family and friends, for the bliss and the joys of the upper world. She has left this world where all is vanity, for the mansions of the blessed, where no tears can come, nor sin, nor sorrow.—She has gone home to heaven! She has entered in upon an inheritance that is incorruptible and undefiled, and into a state of perfection and happiness, which shall reach through the interminable ages of that eternity which is to come!

And may this assurance, and the assurance of meeting her in a better world than this, to part no more forever, comfort the sorrowing husband, and weeping children. May the faith that sustained her in all her sufferings, and in her last moments, sustain you, my friends, and impart unto your souls all needed consolation. If this faith be cherished in your hearts, you will never be bereft of hope, and confidence, and holy assurance, but your minds will ever be filled with pious resignation, and with a peace which mocks the power and the influence of the storms and tempests of this mortal existence! You will ever have a rock of strength to which you can flee, and where to pillow the aching head! A divine light will be shed down from heaven upon your pathway, and in times of sorrow a still small voice will be heard bidding you be of good cheer, and speaking peace to the tumultuous heavings of the soul! And may a belief of the truths which have been presented on this occasion, comfort all who have been called to mourn the departure of our sister and friend. May it be cherished in their hearts, and suffered to exert there, its soothing and salutary influence; and they shall be put in possession of that peace and repose which nothing can disturb, and which will enable them to go off the stage of being with a song of gladness on their lips.

And may we all, my friends, ever cherish the belief that there is life and immortal felicity for the vast intelligent creation of God in the world to come; that a Saviour shall yet finish the great work of universal salvation, and ransom every human being from death and sin! This is the only belief that can yield us consolation in times of sorrow, the only belief that can enable us to triumph in the dying hour!

JESUS "HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL."—NO. VI.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

Let us next turn our attention to the miracles of our Saviour. These were uniformly wrought for some beneficent and benevolent purpose.—Search the record of the four Gospels, and you can find but a single exception, if even the withering of the "barren fig tree" be an exception. By the exercise of miraculous power the benevolent Jesus would raise the sleeping dead, to cheer and comfort the disconsolate and sorrow-stricken widow, or restore a beloved and affectionate son to heal the wounded bosom of maternal love, or return to their fond embraces, a kind and generous brother, to dry the tears, hush the sighs, and assuage the grief of the weeping Martha and Mary.

He would open the eyes of the blind, to gaze upon the resplendant glories of the great Creator, and to read in nature's ample volume, the abundant testimonies of his wisdom, boundless love, and unchanging goodness. He would unstop the ears of the deaf to hear the sweet and thrilling music of the ten thousand choral songsters which are continually swelling their harmonious notes, and hymning the praises of their great Original; and unlose the tongue that had been bound for years, to join in the general song of thanksgiving and praise to God, and to swell the long, loud anthem of redeeming grace and boundless love.

How touching was his rebuke to his disciples, when they would have called down fire from heaven to destroy their enemies! "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of; for the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." And when, in the hour of trial, and the bitter anguish of his soul, his cruel enemies came forth to take him, Peter drew his sword and cut off the ear of the servant of the high priest, Jesus said to him "put up thy sword," and then by a miracle kindly restored the loss of the suffering man. I would here—although it be a digression—advert to his treatment of this apostle on another occasion. The reader will bear in mind that Peter was always confident that he should never desert his Lord and Master in the hour of trial and danger, and that when Jesus told him that before a certain time he would deny him thrice, he thought it impossible for him ever to do so. O, how weak, how frail and inconstant is poor human nature! The hour of trial came. Peter was in the presence of his Master. He denied him the third time. At this moment the signal foretold by Jesus was given. "And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter." That look of tenderness and compassion sent the reproof home to his heart, and called forth tears of penitence from his soul—he "remembered the words of his Lord, and went out and wept bitterly."

And how feeling, and how affecting was his conduct toward his own countrymen the Jews. Descending from the Mount of Olives, and weeping in prospect over the degradation and misery of the fallen condition of the holy people, he felt himself bound, by his commission from on high, to pronounce the malediction of heaven upon that wicked and perverse nation; but he could not do it without at the same time intermingling it with a gracious promise. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." And then in his dying expression to them on the cross, he uttered the crowning seal to the benignity of his commission—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" I covet not the sensibility of that heart, or the devotion of that soul, that can read these glowing evidences of the loving kindness, the benignity and the tender compassion of my Master, without according to him the sentiment of our text, "he hath done all things well."

A THOUGHT AND A QUERY.

Br. Grosh.—A few days since an elderly gentleman came into our village, and gave notice that he would lecture in the evening at the village school house, on the second coming of the Messiah." Accordingly a respectable number appeared to give him a hearing. Not being present at the commencement of the lecture, I am not able, nor is it my intention, to give a detail of the lecture, (if such it could be called,) but to state a thought and a query that arose in my mind on leaving the house, having listend to him but a few minutes. May our Partialist brethren, reflect on the same, and if any one should feel disposed, give me an answer. The lecture had not proceeded far, before it began to be suspected that he was not sane on the subject of religion. These suspicions were soon confirmed, and every doubt removed on his rising from his seat and hanging upon the wall a chart of the hydrostatic bellows, by which he said he designed to show how the second coming might be effected, and his interpretations of the Old Testament prophecies and predictions prove true. Several persons soon left, some apparently disgusted—some pitying—others censuring or condemning him as inconsistent and absurd. As I walked towards my home I asked myself whether he was any more inconsistent and absurd than the greater part of the Christian world—especially divines—notwithstanding his insanity; and would it not be as easy and as consistent to prove the second coming of Christ by the hydrostatic bellows, as to show and prove the paternity of God's character, or the plenitude, and infinity of his justice, mercy, and goodness, by the doctrine of hell torments. I certainly would as soon undertake the former as the latter, and think myself not only as consistent but as likely to succeed.

Query.—If the learned gentlemen this evening has exhibited signs of insanity, do not all divines who undertake to maintain God's goodness or justice by the doctrine of endless suffering, prove that they are morally depraved? D. B.

TEACHINGS AND TENDENCIES....NO. III.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

FILIAL AFFECTION.

Universalism enjoins love to God as a leading duty of the disciple of Jesus. All the other relative duties grow out of this. Filial affection is the corner stone in the temple of religious ethics. It is the foundation of the practical graces and virtues exhibited in a goodly life.

The command to love God, must be acknowledged to be reasonable. It is what we should expect from a religion whose whole nature is love. It obtains as a matter of necessary existence.—It is not at all surprising that we are called upon to surrender the entire heart unto God, by a doctrine which is based only upon the universality and eternity of God's love to man. It could do nothing else. This is all it could demand, which would harmonize with its nature. This must unavoidably become one of its great teachings.—And this command, broad and binding as it is, does not go beyond man's capability of obedience. It is not, as many would have us believe, an unjust and unnatural tax upon his powers of compliance. The human heart, by its moral organization and constitution, is capable of rendering its supreme tribute of love unto its God. How often have you seen it swayed, wholly and entirely, by the influence of a passion, which was induced exclusively by the paltriness and poverty of earth's blessings—poor and paltry indeed, when contrasted with those richer and holier joys, secured by obedience to this great command?—How often have you seen it wasting itself away by the piecemeal, toiling, in the most blinded and pervading infatuation, for the acquisition of those gilded and glittering baubles which, at most, afford but a momentary satisfaction? And as often, I ween, have you seen it gather up its own jewelled and priceless treasures, and lay them, all pure and holy, on the altar of earth-born affection, with a devotedness and an idolatry which mocked the offerings of the most enthusiastic worshipper of the prophet's Allah! You do not deny any thing of this. But yet, when we talk to you of turning the current of the heart's devotion into another channel, when we point you to Him who is the "chiefest among ten thousand, and the One altogether lovely" and to be loved, and ask for the yielding homage of your thoughts and affections, then a solemn look of mystery and wonder is spread over the countenance, and you begin to think of the utter impracticability of such a compliance. This inconsistency will appear the more evident, as we proceed to speak of the inducements held out for the eliciting of our affection for God.

We are required to love the divine Being on account of the unsolicited fiveness of his love for us. No act or goodness of ours caused the outflowings of his tenderness to us-ward. No exercise of faith or filial trust wrought in the Omnipotent Mind the eternal tie that binds him to his children. It ever existed. He first loved us.—We never enkindled this affection. It has ever burned, free and uncaused, in the bosom of our heavenly Father.

And it is not, you will remember, a principle which reaches down to one man, and not to another. No restriction is fastened upon it. It comes to you, but it does not pass your neighbor "on the other side of the way." It visits within the threshhold of your home; it also gladdens the circle around his board and hearth-stone. Its sweet sunshine falleth alike upon all. It is impartial—unlimited.

But its perpetuity is likewise included among its great attributes. Were it not for this, it might, indeed, claim our passing admiration, but not our undoubting confidence. We should think of it, as we now think of the sparkling dew and the golden cloud. Though we might gaze at the beauty, we should lament and dread its evanescence. We should know not when it might die, and leave us in eternal orphanage. To-morrow—to-night—this hour, it might be, it would go out, and from its fadings there would come forth the blackest midnight and desolation. Gloom and grief would be our portion forever. But of this we have nothing to fear. Divine love, like its beautiful type given to the prodigal in the parable, has no end. Its circle runs from everlasting to everlasting. Eternity will never see it broken. It clasps the whole wide world evermore. No principality or power can annihilate its strong embrace.

Here, then, are powerful inducements for us to love God. But we speak of this filial affection now, not only as a matter of duty, but as a matter of consequence, resulting from the entertainment of liberal views. How can the heart of man, with its present make and texture, avoid tendering unto God its highest and most ardent homage, when it is realized that his love is voluntary and unbought—limitless and impartial, and of an unceasing duration? What will secure the supreme affections of his heart, if it can not be done by the realization of the fact, that God has ever lavished his kindness upon its whole existence, and that this kindness will never fail or forget? What will melt the cold indifference and impenitency within him, if a sense of almighty and universal goodness can not do it? Talk of parental negligence, and anger, and revenge! I tell you, these will only petrify the obduracy within the child's bosom, and drive him out and away from his father's door. But offer him love, and he will love you again. Smile upon him, and his touched heart will gush over with the warmest gratitude and filial affection.

THOUGHTS FOR THE THINKING....NO. IV.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

How long ere erring humanity will learn, whatsoever their lot may be, therewith to feel content—to feel as if their destinies were in the hands of Him who is the dispenser of all good, who is not moved by any momentary caprice, measuring out blessings on the one hand in endless profusion, and on the other, dealing out cursings in boundless extravagance, and who is not influenced by any principles towards the creatures of his power, other than Love and Mercy—to feel as if they were not deserted by their heavenly Parent, though the lowering tempest, gathering slowly and yet darkly over the face of their dream-like existence, breaks forth with violent impetuosity, sundering every sacred and endearing tie, and blasting every oasis in the journey of life, from the tearful cradle to the slumbers of the grave—and to feel the meek and unmurmuring spirit of the Christian ever dwelling within, though the fires of sorrow sweep over the fairest and greenest spot in their hearts; though the coldness and neglect of others have frozen the very streams of affection, and congealed the sources of sympathy at their fountain; and though

> Around, within, their minds survey
> The "deepening tracks of slow decay"— and in the bitterest moments, when the fountain of peace and happiness has been troubled and darkened by the billows of anguish, and grief seems the only in-dwelling spirit of their souls; be ever ready to exclaim, "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it."

How long ere the sons of men will learn to sing the angel anthem that told the Messiah's advent, "Peace on earth, and good will to men," and learn that the harmony which fell from angelic lips in the courts of heaven, should not jar so upon the ears of mankind? Oh! how long shall strange and fearful inconsistency last? Will it cease while mad ambition stalks demon-like over the fairest portion of the earth, causing desolation to follow in his pathway, while fierce havoc rides over the land, rending the air and waking the spirit of quietude from her dream-like slumbers, with the fetlocks of his iron-hoofed horses dripping with blood, foot-pressed from his dying victim? Or will it cease while power, fiend-like, sits upon his throne, built of human skulls with his own hands, and cemented together with the blood of the slain—while many a field is wet with the red rain of battle, and the ghastly form of carnage, drunk with human gore, is still staggering over his crimsoned path, where may be found full often the voracious vultures gathering around their horrible banquet? No! Long years may circle themselves away when war, with a triumphant step, walks abroad in the earth, staining it with the crimson current of life, and drenching his garment in human blood, and the children of men will have no heart to join in the sweet anthem of peace, and respond to the melody of heaven. Nay, age after age may be registered in the past, when mankind tear from the bosom of the earth the engines of death, and work vigorously at their trade of blood; causing the widow to bend in her still and silent despair, over the lonely hearth, and wait with a listening ear to catch the sound of a footstep that can never rise from the threshold again, and a welcome voice that can never greet her ear to awake her from the agony of grief—and making orphans ask in vain for their slaughtered fathers! and still the song of the heavenly hosts will be unheard amid the din of the battle-field, and the spirit of the Prince of Peace will slumber in the hearts of men, like the image of life in the bosom of death.

PARTIALISM—A DIALOGUE.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

Limitarian.—Good morning brother Universalist.

Universalist.—Good morning brother Partialist—I am glad your charity is so much enlarged that you can call one of us brother; I hope faith will soon usher you into the great fold.

L. Well, how did you like the lecture of Elder C—— last night?

U. I can not say that I approved it.

L. Why not? I do not see how any one could dislike it.

U. It was based upon a false foundation.

L. Ah! How will you make that appear?

U. It was predicated upon the malignity of the Supreme Jehovah, which amounts to neither more nor less than blasphemy; or upon the inability of Jesus Christ to perform the will of the Father.

L. It seems to me that your class of people are rather bold in their charges against us. Who ever heard an orthodox believer charge the Almighty with cruelty?

U. Any and every one, who ever heard them avow their belief. Does not your creed say, that God, before the foundation of the world, elected a certain portion of mankind to immortal glory and felicity, without any foresight of faith or good works; and that he reprobated the remainder to unending torments, to the praise of his vindictive justice!

L. Why, it does read in that manner to be sure. But that need have no effect upon our conduct. We are to work out our own salvation here.

U. Do you believe the decrees of Omnipotence to be mutable?—that when his counsels are registered in the archives of heaven, he will repent and disannul them?

L. Oh no. God is without variableness or shadow of turning. He is of one mind, and none can turn him.

U. Then if you are elected to enjoy the glories of heaven and immortality—if God has purposed in himself to bring you through the golden gates into the joys of the holy city, is it possible for all Milton's embattled demons to rob you of that election?

L. Why no, surely the counsels of God must stand.

U. And if I am passed by in the decree of mercy, and reserved for everlasting vengeance—if Jehovah has determined to consign me to never-ending wrath and destruction, for the praise of his vindictive justice, is there any power that can redeem me from this dire decree?

L. Well, I do not see as it is possible to escape his positive decress; but there must be some condition in the case I think.

U. Pray be careful not to deny your creed.—Either, you believe God has no plan—that all is left to circumstances—or you believe the destiny of all mankind was known to God before the world's creation; and if known to him, it must have been irrevocably fixed. Now the lecture was upon the prayer of the thief upon the cross, and he inferred that if he had not prayed, he must have been lost to all eternity. "For," said he, "it is evident the thief saw his danger, or he would not have prayed. For if he was sure of eternal life, why need he ask it? No man would ask a seat in the stage, if he were there already." Now do you think the thief's prayer effected in the least, the original determination of God?

L. I can not say that it did, but there is mystery in God's dealings, that we can not unravel.

U. Do you believe the Saviour ever prayed in vain? There is no mystery in that.

L. Oh no. He could not ask in vain.

U. Well, he prayed, in the last agonies of dissolving nature, and asked his Father to bestow forgiveness upon his murderers. Will they be pardoned? Judas among the rest, for he was accessory.

L. We have no right to ask or answer such questions.

U. When we have no right to use our reason it becomes a useless gift.

SOCIETY

For the Relief of Widows and Orphans of deceased Clergymen.

At the session of the Ontario Association, convened at Wolcott, September 4th, 1839, a meeting was called pursuant to arrangements and resolutions that had been previously made by said Association, for the purpose of organizing a Society for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of deceased Universalist Clergymen—wherefore, Rev. Jacob Chase, was chosen Moderator, and Rev. Wm. Queal, Clerk.

A Constitution was then adopted for the government and guidance of the Society in its business transactions.

Messrs. E. Cook, of Penfield, Daniel Kenyon, of Newark, and Mason Pierce of Hannibal, were appointed Trustees. Mr. E. Cook, of Penfield, was chosen Treasurer—Rev. L. L. Sadler, of Geneva, was chosen Secretary. Appointed Revs L. L. Sadler, Wm. Queal and Wm. Manley, a committee to procure the publication of the Constitution for distribution, with a view of obtaining members, and donations, and subscriptions to its funds.

Resolved—That the different preachers of the Ontario Association, be a committee to circulate the Constitution in the different societies of said Association, for the purpose of obtaining the signatures of such persons as may desire to become members.

Adjourned to meet the first Wednesday in September, in the town of Bristol, N. Y.,

REMARKS.

It is well known to the Universalist public, that a great proportion of the preachers of a world's salvation, barely support themselves during their age of usefulness. Consequently, when their labors cease, want ensues.—And if they die, and leave behind them widows and orphans, they are thrown on their own resources and the cold charities of the world, for subsistence. A state of want and beggary is a very unhappy condition, and if means could be adopted to prevent such an evil, it would be of great service to humanity. Until the cause of God's impartial grace has become sufficiently promoted, to allow its advocates a competent support, such cases of indigence and charity will frequently occur—And until then, some benevolent institution, to aid the destitute widow and fatherless, ought to exist, and receive the patronage of the friends of liberal Christianity. The Relief Society has been formed for this purpose; and it is to be hoped it will receive the approbation of the friends of Gospel truth and humanity, in the region of country where the society exists. Could a fund of one or two thousand dollars be procured, the interest accruing would do much towards meeting the prospective exigences for which the society was instituted.—This sum, capable of doing such a vast amount of good, might be contributed, and scarcely be felt by the donors. Let us not look in vain for help in this benevolent enterprise.

L. L. Sadler, Secretary.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1839.

MESSRS. CAMPBELL AND SHEPARD'S CONVENTION.

In a former article I gave the entire correspondence on this subject and proved, as conclusively as a negative can be proved, that there never had been a Universalist Convention held in Rochester city previous to last Spring—that there never were fifty Universalist preachers assembled together in western New-York—that in no Universalist council was it ever debated or voted upon, whether a belief in the Bible should be disavowed by Universalists—that Dr. Luke Shepard (the declared informant of S. E. Shepard) never was, as pretended, a Universalist preacher, and that his name does not appear, even as a layman, on the records of the Association in which it is pretended he preached for some time, nor can it be found named in our published accounts of preachers, agents, or active friends. We have challenged denial of these statements, and asked for some proof in relation to the foul and false charge made against us; and we now say, that no proof will ever be furnished; for none can be found. Here we might rest this question, sure of an honorable and full acquittal at the hands of a candid public. But there are some other facts in the case, worthy of attention, that full justice may be done to us and our accusers.

1. The nearer you approach in investigation towards a reality, the more definite, distinct and palpable it appears. But this story of a nonentity-Convention, of Universalist-infidels is like a fog bank. Afar off, on the Mississippi, Mr. Campbell makes it a very showy, solid like affair, of 52 preachers in public Convention, and the proceedings well known—but on coming to a record of it, it was some kind of a public meeting, of which "an overwhelming majority" (four-fifths no longer) were for avowing themselves infidels, either in public or in private;—and in Mr. S. E. Shepard's hands it becomes less distinct still—very shadowy—a private convention of only "a respectable number of Universalist clergymen." Were the next witness in being, (if, indeed he was a witness; for it is not only in murder that dead witnesses are very convenient—"tell no tales," and contradict no false statements!) I have no doubt that there would be scarcely a rag of mist left to tell what the great fog bank was made of!

2. Both Messrs. Campbell and Shepard have always professed a firm belief of the singular tale. Yet Mr. Shepard never even inquired of his brother when and where this wonderful Convention was held—nor yet who were members of it—and this, too, notwithstanding his just previously expressed belief that professing Christians generally had faith in the Bible! Very strange that he did not make such inquiries, is it not?

But this is not all. Both Campbell and Shepard are opposed to Universalism and to infidelity. Both have discussed Universalism, with Universalist preachers, on Scripture grounds alone, since they heard this tale they profess to have believed. Now these men must have known that if they could prove Universalist preachers to be infidels—disbelievers in the Bible—there was no need for a discussion of the doctrine on Scripture grounds—they need only prove Universalist preachers to be infidels, and the public would at once frown down all the hopes of Universalists, reprobate their hypocrisy, and even many Universalists would forever abandon their preachers and the name in disgust. This Messrs. Campbell and Shepard must have known—yet, for years they keep perfectly quiet about the charge—they never sound an alarm to the public, or bring forward their charges to open the eyes of the public. Nay more—as if to persuade the public that Universalist preachers did really believe in the Bible, and based their pretended faith on its honestly supposed teachings, they even engage in controversy with Messrs. Montgomery and Skinner, make the Bible the testimony, and go through the entire discussion without penning a line to rout them entirely from the field by proving that Universalist preachers had no faith in the Bible. Thus, in every way, these two men have encouraged the public to believe that Universalists are, really, not infidels—that they are undoubting and undoubted believers in the authenticity and genuineness of divine revelation! And now, only after finding themselves beaten in the controversies, at least in public estimation, and nearly three years, as they profess, after they have learned and believed the charge of infidelity against us—now, only, do they come out and declare that, for years past, they have believed, and do now believe, that Universalist preachers generally are disbelievers in the Bible! This is very strange conduct in professed advocates of Christianity. Either they did not believe their accusation of us, or they were willing that we should deceive the public, and even to aid us in so doing, until they found themselves worsted by us in controversy! They may take which horn of the dilemma they please; but I am satisfied that a candid and discerning public will award them the one or the other—most probably the first.

A. B. G.

Since Br. Grosh penned the above, we have received the following from Br. Chase, accompanied by certificates from several other persons. To Universalists, the character of Dr. Shepard, as set forth in the following certificates, will be sufficient to prove the story of Mr.

Campbell and Co. unfounded. Such of the facts as set forth the moral character of Dr. Shepard, we would gladly have omitted, but justice to the reporters of this story will not suffer us to do so. Mr. S. E. Shepard, in his reply to Br. Grosh, (see Magazine and Advocate for August 30th,) says that not only his brother, but "others informed me that he [Dr. Shepard] spent some time in the proclamation of Universalism in Courtland and Tompkins counties, N. Y." There is an evident attempt on the part of Mr. S. E. Shepard to baffle us in exposing the incorrectness of his tale.—He would not have us understand that his brother is the only authority he has to sustain his own veracity.—O, no! He has received some of his information from "others." But those others are nameless, (and we fear he can not name them,) and we must be referred to the only person who can not testify against him, who, so far from being a Universalist, was either an avowed infidel, or a Baptist in regular standing, during the whole time that it is pretended that he was a Universalist preacher. That he was never a Universalist preacher, as Mr. S. E. Shepard represents, the reader will be convinced after reading

Br. Chase's Letter.

Rochester, September 1, 1839.

Br. GROSH:—

In answer to your inquiries concerning Dr. Luke Shepard, I would simply say, that, as far as I can learn from those in this city who knew him, he was a very vile and abandoned creature. But the following certificates will speak for themselves. I will take the liberty of stating, that I labored as a Universalist preacher within the bounds of the Cayuga Association, constantly, from the Spring of 1829, to the Fall of 1835. I was well acquainted in Tompkins, Cortland, and Cayuga counties, and in every town in those counties, where there were Universalists enough to hold a meeting. In Dryden, from whence L. Shepard removed, and where he must have borne the character of a Universalist preacher if any where, I was well acquainted—preached there several times. I was instrumental in organizing eight Universalist societies in the Cayuga Association; and if any man by the name of Luke Shepard had ever claimed to have been a preacher of our order, I should certainly have known something about it. From 1829 to 1835, I attended every session of the Cayuga Association, and know positively that no such man was ever, during that time, received into the fellowship of that body. But I will not be tedious, as the subject is hardly worth a notice. J. CHASE.

We next present the reader with the letter of George H. Roberts, as it contains some particulars not specified in the certificate of Capt. Amsden.

With reference to Dr. Luke Shepard, I know the person, but never spoke with him—never heard of his being a Universalist—he never attended Universalist meetings, neither did I ever hear any one speak of him as a Universalist, or of his ever having professed to be one. On the receipt of Rev. A. B. Grosh's letter by Rev. J. Chase, of date July 23d, 1839, I called, by request of Mr. Chase, on Capt. Amory Amsden, a prominent and strong infidel, to inquire what he might know relative to the inquiries of Mr. Grosh. He answered that his acquaintance commenced as expressed in his written reply—that he did not have entire confidence in Dr. Luke Shepard, was jealous as to his doing justly, and in relation to a pecuniary matter, he, Dr. Luke Shepard, equivocated considerably. A particular acquaintance with Dr. S., as an Editor, commenced between Mr. A. and Dr. S., on the publication of the "World As It Is." After it commenced, Mr. A. was asked how much he would give towards the support of said paper, to which he replied, he would give twenty dollars to have it discontinued, as he did not approve of its matter. Capt. A. represented to me that Dr. S. was in the habit of selecting from the Bible such parts as he considered vulgar, and commenting on the same. Capt. A. further stated that Dr. S., while here, lived with a woman who was not his lawful wife—he ran away from his wife with the woman he lived with here, at the time he left Tompkins county, N. Y. Capt. A. represented Dr. S. as having been very zealous among the Baptists, while he was a member of that denomination, and that he sometimes exhorted among them. He practiced medicine about two years before leaving Dryden, Tompkins county, I think; and when he came to settle his affairs, his patients complained of his charges as exhorbitant, and laid the matter before the church, which was probably measurably the cause of his leaving and going to Utica. Capt. A. says, that when in Utica, during the Temperance excitement, Dr. S. approved of the course taken by Mr. Grosh, or Skinner, relative to Temperance. Further than this, he did not say that Dr. S. took any interest in Universalism, or Universalists; Dr. S. then kept a public house. The interest in Mr. Grosh and Skinner, was only elicited by the measures relative to Temperance which they took, meeting his views measurably—which had no connection with religious creeds or tenets.

While at Utica, Dr. S. took little or no interest in religion. My residence commenced in Rochester previous to Dr. S.'s; and I have been a constant resident, and know no such Convention was ever held here.—The assertion is false. Dr. S.'s reputation, from report, was bad. No language was too blasphemous for him to use—probably no one derided religion in a more low and vulgar manner than himself. Capt. Amsden gained his particular knowledge of Dr. S.'s religious life, from Dr. S. himself, and his lawful wife, who was here at the time of his death, and at which time Capt. A. obtained the information from her. I have understood his lawful wife was a professor of religion, and an amiable woman. Whatever Capt. Amory Amsden has stated, may be relied on with implicit confidence.—Asahel Griswold, who has given a written certificate, is a prominent infidel, and has lived here for years. From my conversation with Capt. Amsden, I should doubt Dr. S.'s constant veracity. GEO. H. ROBERTS.

In the certificates which follow, the reader will discover, what has so often been affirmed, that the whole foundation of the story of Mr. Campbell and Shepard is false—who the author of the falsehood is it rests with Mr. S. E. Shepard to show. Let the certificates speak for themselves.

Rochester, 17th August, 1839.

Mr. G. H. ROBERTS, Sir:

Respecting the inquiry, so far as relates to Dr. Luke Shepard, I have only to state, that I became partially acquainted with him in the Winter of 1834 and '35.—That in the Spring of '35 he became the Editor and Publisher of a paper entitled the World As It Is, which circumstance led to a further acquaintance (more as an Editor than otherwise,) until late in the Fall of '36, when he, the Dr., was taken sick, and consequently the paper discontinued. Certain circumstances developed during his illness, which terminated with his existence in April of '37, led subsequently to further inquiry as to his former course of life, and, of course, religious belief, etc. I learned from him and other sources, that he became early united to the Baptist church, say at the age of 16 or 18 years, from and after which time he became more and more zealous in the cause, until bordering on enthusiasm—that during this time he became united in wedlock, and also obtained a diploma, which entitled him to become a regular practitioner in the medical science—I think in Cortland county, N. Y.; that after some few years practice, owing to some dissatisfaction in the church, or in the course of practice, or both, he removed to Tompkins county, from thence to Utica, where he kept a public house—during which time he either did, or at least affected to savor of Universalism—from thence to Rochester in the Summer of '33. As to his ever being a Universalist preacher, I never heard the least intimation until asked the question. And as to the Convention of the 50 Universalist clergyman, held in Rochester in 1835, I have never before had the least intimation of any such meeting, neither do I believe there ever was, for if there ever had been, and the Dr. been in possession of the fact, he would not have failed to have apprised me of it, as also many others of his acquaintance. AMORY AMSDEN.

Rochester, 17th August, 1839.

MR. ROBERTS:—

I was only acquainted with Dr. L. Shepard about 2 years before his decease; and have never heard him intimate that he had joined the Universalists; neither have I ever heard before the present time, of a Universalist Convention of the character your letter speaks of. I have been informed by Dr. S., and also by his wife, that he was in regular standing in the Baptist church, where he used to reside. ASAHEL GRISWOLD.

Rochester, September 1, 1839.

This is to certify, that I was well acquainted with Dr. Luke Shepard,—attended on him as physician through his last sickness, was with him while dying, and assisted in a post mortem examination of his body. Said Shepard had two wives, was a rash, cruel wretch—the most profane creature I ever knew. In a conversation with him relative to Universalism, he stated that he thought less of it than he did of reputed orthodoxy. He was a rank, outrageous infidel, of the most blasphemous stamp. In reference to the "Convention of Universalist clergymen," I would only say, that I have never before heard of any such Convention, neither do I believe there is the least particle of truth in the story. H. HALSTED.

This is to certify that I have resided in the city of Rochester for 11 years, and I have never known any thing of a private Convention of Universalist ministers being held in this place; had such a Convention been held I should unquestionably have known of it.

Rochester, August 31, 1839. H. ROBERTS.

Now let the reader reflect on the whole testimony upon this subject, and it will be seen that, however difficult it may be to prove a negative, Mr. Campbell's "fog bank," and Mr. S. E. Shepard's shadow, have dwindled away into—less than a shadow—a perfect "nonentity;" and this mighty argument against Universalism, delivered by a mightier theologian and controversialist, to a number of ladies, has neither living reality, nor imputed veracity to sustain it. On the other side of the question, it has been seen that there never has been a Convention, or a private meeting of Universalist clergymen in Rochester; that Dr. Luke Shepard never was in fellowship with the Universalist denomination; never preached Universalism, either in precept or practice; never told the story of the Universalist Convention to those whom he strove to make his confidants; never even professed to believe in Universalism to those whose friendship he wished to secure, and could not be believed if he had!—Take all these facts away from the story of Campbell and Shepard, and what remains? Why, nothing but the motive which prompted them to tell it. Time may develope this—we shall not attempt it now.

LETTER FROM BR. GROSH.

Boston, Mass., September 14, 1839.

DEAR BR. BARTLETT:—We—that is to say, my wife and self, for you know I do not often use the Editorial "we" for myself alone—arrived here last Wednesday morning, after a pleasant journey from Utica, and a halt of about 12 hours in New-York city; having accomplished the journey of 500 miles, and halt, in about 48 hours. After preparing to look around, found that nearly all the brethren had gone to Waltham, to attend a dedication there. Found Br. Bazin the Printer of the Trumpet, and Br. Balfour, in Br. Tompkins' office, and was in due time received into Br. Tompkins' house, from whence I now address you.

This has been a glorious week for Universalists in this vicinity. On Wednesday a new meeting house was dedicated in Waltham, about 8 miles distant, and a sermon preached in the afternoon, and a Conference held in the evening. On Thursday the meeting house in Cambridgeport, 4 miles distant, after having been refitted at an expense of more than $3000, was re-opened and dedicated—and a Conference held in the evening. And yesterday a beautiful and spacious meeting house was dedicated in Weymouth, 12 miles distant, a sermon preached in the afternoon, and a Conference held in the evening. The latter two I attended, except that I returned from Cambridgeport, tearing myself away from the agreeable converse and hospitalities of Br. T. Whittemore's mansion, to attend the regular weekly Conference held by Br. O. A. Skinner's congregation—the 5th Society. It has, therefore, been to me, as well as to all present, a joyous—a delightful week—a glorious time. But, alas! what earthly joys are unalloyed? Every now and then the thought would intrude, that one dearly loved and highly esteemed brother—one who was the joy and delight of the brethren, and a most joyous partaker of these seasons, was lying at the door of death—sinking, reviving, and sinking again, and without any hope of recovery. Oh, the tears of sorrow sunk unbidden into the eye, conglobed with the tears of holy joy, as this thought intruded itself amid the delights of our social worshipping circles.—And this morning—just before leaving Weymouth, where we had been so happy the night before, the news came that Br. THOMAS F. KING was no more! Yes, after lingering thus hopelessly, for a long time, he departed from his earthly pains and toils to heavenly joys and repose, yesterday afternoon, aged 42 years. His death will be severely felt, not only by his large and dependent family—not only in Charleston—but in this entire vicinity—wherever he was known. My heart is laden with sorrow, and I wish to say much, but have neither time nor room. His funeral will be attended in the house where he so ably preached, on Monday afternoon.

* * * * * * * *

Boston is the central point to which all our preachers in this region repair for ministerial intercourse. I have seen some thirty or forty already, among whom I must name Brs. Balfour, Hosea Ballou, J. G. Adams, Cobb, Allen, B. Whittemore, Folsom, Dyar, etc., etc. Brs. Paige, H. Ballou 2d, Bacon, C. Spear, O. A. Skinner, S. Streeter, etc., I had seen before. Brs. Chapin, Sadler, T. J. Sawyer, and Whittaker, from abroad, are here on their way to the Convention, and preach in this city and vicinity next Sunday. Besides the ministering brethren, I have met some lay brethren and sisters, whose greetings sounded peculiarly pleasant—and non e more so, than those of Br. Tompkins, the publisher of the Universalist and Ladies' Repository. I could fill a good share of this letter with expressions of pleasure at such meetings, and of gratitude for the hospitality of host and hostess, and proffered kindness of friends—but I forbear.

Nor have I time at present to mention sights—among all which, the Boston Common of 40 acres, and the State house fronting it, with the views from its lofty dome, are not the least—or to describe beautiful meeting houses, rich pulpits, good congregations and sermons, and excellent singing—so I pass on to notice

The Rose of Sharon, the annual Edited by sister Edgarton. It is, excepting perhaps, (for modesty's sake only, mind you!) two articles by myself, filled with as good, interesting and well written articles as any annual I have ever seen—better, by far, than the articles generally published in these periodical books. Indeed, how could it be otherwise?—the Editor is herself the largest contributor. Well—it is as beautifully printed, (and on very fine paper,) as its articles are excellent—and tastefully, neatly, and even splendidly bound—but (how I do hate the material that calls forth this "but")—but in dark, figured muslin. Of the engravings I can not speak much—they appear to be very fair, but nothing extra—indeed, I care very little about them. It is a cheap work for the labor and expense it has cost, and I really fear that the edition will not hold out equal to the demand that must be made for it; for Br. Tompkins has printed but 2000 copies of it. So let those who want it, apply early, or prepare for a disappointment.

Universalism Illustrated and Defended, by Br. O. A. Skinner, is a body of Universalist divinity, admirably got up by author, printer and bookbinder, nearly the size of the Layman's Legacy, and to be retailed at the same price. I have not found time to read the whole work, but the past labors of the author are a pledge that this more important work will be found chaste and classical in style, correct in doctrine and right in spirit.

Affectionately and fraternally thine,

A. B. Grosh.

BARBAROUS EXTRAVAGANCE.

"Slaves for farm work in Virginia, are said to be worth $800, cash. And yet one white man can do as much work as two slaves."—Newspaper.

From this we learn that an able bodied white man is worth $1600, merely as a laboring animal. And yet, the State of New-York—the wise and enlightened State of New-York, in the year 1839—to repair the loss of one, who was killed, deliberately ordered another to be choked to death! This actually took place in Lewis county some weeks ago. Thus they endeavored to repair a loss of $1600, by throwing away another $1600, besides the cost of throwing it away! If a party man in political life were thus to waste the public treasure, what an outcry would be made about his heedless extravagance; but the people, through their repesentatives, can thus provide for wasting and destroying the greatest public treasures of the State, and to inculcate by example a spirit of similar extravagance in others, and for what! To continue as long as possible a barbarous relic, and feed a spirit of cruel retaliation which is as much at war with civilization, sound reason and good policy, as it is directly opposed to every refined feeling of humanity, and the mild and benevolent spirit of Christianity. When will the world learn that "the very worst use you can put a man to, is, to hang him"?

A. B. G.

IN WHOM DO WE TRUST!

We have often been referred by our opposers, to certain unnameable and undateable cases, wherein it is contended that Universalists have abandoned their faith in a dying hour, and embraced its opposite. Now we put no confidence in such last resort representations. The reporters might better save themselves the trouble of circulating them. Those of their own people who have been acquainted with Universalists will not believe them. If it were possible that such reports came within the range of truth, it would be a perfect certainty that such persons must have departed, receiving their punishment for their apostacy, with crushed hopes and the horrors of despair. And this result would be the frailest, weakest, of all arguments against the sustaining power of our faith.

But such statements can not be true with reference to those who have truly embraced Universalism.—Reader, have you a friend who has stood by you in the darkest hours of distress, when every other has deserted you—who has soothed your mind, and shielded you from calamity—who has exhibited proofs of unshaken fidelity and faithfulness; and could you scorn him, withdraw your confidence, and spurn his proffered assistance, when you knew that he was faithful, and possessed the power to save you—and all just as the accumulated woes of earth were settling upon you? If you could, you might perhaps forget your trust in God, and shut your soul against his eternal goodness, just as you was about entering upon its full and uninterrupted enjoyment—but not without.

A. R. B.

OPPOSITION TO THE RESTITUTION.

It is often said that the Restitution is pleasing to the carnal mind, and that the vicious never oppose it. But the following instance shows that this objection is not infallible. An individual, a professed believer in ceaseless wo, was somewhat in the habit of getting intoxicated.* One day, when well warmed with liquor, and very boisterous, he came to a friend and myself, as we were standing on the sidewalk, and after some of his talk about Universalism, he roared out as we were about leaving him, "You may preach your d—d Universalist lies, and nobody will believe 'em." Pretty well, thought I, for a man believing in endless misery for the sinner—a strong refutation of the stale saying, that sinners always love the Restitution.

G. W. M.

THE UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES' REPOSITORY.

In the absence of Br. Grosh, it can hardly be expected that we should find much time to devote to reading of any kind. But in the very midst of our employment, comes the September number of the "Repository," tempting us to lay aside our steel pen, and indulge us in a quiet hour or two over its pages. It contains some good articles, to our knowledge, and probably many more that we have not read. To those ladies who wish to diffuse a knowledge of our blessed faith among their fair companions, the Universalist and Ladies' Repository affords the best of means. We deem it an excellent work to soften the prejudices of our female opposers.

A. R. B.

* Let it be remarked, that this case is not mentioned, to prejudice any one against the faith he held—it was only another proof that there are good and evil people in all denominations."

THE EXPOSITOR AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW.

The September No. of this truly valuable work came duly to hand, but we were obliged to defer noticing it until this week. Nor shall we be able to bestow upon it particular notice now, not having had time to give it a thorough perusal. What we have examined, has more than paid us for the time it has occupied. We would urge it upon the attention of all who wish for a Universalist publication of the highest standard. The contents of the number before us are as follows—"The Twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, illustrated with Notes," by Rev. Hosea Ballou 2d. "Doctrinal and Practical Preaching," by Menzies Rayner. "The Character and Mission of John the Baptist, Compared with that of Christ," by C. F. Le Fevre. "Professor Tholuck and Universalism," by Rev. T. J. Sawyer.—"Course of Biblical and Theological study," by H. Ballou 2d. Literary notices.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"An Old Man's last Review of the Scriptures," is received, which we have not time to revise—therefore the delay.

Br. H. L. H. is informed, that the signature he has adopted is used by another writer in our denomination. If he must use an assumed signature, had he not better select some other?

A. R. B.

I have been requested to attend the Conference at Newport, which I should be pleased to do, but can not make it convenient in the absence of Br. Grosh.

A. R. B.

Br. Tompkins—Miss Rachel Nisbet, Big Brook, Oneida county, for whom we ordered the Repository in June, has not received it. She has paid us.

Br. Bazin—Transfer E. B. Vedder's Expositor from Honeoye Falls, to Rochester, and send him the May No., which he never received. Credit him $2 and charge

POETRY.

Br. GROSH—The following Stanzas seem to me to point out the true method for reclaiming the wanderer, and for elevating the standard of morality. They breathe the genuine spirit of Universalism. A. W. T.

South Venice, September, 1839.

"SPEAK NOT TO HIM A BITTER WORD."

Would'st thou a wanderer reclaim,
A wild and restless spirit tame?
Check the warm flow of youthful blood,
And lead a lost one back to God?
Pause, if thy spirit's wrath be stirr'd,
Speak not to him a bitter word.
Speak not! that bitter word may be
The stamp that seals his destiny!

If wildly he hath gone astray,
And dark excess has marked his way,
'Tis pitiful—but yet beware!
Reform must come from kindly care.
Forbid thy parting lips to move,
But in the gentle tones of love.
Though sadly his young heart hath err'd,
Speak not to him a bitter word.

The lowering frown he will not bear,
The venom'd chidings, will not hear;
The ardent spirit will not brook
The stinging touch of sharp rebuke.
Thou would'st not goad the restless steed,
To calm his fire or check his speed,
Then let no angry tones be heard,
Speak not to him a bitter word.

Go kindly to him—make him feel
Your heart yearns deeply for his weal;
Tell him the dangers thick that lay
Around his "wildly devious way"—
So shalt thou win him, call him back,
From pleasure's smooth, seductive track,
And warnings, thou hast mildly given,
May guide the wanderer up to heaven.

[From "Hymns of Zion."]

SPIRIT OF BEAUTY, OF LOVE AND CREATION.

Spirit of beauty, of love and creation!
Thou who art smiling in fountains and flowers!
Here on thy altar we pour a libation,
Incense to thy love from well-springs in ours.
Up from the fountains of faith and thanksgiving,
Rises the rainbow of praise o'er the heart:
Sunbeams of mercy, all darkness outliving,
Brightness, and beauty, and glory impart.

Oh! for thy mercy, our Father Eternal,
Voices and harp-tones thy praises shall sing:
Fresh from our spirits, all balmy and vernal,
Blessings and honors to thee we will bring.
Bless thee, O Father! thou King of salvation!
Love is thy diadem, mercy thy seal!
Truth thy unchanging, eternal foundation,
Justice thy sceptre to bruise and to heal.

Quicken, O spirit of love and creation!
Quicken our hearts with devotional fire;
Kindle a flame in the shrine of oblation.
Waken our love with thy magical lyre.
Now from the altar our music is stealing,
Upward and onward to thee on thy throne;
Bless, dearest Father, this tribute of feeling,
Poor though the song be, for love wakes the tone.

FADING FLOWERS.

To the reflecting mind, there is a gloom not unmixed with pleasure, in contemplating the fading flowers. It is melancholy to witness their silver leaves fall. But who would stay the rolling year, and dwell amid the beauties of perpetual Spring? Who would see the face of nature blushing in perennial bloom? It is well that the flower is ordained to fall and give place to the ripened fruit. Eternal Spring would yield but a meagre harvest to the husbandman. Fadeless flowers would compensate but poorly for the fine rich fruit. Murmur not then though their glories depart. Let the year roll on, the flowers fade and fall, and though the change cause sadness, still rejoice in the prospect of an exuberant harvest.

How like a "flower that comes forth and is cut down," is the brief period of human life! Beautiful emblem of our earthly existence! We come into this world, our faculties expand like the swelling bud, they burst into loveliness like the opening flower, and for a while all is life and beauty. But the flower is not perpetual;—it blooms, but to die. With all our majestic powers and all the glory of our nature, how soon we decay and fall. Like the lovely flower we pass away. And this change is also necessary for the fruit to mature;—that mortality may be swallowed up of life. Like as the crimson strawberry, or the velvet nectarine, succeeds the fallen flower, so also shall it be with us. The glories of humanity will depart, the flower will fade and fall, but this change is the preliminary of a golden harvest. And it is well that God has thus ordained. Better that our earthly existence cease, that the flower should decay, than that heaven, the ripened fruit, should never be obtained.—Murmur not then at the loss of friends. The fruit is more desirable than the flower, heaven than earth.—Mourn their loss, this is right, but not as those who mourn without hope. And feeling that we too must close our eyes upon the bright scenes of earth, let us be resigned to all the allotments of Providence. While the flower is fading, let us rejoice in the prospect of an exuberant harvest, a blessed immortality, a reunion with those we love, of a "family in heaven."—Ladies' Repository.

THE WATER OF LIFE.

Christ had said that whosoever drinketh of this water, shall never thirst, but it shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life. Reader, hast thou been to Christ, and received of him this blessed gift,—hast thou drank from this pure fountain, and are the longings of thy immortal soul satisfied? If thou hast, then art thou truly happy; for thou hast found a source of felicity, which shall flow on unwasted through the endless ages of eternity. But thou hast not tasted if thou thirsteth still for the strange waters of earth; for know, that, though sweet to the senses, they can not quench that thirst which thou art doomed to suffer, until thou shalt seek and find the waters of salvation.—Palladium and Amulet.

THE WAY TO JUDGE.

Solomon in his proverbs thus says: "Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be right." It is not our province to judge, but our prerogative to witness. We are as jurors in one sense. We make up our minds for ourselves, though we do not sit as judge to declare the sentence. And there is no criterion so just as a man's conduct: this in fact is the strictest index to a man's character. We can not ascertain from report always the true state of a man, neither from profession, for a man may look one way, while he walks another; but in a land of Freedom and Liberty, untrammelled by man, there can be no mistake in his doings, for even a child is known by this, whether he be right or wrong. It is not for us to judge, yet we do it, and out of two evils, choosing the least, we must judge by their works, for by their fruits we may know them, and they in return know us; but we must judge individually, and not collectively. It is too common to judge of society by a few individuals; this is evidently wrong: we might as well go to an orchard and judge of the whole by a few barren trees: as to judge of a community by a few of its members. Some go so far as to judge by a name, virtually saying, "There can no good thing come out of Nazareth." But as the fruit of a tree characterizes only the tree from which it is plucked, so a man's doings can only characterize himself, and no other.—Olive Branch.

DEATHS.

In Potsdam, March 14th, Mr. ROSWELL PARKHURST aged 64 years. The disease that terminated his existence, was the lung fever. He survived the attack but a few days.

We have often been pained with accounts of savage cruelties, and admired the fortitude and heroism of females in some of those awful scenes. The following incident in the early life of Mr. Parkhurst, deserves notice.

During the Revolution, our northern frontiers were exposed to the invasion of savages, employed by the British government. In the Fall of 1780, a party of savages, headed by a Mr. Horton, burned Royalton in Vermont, and desolated some settlements in the adjoining towns. They slew all the males who attempted to make their escape, made prisoners of the rest, drove the women from, and pillaged and burnt their houses. Mr. Parkhurst, then about six years old, fell into their hands and was saved by the fortitude of a female. A Mr. Hendee, hearing of the approach of the Indians, directed his wife to flee for safety with their two children—a son seven years of age, and a daughter younger—while he went to give the alarm. In her flight, she was met by a company of Indians, who forced her son from her. Determined to save her son from captivity, she pursued them down the river which runs through Royalton, alternately leading and carrying her daughter, till she came against the place where a large company was stationed on the opposite shore. Neither the sight of the savage foe nor the intervening current, damped the ardor of her resolution. She led her daughter down to the shore, determined to wade across, when she was met by an Indian, who, supposing that she came to resign herself a prisoner, offered to carry them both over. She declined the favor, and he insisted upon carrying the child for her, which he took upon his back. She followed him till she came where the current was so deep and rapid that she submitted to his advice, and waited till he went ashore with the child, when he returned and carried her over. She hastened to the commanding officer and pleaded and remonstrated, till his more than savage heart was melted, and he gave back her son. She next made suit for her neighbors' children that she saw in captivity there, and by ardent and affectionate entreaties, procured their release. Mr. P. was among the number. She gathered them around her, and led them away, together with her little daughter, to a suitable place for fording the stream. Thus by the undaunted resolution of this woman, was Mr Parkhurst, with others, saved from a painful captivity, and a tedious march through the wilderness to Canada, that would have worn him down, if he had not been tomahawked, and his body left a prey for beasts of the forest and ravenous birds.

Mr. P. was one of the first settlers of Potsdam, where he endured both the toils and dangers of settling a new country. He lived to see the wilderness become a fruitful field preserved from all dangers and sustained through arduous toil. By the request of the relatives, I attended his funeral, and tendered the consolations of the Gospel from 2 Cor. i: 3, 4. F. J. BRIGGS.

In Lebanon, August 26th, THANKFUL YOUNGLOVE, wife of John Younglove, aged 79 years, 4 months, and 9 days.—Previous to her decease, there had not been a death in the family for more than 35 years. She has left 10 children, whose united ages, together with their parents, make 650 years. Sermon by Professor Maginnis, (Baptist.)

 Editors at the East and West, will please copy for the information of the friends.—Com.

In Minden, August 31st, ENOS, son of Levi Snell, aged 4 years, 2 months, and 17 days. The funeral was attended on the following day, and a discourse delivered to a large and listening congregation, by the writer, from 2 Pet. iii: 11

J. D. HICKS.

In Homer, August 8th, Mrs. DESIRE PARKER, consort of Col. Washington G. Parker, and sister of Rev. M. B. Smith, aged 43 years. See extracts from sermon delivered on the occasion. A. C. B.

In Henrietta, September 2d, Mrs. LUCY PHILIPS, aged 69 years. During her illness, which was about 5 months, she was resigned to the dispensations of God, and died in the hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave. She has left a husband and seven children to mourn her absence from them, until they shall meet in a better world, where parting is no more. Peace be with her surviving friends. May the Lord be with them, and bless them, even in peril's darkest hour, and finally save them and all men with an everlasting salvation. S. M.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED....NO. VII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TO HUSBANDS.

PLACE OF ABODE.

"The world was made so various, that the mind
Of desultory man, studious of change,
And pleased with novelty, might be indulged."

As the responsibility of selecting or locating the place of abode, devolves principally upon the husband, a few remarks upon this subject, may not be amiss. I am aware that in the estimation of many, the place of residence, the location of the dwelling, and the convenience of its structure, are matters of trifling importance. But let it be remembered that it is from a multiplicity of small comforts, each, perhaps, trivial in itself, that the great mass of human enjoyments, is made up.—Hence a general neglect of these small sources of comfort, will detract very materially from the sum of happiness which we experience—and we are thus admonished to attend with due precaution, to small matters as well as to great.

The place of residence will, of course, depend much upon the occupation or profession which is pursued. While the mechanic, the merchant, the professional man, from the nature of their occupation, will take up their abode in central and populous places, the farmer will generally prefer living upon his own estate, and in a neighborhood more sparsely peopled. The tilling of the earth is the most natural and primitive, and by far the most useful employment in which man can engage. It is the nursing-mother upon which all other branches of human industry depend for support. When agriculture is neglected, all other employments are speedily paralyzed; for when the farmer fails to afford sufficient material for feeding and clothing community, the other classes must either become themselves tillers of the soil, or experience want and distress. Agriculture is the most healthy, and generally the most profitable employment pursued. Although wealth is not usually so speedily acquired as it sometimes is in other pursuits, yet taken together, there is no branch of human occupation which yields so certain and permanent a return to industry. Indeed it is the source of all wealth, both individual and national. And it is to be regretted that there is such an evident disinclination to engage in this most praiseworthy business, among great numbers of those who are peculiarly fitted for it by their habits and circumstances. Although there are some engaged in agriculture, who reside in cities and villages at a distance from their estates, yet the generality of those in this business live upon their own farms, and personally superintend their own affairs—being satisfied of the truth of Dr. Franklin's homely, yet well proved adage:—

"He who by the plough would thrive, Himself must either hold or drive."

Those who have the opportunity of choosing between a country and a city residence, should deliberate maturely before they decide. There are advantages and disadvantages to be experienced in both cases. In the city are to be found the advantages and pleasures of a ready and abundant social intercourse—a constant supply of religious instruction, so varied in doctrinal tenets as to suit all views and tastes—and what is of great importance, the city affords better opportunities for the instruction of children—schools, both day and Sabbath, being more numerous, longer continued, and usually better managed—and to these may be added the facilities for improving and gratifying literary and scientific tastes to those who possess them. But to offset these advantages, there are many things of a disagreeable and painful character. The liability to sickness and early death from a confined and vitiated atmosphere, impure water, and the prevalence of contagious diseases—the lax state of morals among large portions of the population—the presence of poverty, want and crime in their most disgusting forms—together with numerous temptations to vice, and examples of a demoralizing character, to which children and youth are constantly and unavoidably exposed—form a catalogue of evils by no means unworthy of notice.

The advantages and disadvantages of a country residence, are, to some extent, the reverse of those pertaining to cities and large towns—although this inverse comparison will not, perhaps, hold perfect throughout. While the facilities for education and for religious instruction, especially of that varied character which the modern diversity in theological views renders necessary,* are not so great in the country, yet this deficiency is fully balanced by the more general prevalence of health, of sound morals, of industrious and economical habits, and virtuous and discreet examples. It has been well said, that "man made the city, but God made the country." The former is artificial, the latter is natural. In the city art and skill do their utmost to please the eye, the imagination, and the mind; but the utmost extent of human ingenuity can not vie with those beauties which the Master Artist has spread out upon the earth's variegated surface. Few there are who can fail to unite in the poet's language:—

"* * * * Strange! there should be found,
Who, self-imprisoned in their proud saloons,
Renounce the odors of the open field
For the unscented fictions of the loom:
Who, satisfied with only pencilled scenes,
Prefer to the performance of a God
The inferior wonders of an artist's hand!
Lovely indeed the mimic works of Art;
But Nature's works far lovelier. I admire,—
None more admires—the painter's magic skill,
Who shows me that which I shall never see.
Conveys a distant country into mine,
And throws Italian light on English walls.
But imitative stroke can do no more
Than please the eye—sweet Nature's every sense,
The air salubrious of her lofty hills,
The cheering fragrance of her dewy vales,
And music of her woods—no works of man
May rival these, these all bespeak a power
Peculiar, and exclusively her own.
Beneath the open sky she spreads the feast:
'Tis free to all—'tis every day renewed;
Who scorns it starves deservedly at home."

However much we may become attached to the city, there appears to be an inherent love for the country and its rural scenes, lingering in our hearts. With what delight do those who have long been immured within the brick walls, and confined to the dusty streets and smoky atmosphere of the city, go out to inhale the balmy air of field and meadow, hill and forest, when

"—— flowery May from her green cap throws
The yellow cowslip and the pale primrose."

They do not, it is true, tread upon carpets from Venetian looms, but upon the green grass ornament more gaily than art can devise, with violet and daisy, with purple wild thyme and modest hare-bell, and all those beautiful flowers which breathe a fragrant odor round—they do not listen to the sound of the loud-swelling organ, or brazen trumpet, or twanging piano, but to music far more sweet and melodious; the mellow note of the robin, the shrill whistle of the black-bird, the sonorous ditty of the sweet little "chipping bird," and the saucy chatter of the bob-o-lincoln, accompanied by the gentle, dreaming hum of the grass-hopper, that eccentric insect which has been immortalized by the lines of the ancient poet Anacreon, thus prettily translated by Cowley:—

"Happy insect! what can be
In happiness compared to thee?
Fed with nourishment divine,
The dewy morning's gentle wine!
Nature waits upon thee still,
And thy verdant cup does fill.
Thou dost drink, and dance, and sing;
Happier than the happiest king!
All the fields which thou dost see,
All the plants belong to thee:
All that Summer hours produce,
Fertile made with early juice."

So deeply is love of the country impressed upon the heart, especially of those who passed their childhood in rural scenes, that although it may be banished for a long series of years, by the absorbing cares of an active, business life, yet, like many other of the impressions of childhood, it will return again in old age, strong and fresh as when felt in boyhood's pleasant days. And the old merchant or artizan, after having passed a quarter or half century in the midst of the din and bustle of a commercial metropolis, and acquired a fortune, will seek out, under the mysterious yearnings for retirement and peace, some sequestered and quiet retreat, where he can pass the evening of life, amid scenes abounding

"With song of birds and stir of leaves and wings,
And run of rills and bubble of bright springs,
And hourly burst of pretty buds to flowers,
With buzz of happy bees in violata bowers."

Undoubtedly the majority of mankind prefer a country residence. But still the tastes of people will be guided much in this, as in most other respects, by their interest and their circumstances. I have resided for years in the crowded city—I have dwelt in the prim and pleasant village, and also, during the earlier part of my childhood, amid the more retired scenes of rural life. But in looking back through the shifting scenes of more than a score and half of years, the brightest spots which rise to my view, and those around which memory loves the oftenest and longest to linger, are connected with the green fields and the lofty forests of the country. As a pleasant and fondly cherished dream floats upon my mind, the remembrance of those days, when in company with my young companions,* with all the glee of laughter loving urchins, we bared our feet in the rushing brook, or wandered over the meadows, plucking the yellow butter cup and crimson clover top, or chasing the gandy butterfly, or with dexterous swing of hat, making prisoner of the testy bumble bee as he was quietly revelling upon the rosy thistle blow, or attacking his fortress with all the valor of the knight of La Manche.

* The facilities in this respect, however, are constantly increasing and becoming very abundant in the older States of the Union.

* While penning these lines my heart is pained by the intelligence of the death of one of the most intimate and beloved of those companions, with whom I have passed many, many happy days—Doct. Richard Clarke, Surgeon, United States Army. He, with several other officers, recently died in Florida, in consequence of drinking water into which some dastardly wretch had infused a deadly poison. In the meridian of life, one has thus departed, who was an ornament to his profession, and a solace to his widowed mother and a fond circle of relatives. Peace to thy ashes thou sharer of my boyhood's pastimes! May the wild flowers of the South bloom sweetly over thy distant grave!

and winning laurels of boyish renown and stores of the sweetest plunder. Ambrosial scenes! happy days! they will return no more on earth; but their delightful remembrance will never depart!

"How often have I loitered o'er the green,
Where humble happiness endeared each scene;
How often have I paused on every charm,
The sheltered cot, the cultivated farm,
The never failing brook, the busy mill,
The decent church that crowned the neighboring hill."

In coming to a decision upon the question of residence in the city or country, every consideration upon either side should be maturely weighed. And in this, as in every other case, the clear dictates of judgment and prudence should be followed, rather than the mere promptings of inclination and fancy, when they come into collision with each other.

The subject of emigration from the Old States to the New, is one undoubtedly more or less frequently brought to the consideration of many husbands who read these lines. It is a topic of no inconsiderable importance, and should receive much reflection before any decisive steps are taken in regard to it. That the West presents many advantages for the acquisition of wealth, there can be no doubt; though many who have removed there with high expectations in this respect, are sadly disappointed—and that it holds out inducements to the young man who has no capital with which to commence business but industry, skill and enterprize, is indisputable.—But after acknowledging this, it still is questionable whether, as a general rule, those who remove there are any happier than those who remain in the older States. It should be remembered that the acquisition of riches is not the sole object for which we have been placed in this world, and that wealth is not the only source of happiness. I would that tens of thousands did not act as though the affirmative of these propositions was true—I would that immense multitudes did not seem to be so entirely infatuated with the supposition that to be happy they must be rich. There never was a greater mistake made by man! An enlightened and virtuous mind, and a contented disposition, are the great prerequisites to true happiness. So far as money can conduce to comfort and contentment, it is an auxiliary to happiness. And it is not a secret at this age of the world, (though many act as though it were,) that a very moderate amount of riches is sufficient for this purpose, and that all which is obtained more than this, becomes a source of care, anxiety and unhappiness. Argument is not necessary to show that in the old States of the Union, any individual blessed with health, industry, and good habits, can obtain for himself and family all the comforts of life, and in most cases, secure at least a moderate competency of riches. This is well known to every reader. Why then, should a husband in these circumstances, break asunder all the dear and pleasant associations of his youthful years, leave the society and counsel of those who are interested in his welfare, abandon the conveniences and comforts of civilized life, the advantages of education, religion and morality, and plunge into the forests of the far West? Why should he cause a tender wife, and perhaps a young family who are unused to the hardships of life, to endure the harrassing fatigues of a long journey, and submit for months—not unfrequently for long years—to all those privations of every description, which are necessarily attendant upon the settlement of a wilderness country?* Does he pass through all these difficulties that he may heard up more money? He obtained enough in his former location to afford him every comfort in life, and more wealth will only give him more trouble.—That he may obtain an easier livelihood? If by this is meant, that he can pass a great proportion of his time in idleness, I deny that he will be the happier. Idleness is not easy and pleasant—it is a task, a burthen, a source of inquietude, and the prolific fountain of every species of profligacy and evil! Paradoxical as it may appear, ease and rest, are only to be procured by toil and exhaustion—precisely as the gratification of partaking of food and drink can not be experienced except it is purchased by hunger and thirst.

It is a singularly erroneous supposition, that because the soil of the West is generally highly fertile and productive, therefore it is a better place to obtain a livelihood. A slight glance over the world will satisfy us that the people are not always the happiest where the earth is most bountiful in its productions. As a general rule it is the reverse. In no portion of the globe can a community be found where so large a portion of the inhabitants are prosperous and happy as in New-England. And this state of things is to be attributed in no small degree, to the very sterility of its soil. Where men are compelled to toil assiduously to procure subsistence, they will not only succeed, in all ordinary cases, in securing the comforts of life, but they will establish those habits of industry and perseverance which conduce so essentially to prosperity in all undertakings.—Hence New-Englanders, born and bred under circumstances where the comforts of life can be procured by industry and vigilance, are celebrated throughout the world, for activity, skill, fertility in expedients, and an indomitable perseverance in overcoming all obstructions that impede the successful issue of their plans. Man is so constituted that he must have difficulties to encounter, obstacles to overcome and toils to be endured, before the faculties of his body and mind can become so developed and matured as to afford him all their advantages and enjoyments. Place him in circumstances where necessity does not call for these exertions, and there will be a tendency to idle and dissipated habits, to effeminacy, and low sensuality! Compare the state of society, the arts and sciences, literature and religion, in New-England, with its rock-bound coasts, granite mountains, meagre soil and inhospitable climate, with the same things in the fertile vallies, the vine clad hills, the bland atmosphere and heavenly skies of Italy. Who that values liberty, knowledge and virtue, would not prefer that his children should be brought up under the institutions of the former, rather than those of the latter?—The conclusion is obvious, that a fertile soil and a pleasant climate, are not, by any means, the only thing necessary to prosperity and happiness.

In looking to the West for a change of residence, the husband should take into the account the welfare of his family. Allowing that the change will be highly advantageous in a pecuniary point of view, if it should be injurious to the minds and morals of his children, should he not hesitate? Were he enabled to bestow a fortune upon each of his children at his decease, of what benefit would it be to them if they are unprepared to make a better use of it? Wealth without virtue and intelligence, is a curse rather than a blessing! It is not to be expected that for many years the children in newly settled districts, can enjoy the advantages of schools and religious instruction, which abound in the Middle and Eastern States. This is a consideration of the utmost importance. What can the parent find at the West to compensate his children for these deprivations? Stores of golden treasure and wide spreading domains weigh against them, no more than the dust in the balance. When we add to this deficiency in religious and mental cultivation, the laxity in morals which is invariably to be found on the borders of civilization, and the examples of cupidity, profligacy and crime, to which children in those circumstances must be more or less exposed, the parent who is properly awake to the welfare of his offspring, can not be blind to the dangers in which they would be involved.—The young man who, on entering business life, possesses good habits and sound morality, is blessed with that which is of more worth to him than untold stores of gold.

I make not these remarks to prevent any individual from emigrating to the West, who may feel it his duty to do so; there is, undoubtedly, a large class of cases, where such a step is perfectly justifiable and laudable. My only object is to induce my readers not to act blindly and unadvisedly in a matter so important. I would have them scrutinize the whole subject candidly—look at it in every possible point of view—so that if finally determined to emigrate, they will not, (as thousands have,) on arriving at their place of destination and testing its advantages, awake as from a vision, and when it is too late, regret that any flattering dream could have lured them from the home of their childhood and the scenes of their youth!

It may not, perhaps, be improper to make a few remarks here in regard to the location and structure of dwelling houses. In erecting or renting a tenement, no small attention should be paid to the location. Most people in selecting a dwelling allow themselves to be guided almost entirely by pecuniary considerations. And hence in our crowded cities, families even in competent circumstances will frequently purchase or hire dwellings situated in low, dark and narrow streets, where the Genius of Pestilence would seem to reside—and then wonder, from year to year, why they are so constantly assaulted by painful and long continued diseases. Economy is to be commended in all cases: but health and comfort should never be sacrificed that riches may be hoarded. This would be paying too dearly for that "dross" which can never purchase enjoyment when sickness lays its palsying hand upon the body.

In securing a dwelling-house three things should never be overlooked, viz: health, convenience, and pleasantness. The first, is the all important requisite in life, and its promotion should never be lost sight of. Hence in erecting a residence, avoid placing it in a low, damp location, or in a narrow street or lane, where the light of the sun, or the salubrious air of the heavens, can scarcely penetrate—and if possible to prevent it, never inhabit a build ing in such a location.—Thousands of lives have been lost, by residing in dwellings in moist situations, where the humid exhalations have induced and hurried to a fatal termination, every species of disease. A constant or frequent exposure to dampness from wet cellars, or basements, or any other source, is certain destruction to health, and no care nor pains can be too great to avoid it. As far as it is within the bounds of practicability, select for a residence, a situation which is elevated, dry and airy. Providence in this respect, as in many others, has united utility with benefit and pleasure. No situation for an abode can be more pleasant than a gentle eminence, somewhat isolated from other dwellings, surrounded by well cultivated gardens, and embosomed in thrifty trees. And no place is more conducive to health. The life giving light of the sun beams upon such an abode with the most grateful influence—for light is as essential to the healthy existence of the human frame, as to vegetable bodies. The sweet breezes of heaven draw through it, bearing the very spirit of life and vigor upon their wings—and the surrounding foliage exhales abundantly the most healthful and buoyant constituents of the atmosphere to be breathed. But I can not dwell upon these points, or even enumerate all the advantages to be derived from a judicious selection of a dwelling place.

In closing, I would remark, that in the erection of a dwelling, let much attention be paid to convenience and comfort. It is astonishing how people differ in this respect. While one man is governed entirely by outside show, and pays little attention to interior arrangements—another allows the outside to be a matter of minor importance, and directs his care more exclusively to convenience within. And in most cases, while

* I speak not without experience on this point, having been born in the north-westerly part of New-York, to which my parents emigrated from Connecticut, when that portion of the Empire State, was the wilderness El Dorado of those New Englanders who were seized with "the western fever."

the former is compelled to submit to inconvenience in his family arrangements, on account of an ill-contrived interior arrangement, the dwelling of the latter not only makes a good appearance in its exterior, but he has been careful to have such a construction within, as to secure comfort and enjoyment to himself and all connected with his family. Much might be said with profit upon these topics, but this chapter is already too protracted. I can only add, that in erecting a place of abode, let your motto be convenience before show, and health and comfort before all! In regard to all things connected with the dwelling, the husband should freely consult the wife, and allow her suggestions to have a proper influence upon his decisions. This is more especially important in regard to the interior construction; as from her knowledge and experience she is much more capable of judging respecting convenience, utility and pleasantness, than any other individual connected with the family.

TEACHINGS AND TENDENCIES....NO. IV.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

PRAYER.

The heart of man seems instinctively to acknowledge the existence of some greater Power, who has a regardful feeling for its infirmities, and to whom its interests are ever present. Hence, the universal prevalence of religions and forms of worship, by which, invariably, prayer is considered one of their chiefest essentials.

We have now neither time nor inclination to dwell on the frequent misconceptions of this service, or the common modes of its observance. It is well understood however, that there are denominational peculiarities concerning it, and also that different religionists entertain, as individuals, different views of its nature, design, and importance. But whatever may be the variety and character of these views, it is, we think, hardly necessary to remark, that its strictest propriety remains unquestioned by Christians.

The inculcations of Universalism on this subject are definite and positive. It teaches the necessity and appropriateness of prayer. It esteems the service as being of very high importance. It is imperiously required as a duty. And the duty is standing and continued. It makes unremitting demands upon the attention of the follower of Jesus. Among the specifications of the doctrine concerning its necessary requisites for acceptance, I mention one only—this, viz., that it is to be offered "in faith," and abiding confidence. And we conceive that the Universalist system, in being particularly calculated to superinduce this favorable state of the mind, possesses an important advantage over every other scheme of religious doctrine.

Prayer is the homage the heart pays to its Creator in its inward temple. Its aspirations may, or may not, be embodied into language. They find their way to heaven in silence and solitude. The sincere up liftings of the soul to God are spontaneous and unobtrusive. Street-corners and crowds are not indispensable to their fervor or their acceptance. They wing on in their way upward, in the hush of midnight or at the fervid hour of noon, though the voice be mute and the lips stir not. In the public assembly, expression is given, not as a peculiarly acceptable accompaniment, but for the profit and edification of commingling worshippers. There and then, many a form may bow before the waiting altar and offer up welcomed adoration, though it might be said of only one, "he prayeth."

We are never to forget our wants and weakness. We never can forget them long at a time, carrying within us, as we do, a little world of craving and unsatisfied desires, and ever and anon affected outwardly as we are, by the changeful vicissitudes of an unstable existence. But man is prone to "trust in an arm of flesh." He is prone to look elsewhere than to Heaven for needed aid. He thinks now and then of his own imbecility and perishingness; but when you come to talk of God, he is quite ready to imagine that to be an altogether foreign subject. In his blindness or perversity, although awake and alive to the bustling cares and cheating vanities of earth, his mental eye is, nevertheless, dim and filmed, and he beholds not the unrusting brightness and beauty of things divine and undecaying. He loses an immense share of enjoyment which a different and better state of the heart would not fail to afford him, when its innermost thoughts and anxieties could be laid out, in faith, and hope, and confidence, before a compassionate Father.

The uses of prayer are simple, and yet how important! You can easily understand how the susceptible human mind can be elevated and refined, by holding communion with a great and good Superior. You can conceive how the heart would be lifted heaven-wards, reformed and made holier, by the blessed influence of the spiritual fellowship and intercourse established between the suppliant and his God. Prayer will never subvert the regulations of unerring Wisdom; but it will bring peace, and resignation, and holiness, to the heart that gives forth and heeds its hallowing ministries.

The question now to be asked is—Does the Universalist believer have any encouragements to pray! We know that the doctrine yields the purest joy in believing, but does it make the cup of happiness brim up still higher, in praying? Or, among its roseate sparklings—if we may so speak of things moral—are there mingled the black dregs of doubt and servile fear, to embitter and to poison? Is there a blank and unanswering indefiniteness, or a cold and heart-shocking repulsiveness about the received sentiment, which would make faith a spiritual Pandora box, and prayer an unmeaning mockery? I say nay. The doctrine possesses nothing of vagueness, or of doubt-engendering partiality. It presents God to you in a glorious light. He is ever ready to hear the childs supplications. He delights in doing you good. He is never indifferent to your welfare. Over you, and over all, there are spread out the wings of his love. Your minutest wants are open before him. He knows and does all things well. His wisdom can not err, nor his goodness forsake. To you there may seem a dark mysteriousness in his providential orderings, but you are assured that they are wisely and benevolently directed. Afflictions are masked blessings. And cherishing these views, can you not go to God? Yea, and you will do it. The confiding orisons of your heart will go up before him continually.

Here I wish to remind you of one thing. It is this merely. In beseeching the bestowment of favors, you just pledge your own co-operation in the acquirement of those favors. Indifference or supineness are out of the question. The bare sending of the thoughts to heaven, is only one part of the enjoined duty. Thus, when you pray for holiness of heart, you virtually promise to engage yourselves industriously to the desired acquisition of the great blessing. You are to go about the effecting of the reformation, with an earnestness proportionate to your anxiety for its accomplishment. To ask God for good, and then to manifest any carelessness concerning it, is an inconsistency which our doctrine will never justify or encourage. The prayer, then, for additional mercies is to be followed by the increased improvement of mercies already possessed. Knowledge, talents, time—these, and all other means of promoting our own, or other's good, are to be had in constant and faithful requisition; and while the spirit prays, the heart and the hands are to labor.

Castine, Me.

EDUCATION.—To teach young persons to bear patiently small injuries is a capital branch of education. Nothing tends more effectually to secure them against great injuries.

FRIENDSHIP.

"We take each other by the hand, and we exchange a few words and looks of kindness, and we rejoice together for a few short moments, and then days, months, years intervene—and we see and know nothing of each other."—Washington Irving.

Whose heart hath not echoed the above sentiment! Whose bosom hath not heaved with the conviction of its truth! Who doth not lament it! How impressive the remark, "We take each other by the hand, and we exchange a few words and looks of kindness, and we rejoice together for a few short moments, and then days, months, years, intervene, and we see and know nothing of each other." How often do we meet as friends, enjoy for a few moments its pleasures, then give the parting hand, and be lost forever from remembrance. It is true of the friendship of this world, unless to few we limit the name We occasionly meet and embrace each other we intermingle our joys and sorrows, then anon part—each one returns to his avocation—becomes engrossed in the cares and pursuits of life; selfishness absorbs his generous nature, business crowds thick and heavily upon him, and in the labyrinth of human affairs, he forgets his nearest friends and relatives.

The thought of them may sometimes flit across his mind, but like the electric shock, it is soon over and gone—no trace left of its flight! That we bestow no more time in cultivating the affections, is a fact, deeply to be deplored. In the hurry and bustle of the world, we are apt to forget the pleasure, which flows from the intercourse of our friends. We loose sight of the social tie and travel on in the road of turmoil and strife. Wordly ambition usurps the current of our finer feelings, and converts us into the greedy, selfish, unmindful brute. But in this dark picture, is there no light shade? Yes, there is. There are some who live not only for themselves, but for others. These are they who imagine the world not made expressly for their own use, or for a few, but that their fellows, children of the same heavenly Parent, heirs of the same inheritance, have a right in common with themselves, to the same benefits, the same privileges, the same blessings. They love to see their friends, to cultivate the social bond, to contribute to their mutual welfare. And when by distance or other circumstances they are unable to meet and converse with them, they still regard them as usual—often devote the unperplexed hour to thoughts of the absent, the loved, the departed friend. Happy would it be if all earthly attachments bore the same character. The relation then of friend and brother would be more than nominal. It would be an earnest of that enduring relation, which we are to sustain in that celestial purity and blessedness, whither we are fast hastening—of that inheritance which is "in corruptible, undefiled, and which fadeth no away."

Hosea Ballou, 2d.

Voted, To grant the above request of Br. Ballou.

Voted, unanimously, That the thanks of this Convention be respectfully tendered to Br. Hosea Ballou, 2d, for the able, correct and satisfactory manner in which he has discharged the duties of Standing Clerk of this Convention.

Proceeded to the choice of a Standing Clerk, and elected Br. John M. Austin, of Massachusetts.

W. S. Balch, of the business committee, reported the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That as great reproach has fallen upon the cause of God's impartial grace, in many particular places, and partially upon the cause in general, by different brethren and societies encouraging and giving countenance to individuals claiming to be preachers, of whom they know nothing—this Convention earnestly recommend to all brethren and societies in America, that when a person claiming to be a preacher, comes among them a stranger, they be particular in requiring of him his credentials, whether a letter of fellowship, or letters of recommendation from known clerical brethren before they extend to him their confidence and encouragement.

Voted, That Br. E. H. Chapin, of Virginia, be requested to take a seat in this Convention as an honorary member, there being no representation from that State.

The committee on adjournment reported, recommending Auburn, N. Y., as a suitable place for holding the next session of this Convention, and that the adjournment be to that place. Report accepted.

Voted, To adjourn until half past one o'clock, P. M.

Met agreeably to adjournment.

The following resolutions were introduced by Br. W. S. Balch, Chairman of the Business Committee, and passed.

Resolved, That this Convention affectionately, seriously, and earnestly recommend to young men designing to enter the ministry of reconciliation, to be careful and studious to qualify themselves by a suitable knowledge of the great doctrines of the Gospel, and the duties which may devolve upon them, before they attempt to obtain settlements as preachers, and that the plan suggested to students in the last number of the "Expositor," be recommended to their careful consideration.

Resolved, That it be respectfully recommended to the State Conventions and Associations having power to grant Fellowship and confer Ordination, to consider the propriety of adopting such a system of government as shall allow no preacher to receive Ordination till he has been in Fellowship at least one year, except at the request of a Society over which he may have been invited to settle, and that in case of such request, such application be considered and acted upon by an ordaining council, assembled for that purpose.

Whereas many individuals having letters of Fellowship as Universalist preachers, have neglected all the duties belonging to the ministry—and whereas others, being avowed preachers, have brought reproach upon the cause by improper conduct, and this reproach has been the greater and continued longer, because their cases have not been attended to by the denomination. Therefore,

Resolved, That this Convention earnestly recommends to all the State Conventions and to all the Associations in America, that, if they have not a proper discipline which will reach such cases, they form such discipline and apply it to the evil aforementioned; and if any of them already have such discipline, that they put it into operation, and suffer no wicked conduct in any of their ministers to pass unnoticed and without correction.

Dr. C. Holland introduced a resolution, which, after discussion and amendment, passed as follows:

Whereas the encouragement of the cause of general education is highly important as an auxiliary to the progress of moral and religious truth. Therefore

Resolved, That this Convention take a lively interest in the success and prosperity of the several literary institutions established by the friends of our denomination in the United States.

Adjourned to the close of the afternoon services.

Met according to adjournment.

The Committee to nominate a preacher of the next occasional sermon, reported and recommended the appointment of Br. Kittredge Haven, of Vermont, with power to appoint a substitute.—Report accepted.

Voted, That the cordial thanks of this Council be respectfully tendered to the First Parish in this city, for their truly Christian courtesy and liberality in granting the use of their neat and commodious house of worship to this Convention, for holding its public meetings.

Voted, That our thanks be tendered to our Moderator for the efficient and impartial manner in which he has discharged the duties of the Chair during this session.

JESUS "HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL."—NO. VII.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

We shall on the present occasion, notice but one other particular in the teachings of our Saviour, in confirmation of the truth of our text viz.: his illustrations. "The great mass of these are founded upon what is common and enduring, and they throw upon the subject a light that never fades, or surround it with a glowing atmosphere of interest that never waxes cold." Of this kind are his frequent and abundant allusions to the works of nature. While the sun shall stand in the heavens, and shed forth a flood of light and heat to enliven, cheer, and renovate the face of nature, and its genial influences shall be felt alike by the evil and the good; and while the fertilizing rains, and the gentle and refreshing dews of heaven shall descend with equal espiousness and purity upon the just and the unjust, will they proclaim the impartial love, and unchanging goodness of our Father in heaven, and tell us to be perfect, even as he is perfect, and "be kind to the unthankful and the evil." So long as the sparrow shall wing its flight through the azure skies, and sing his sweet notes of heaven-born melody—so long as the lilly shall grow in the garden, or flourish in the valley, decorated in all the beauty and loveliness of nature's gayest and richest attire—so long has Jesus made them preachers of the providential care and heavenly bounty of our Creator. And then will they tell him to lift unto him the voice of gratitude, and thanksgivings, and praise.

"While the vine shall spread its branches, and shoot forth its leaves and tendrils, and support its graceful clusters" of rich and delicious fruits, "will it tell of Jesus and his disciples, their union with, and dependence upon him, their moral beauty and fertile usefulness," and say, "herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples." So long as the pure and limpid stream shall roll from the mountain side, or pursue its gentle way "through fertile vales and dewy meads"—or while the refreshing breezes of the viewless wind shall sweep over the face of creation, bearing away the incense of earth's sweetest flowers to distant regions and climes unknown—so long will the one tell of the living water that flows unceasing from the well of salvation, and the pure spirituality of the worship due from us to the eternal Spirit, and the other, of the imperceptible, yet effectual, operation of the spirit of God's love in the heart of the true believer, and of the sweet incense of praise which should rise to heaven from the altar of the soul with every morning and evening sacrifice.

But time would fail me to pursue this subject further, and be thus particular. We might trace the perfection of our Saviour's mission through various other circumstances. We might show how he entered the human heart, and called forth its purest and holiest emotions, and taught us to imitate God, who is "good unto all," and imaged forth his love by the affection of a parent for his children, and learned us a lesson of gratitude from the forgiveness of the debtor, and by his own example inspired us with sympathy for the distressed, and thus pleaded for kindness to all the children of our God, and shadowed forth the mercy of infinite Love.

And in every thing should we find enough to admire, and love, and imitate, and still should we be constrained to close as we began—"he hath done all things well."

THE PRUNER.

EXCUSE FOR STOPPING A PAPER.

"Mr. Editor:—Please stop my paper immediately, and oblige Yours, etc."

Well, brother, what is your reason for this step? "Why, Sir, some of the correspondents have taken the liberty of writing on subjects that ought never to be noticed in the public journals; and the Editor has been weak enough to give them room in his paper." Then, brother, you do not believe it best to "prove all things and hold fast that which is good"? "O yes, but I have no patience with these ultra notions, and I deem it a sin for me to support a paper tinctured with the growing heresies of the day."

Now this is only an excuse for bigotry. The Pharisees of old would condescend to hear what they believed; and fire-brained fanatics have long used as good a reason; for the bigot, like the "sluggard is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason."

Has it then, come to this with the believers in universal grace, to issue their bulls, and thunder their anathemas against reason and the light of truth! Then close the avenues of instruction—shackle the free born press—shut the eyes and stop the ears; for bigotry is in our midst, and we, poor, luckless wights, must cringe the knee, and bow the neck to her binding fetters! Tell us, ye Simon Pures—ye little sleek-haired pious Popes, when you intend rearing the inquisition!

Reader: are you in love with that charity that thinketh no evil, with that benevolence and grace that maketh free! If you are you will unite your power in the cause of humanity, and strengthen our hands to strike down this evil branch.

APELLES.

A CARD.

The ministers and members of the Black River Association of Universalists, will please accept the hearty thanks of the undersigned for their kind and substantial tokens of remembrance to a needy brother, manifested during their annual meeting at Washingtonville. "Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God."

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1839.

CONSCIENTIOUSNESS.

The Messrs. Fowlers, in their "Prenology Proved, Illustrated and Applied," pages 133 to 136, declare, 1st, that Conscientiousness does not judge what is right or wrong, but merely arraigns actions and feelings before a tribunal of the other faculties—2d, that it is the judge of sinfulness, and not its executioner; and 3d, that it inflicts punishments on those it condemns as guilty. These declarations are quoted at length in our last paper, and need not, therefore, be repeated in this place. To disprove their negatives, and to prove their affirmatives in regard to the province and operations of Conscientiousness, is my present task. But first, let us inquire how these generally clear sighted and excellent Phrenologists came to maze themselves in such contradictions—for such they appear to me, though they may be able satisfactorily to show that their words will bear a meaning different from what it conveys to my mind.

The moral sentiments are wholly dependent on the intellectual powers for their "light and knowledge"—themselves being blind impulses; and on education for their power and direction. Conscentiousness is the standard in each individual, by which the moral right or wrong of his motives (feelings are included in the term) are decided on. But it can judge only of moral right; and of that, only according to the knowledge it has received through the intellect, and the power and direction given to it by education, (in which term I include all the external circumstances that give character to man). Hence the decisions of Conscientiousness, though correct in regard to the sinfulness of its possessor, is correct or incorrect with regard to the sinfulness of others, only so far as their organization, etc., agrees with that of the person judging. In other words, though a correct judge in regard to the sinful character of the actions of the individual, it will be correct or incorrect in regard to moral good or moral evil in the largest sense, only so far as it is truly enlightened and properly cultivated and directed. But still, enlightened or unenlightened by reason—large or small by nature—properly or improperly cultivated and directed by education, Conscientiousness is the only judge of moral good or moral evil by which each individual can test the sinful character of his own motives and actions.—The intellect judges their wisdom or their folly, and, with the perceptive faculties, their agreement or disagreement with the laws of the material universe—approbativeness judges their conformity with the modes and opinions of others—self-esteem, their worthiness in regard to the person's own character, and so on—but, (I repeat it,) Conscientiousness is the only judge of their moral character. And it appears to me that Messrs. Fowlers, by not keeping these different judgments of the various faculties distinct from the moral province of Conscientiousness—and by confounding individual sinfulness with eternal and universal moral right, have fallen into the confusion and contradictions which their work evinces.

My meaning may, perhaps, be better understood by illustrating my position. The indian believes it his duty to kill his enemy, because the knowledge by which his conscience is enlightened, is derived wholly from the law of overcoming evil by destroying the evil doer; and the entire direction of Conscientiousness has been given to it by the custom of so doing, which prevails around him, and an organization derived from progenitors of such character, and cultivated in accordance with such customs. He kills his enemy. His faculties sit in judgment on the act. His self-esteem deems it performed in a manner worthy of the great character he ascribes to himself—his approbativeness declares it to be according to what all around believe honorable and praiseworthy—his intellect traces effects up to their causes, and compares the means with the end, and follows up the act to its probable beneficial consequences—and all give their verdict of approbation accordingly. But no moral character has yet been ascribed to the action, nor can any be given but by Conscientiousness; and though in this case, its decision would be wrong so far as regards right in the largest sense, yet would it furnish a correct decision in regard to the sinfulness of the individual himself.

Again.—A physician has a patient whom he dearly loves and desires to restore to health. He thinks it can be done by administering an unusual remedy.—He gives the medicine, and it destroys the patient. Approbativeness condemns the act, because it was opposed to the common customs and opinions of the people and the faculty—intellect perceives, too late, that the means were ill adapted to the intended end, and therefore condemns the act as unwise—adhesiveness grieves over it, as depriving it of a loved object—but these are, none of them, decisions as to the moral character of the action. Conscientiousness looks at the motive—finds it morally good and pure—and though the whole would cry out "murder," conscience smiles upon the unfortunate physician. Reverse the physician's motives in the same act, and to the condemnation of all the other faculties, you add the only one that now sustains him by its approbation.

In all these cases I have purposely omitted the other moral sentiments, (which undoubtedly come nearer in action to Conscientiousness than any of the faculties, though they can not take its place, nor perform the functions which belong to it exclusively,) that I might render the argument more simple, and more easy to be understood.

In the same manner, as every faculty (including Conscientiousness) judges, according to its own particular standard, the motives and actions arraigned before it; so does every faculty (including Conscientiousness) act as the executioner of the sentence it pronounces on the criminal, and punishes him precisely in accordance with its sentence. But not to make this article too long, I will defer this part of my subject till another week, when I will consider it in connection with the theological errors of Messrs. Fowlers and Kirkham. A. B. G.

LOOK AT THIS.

I do not wish to set myself up as a judge over those who are more experienced than myself, but so long as I believe as I do, I can not be indifferent to the doings and sayings of my brethren. I shall therefore claim to point out what I think to be wrong, without fear of giving offence. I perceive that Dr. Fay, an Orthodox clergyman of Charles own, who has confessed himself guilty of immoral conduct, has been handled somewhat roughly by some of the Boston, and if I mistake not, Philadelphia secular papers. I stop not to inquire into the propriety or impropriety of this. But I am sorry that Universalist papers should follow them in any case, where abuse or mis-representation does not compel them to do it. If we have been falsely accused, and in defending ourselves it be found that our accusers live in glass houses, we can not help it. We are not to be blamed if the mis.ile which they have hurled at us, results in injury to themselves only. But when an opposer has fallen from the character of a Christian, I do not like to see it harshly trumpeted through all the Universalist papers in the land, when by so doing they act in the offensive, and not in the defensive.

I do not mean to say that all have so done, for some have not yet noticed the circumstance to which we allude; others have noticed it in the spirit of kindness.—But while this is the case, we fear that others have unthinkingly given the opposer an occasion for supposing that they rejoice over the difficulties and misery of a fallen enemy.

These reflections have been occasioned by an article copied into the Evangelist and Watchman, from the Gospel Banner, which article, I fear, is too harsh, not only towards the guilty and therefore unfortunate man, but towards those who were connected with him in his ministerial capacity. An extract or two from the articles in question will show what I mean. Read the following:

"We notice that the ecclesiastical council which investigated his [Dr. Fay's] case, and received his confession of guilt, were disposed to smooth the matter over as much as possible; they have indeed recommended that his request for a dissolution of his connexion with the church be granted, and that he cease preaching, but still they will not say 'their beloved brother in the ministry' is guilty of any criminal conduct."

Well, suppose the members of that ecclesiastical body had seized the offending man, tried him before some holy inquisition, and burned him at the stake, as an example to future offenders; or sent their excommunication and their everlasting curse together, booming over the whole earth; would their Christian spirit have been admired? or would our brethren of the press like them any the better for it? No! they would have censured them much more justly than they do now. For one, I consider it to be, not only the privilege, but the duty, of every ecclesiastical council, to prevent its excommunicated members from vitally injuring the reputation of what they seriously believe to be the true church, as much as is consistent with justice to the offender.

But, if the report of the council as published in the Trumpet of August 31st, be a true one, the extract we have given above is calculated to mislead the reader.—The council did not neglect to pronounce "their beloved brother in the ministry" guilty of criminal conduct nor "to withdraw their fellowship from him." Nor did they precisely use the phrase, "their beloved brother in the ministry." It was, "their once beloved brother," etc. But let the report of the council speak for itself. We give as much as is required for our purpose, from the Trumpet.

"The council deem it their duty to state, that, agreeably to their first resolve, they proceeded to inquire in the most thorough manner into the reports unfavorable to the reputation of Rev Warren Fay..... In regard to one report, his own confession fully proves a degree of criminality which makes it improper that he should be continued in the sacred office. With the most painful emotions, the council, therefore, feel constrained to withdraw their fellowship from him as a minister of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The council would earnestly entreat their once beloved brother in the ministry, first of all to humble himself before God in view of the deplorable cause of this result, and of the injury inflicted by the sin in question upon the interests of truth and righteousness."

This certainly does not look much like smoothing the matter over, or shielding iniquity, or avoiding their duty in any respect. But enough of this. My business is not with Dr. Fay's case, nor with that of his former brethren, nor with the influence which his faith must have had in bringing him where he is; but it is, if possible, to prevent those of more perfect faith, from stepping out of their way, to interfere with matters exclusively belonging to others. I do not like the practice of publishing to the world the faults of religious opposers, when we are not compelled to do so; nor of accompanying them with a string of unjust or of uncharitable imputations. When a man has brought himself down to as degraded and despicable a state as human beings can well be, I do not like to see another travel out of his path, merely to trample him lower. There are those who have been called Universalists, who have proved themselves destitute of our blessed faith by their conduct. If any among us wish to expose, or dilate upon, the faults of apostates, let them begin with these. And let them remember, too, while they do so, how many obstacles they throw in the way of the reformation of the offender, by constantly appealing to the prejudices of an outraged community against him; and then let them act and judge as if they had the golden rule before them. And if the vices of others demand censure, let them be censured, not in connexion with Christianity, but as a private citizen, and a violator of social laws.—Especially let this be done by Universalists, and they will give their opposers less reason for supposing that they triumph over a prostrate and impotent foe.

SECOND LETTER FROM BR. GROSH.

Boston, September 21st, 1839.

Br. BARTLETT:—We have just returned from the U. S. Convention at Portland. We left here last Tuesday evening. The fog was great, and the swell of the ocean, heavy. The boat was very crowded, but owing to the provident care of Br. Bazin, all our company were provided with berths. But, oh, the sea sickness among the passengers—especially females and children—was distressing to them—the others took it as a matter of course. Except a little dizziness, the rolling of the boat did not affect us otherwise than agreeably—made me sleep soundly. We arrived late on Wednesday morning at Portland, and were soon placed in a most agreeable and hospitable home at Br. Leavitt's in Pleasant street. The day was rainy, but a congregation of nearly (if not quite) 2000 persons assembled in the large Unitarian house, (which was kindly offered us for our meeting,) to hear the excellent occasional sermon by Br. John Moore, of New-Hampshire. Other sermons were preached here to audiences as large and larger than this, one by Br. R. O. Williams on Tuesday evening, myself, Thomas, Balch, Father Ballou, S. W. Fuller, Case, of South Carolina, Father Ballou again; and in the Universalist house to a crowded audience by Br. Chapin, on Thursday evening, and by Dr. Clowes, last evening. Conference meetings were held on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday evenings—two on Thursday evening—making eleven sermons by ten different preachers, four Conferences, and besides this the Eucharist and the dedication of a child to God by its parents. All the services excited great, steady and continued interest up to the time of our leaving—and, I doubt not, until the very close. It was truly a glorious time, constantly fervent, and never rising beyond the ability of man to sustain with calm joy.

Of the proceedings of the Convention, and of the Historical society, it is needless to speak, as we shall soon have the official minutes. But every thing was done in harmony and peace, and the Convention adjourned to meet in Auburn, N. Y.—Br. K. Haven, of Vermont, preacher of the occasional sermon. Of course, our western brethren will be able to attend in great numbers, and the New-England brethren are all forming strong resolutions to be present also. So look out for a glorious season in the heart of the Empire State next year. We must contrive to have some glorious meeting in Utica, by securing the service of the brethren on the Monday, Tuesday, Friday and Saturday evenings of that week, as they go to and return from Auburn. Should health permit, some of the Fathers will be there among us.

Our return was in delightful weather, but a considerable swell of the sea was felt, and some were sick.—After remaining on deck till near midnight, looking at the ocean smiling at the bright moon, I retired to rest, and was aroused in time to see a sunrise at sea—the rosy god of day emerging from the waters in a glorious veil of light haze.

I have much—very much to write of affairs in this region, but have not now either room or time—some of the subjects, also, will do better for separate articles—and some better for private conversation—particularly the gratitude awakened in our souls by the kindness of numerous brethren and sisters—that is a subject that can not be expressed in words, and appears too sacred to be told to uninterested, perhaps coldly reading readers.—So, farewell till we see you again, when I will finish my journal. A. B. GROSH.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The next term of this institution will commence on the second Monday in October next. It is desirable that the students who design to avail themselves of this opportunity should be in attendance as early as possible.

FAITH IN CHRIST NECESSARY.

I was never more impressed with the necessity of faith in Christ, than during one of the scenes of distress which the minister of Christ is so often called to witness. A young man was sinking to the grave with consumption, in the prime of life. His moral character was good; in all the ordinary intercourse of life, his conduct was unimpeachable. But, as it regards Christianity, he knew nothing. His parents had neglected to direct his mind to religious subjects in youth, and when he grew up, there was a lethargy of feeling, which prevented him from inquiring "what is truth?" So that concerning the great and sublime theme of the resurrection from the dead, and the reconciliation of the world, he was as ignorant as an unborn babe. Yet, he was prostrated on a bed of death in all his ignorance and want of faith, without the power which can rob death of its sting, and the grave of its victory. And it was evident to me, that his virtues alone, did not confer all that was necessary to smooth the pillow of dissolution.

With the usual flatterings of consumption, he expected to get well until the afternoon before his death, when he was seized with such feelings as filled him with fear. Never shall I forget his supplicating look, as he rose wildly in bed, with the exclamation, "oh, I can not die—let me live—save me, oh, save me! Call the doctor—tell him to do something for me. Oh, save me, save me!" Such fear was exhibited, and such abject dread of the mere article of death was shown by him, that I could not avoid thinking that a well grounded faith in the resurrection is indispensably necessary, in addition to a virtuous life, to secure a triumphant close of our earthly pilgrimage. And, if that young man had been blessed with such a faith, instead of the fear which wrung his heart with agony, he would have rejoiced that the hour of his departure had come, when he would be with Christ. The whole circumstance induced in me the prayer, that though my friends might leave me, though my name might be slandered, though abject poverty might claim me for its own, though sickness might touch my bone and my flesh, yet give me faith in the resurrection and give me hope of reaching that world where all shall be made happy, and I am rich indeed; for then, I can dare the monster and fall asleep in the triumphant faith of a world's reconciliation.

G. W. M.

CHRISTIANITY NECESSARY TO CONSOLE IN AFFLICTION.

It has long been my thorough conviction, that there is no system on earth so well calculated to enable us to bear up with courage against the ills to which human life is incident, as Christianity. And it is also my thorough conviction, that however poor an individual may be, however beset with sorrows, pains and reverses, Christianity will give him a power to meet them cheerfully and with resignation. And the facts which I have met in the course of my ministry, have served to strengthen this conviction. The following incident in proof will not, I trust, be uninteresting.

A few years since I received an anonymous note, stating that a family in a certain part of our village, was a fit object of Samaritan charity. On visiting the house, I found it a comfortless place, with the chill winds of winter whistling and howling through it, rendering it cold and dreary. In the cradle was a child about two years of age, rocked by another about four years of age. Their pale, sharp features, matted hair, and dirty dresses, told of poverty and neglect, and showed that the vices of the parents had fallen upon the constitution of their children. As I gazed upon those children, the thought came into my mind, that if they had been born in higher life, where the kindness of maternal love, the influence of the comforts of existence, and ardent attention, had been thrown around them, perchance they might have bloomed as the loveliest and most sprightly of children. But it was their lot to be born in poverty and misfortune, to die early, or else to grow up in vice and then to go down to a grave of infamy. Poor babes! God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb.

On the bed was a miserable object—a female, the mother of the two children—most horribly burned on many parts of her body. Her clothes caught fire a few days previous, and before the fire was checked, her doom was sealed. It must have been dreadful; for the child said, "Oh! how mother did scream." The physician, a warm friend and a talented man, who is often found in such scenes of sorrow, was dressing her wounds when I entered. And he remarked to me, that twenty-four hours after she was burned, she was confined; and it surpassed, in frightful horror, all the scenes of distress and woe he had ever witnessed. During the dressing of her wounds, she manifested the most pevish fretfulness and discontent that could possibly be. Nothing went right—every thing was wrong. And when asked to be more patient and resigned to her misfortune, she seemed to upbraid Deity with her situation. As I looked upon that woman—heard her repinings and even angry words—I could not help believing, that if she had been exercised with a well grounded faith in Christianity, her conduct would have been entirely different from what it was—she would have been resigned to her poverty and distressed condition, and have said in patient reliance upon God, "thy will, not mine, be done." But without this faith, she was not only afflicted by physical pains, but her mind and every thing connected with it, was a source of pure moral misery to her.

Oh! how different was the case of a young physician, who, in the prime of his days, was sent to his grave by consumption. Though he knew that he must early bid farewell to all the beautiful things of nature; that he must be separated from friends and loved ones; that all hopes of success and honor must be given up, yet he was free from repining. His mind was fixed in the Restitution, as immoveable as the hills. He saw the time hastening onwards, when all tears would be wiped away, all sin finished and a world redeemed; and it gave him strength to meet his own death with courage. He calmly arranged his affairs; had his gravestones cut, and graveclothes made; and in every thing "put his house in order," that he might die. And how joyfully did he dwell on the riches of his faith to the opposer who attempted to shake his confidence in it. It was a solemn thing to see that pale young man, with the damps of death gathering on his brow, in raptures with the views which his faith gave him, and eloquently describing the glory of another and better world. It proved to me, that Christianity, and Christianity alone, could prepare man for death, and enable him to do the battle like a good soldier. And while the first instance taught me, that without faith in Christ, an individual is wholly unprepared to meet the evils of life, the last instance taught me to pray, "let me die the death of the righteous, and my last end be like his." G. W. M.

ENVY.

If there is any thing that looks most unbecoming to one who has named the name of Christ, and covenanted to depart from iniquity, and in which mankind are, perhaps, most liable to err, it is that of indulging in a sort of petty jealousy towards those whom we imagine more fortunate than ourselves. If we attempt to trace this failing to its source, we shall easily discover where we overstep the bounds of propriety. As an impulse to energy and perseverance, the human mind is so constituted as to be continually struggling to better its condition. Though men may err as to the best course of promoting this desirable end, and though their minds may be imbued with every degree of justifiable contentment, still their happiness is an all absorbing object, and as often as they find an opening for advancement, or seriously contemplate the "ills that flesh is heir to," they can not but aspire to something unattained.

All this is proper and right. But it needs but one step to take us into the field of jealousy, and then we are subject to a thousand ills that were before unfelt.—We forget the great law of love to our neighbor, and our efforts are that moment prompted by a spirit of selfishness, and an envious desire to grasp at the prosperity of another, though he be trampled beneath our feet in the act. And these feelings are the more dangerous, because they are apt to be indulged unconsciously. It may be an easy matter for an individual in this situation to persuade himself that he is actuated only by a laudable desire for his own happiness. And if this is not quite enough to make the matter appear right, he can imagine that thousands are enjoying blessings that they would be better without, to the exclusion of himself, who not only needs but deserves them.

But how often does this spirit of envy lead man to feel unkind towards those who have merited all they enjoy, when he has no intention to reach it by proving himself worthy? Could such a one have all the honor and fame of a hero, he would not travel one moment in the road to true fame for it. And could he have preceded his neighbor in his own way, he would have found that the happiness which he now envies was nothing, and less than nothing in his possession. An incident in the life of Themistocles illustrates this subject very prettily. A person who had a very exalted opinion of his own performances, took occasion to boast of them to the ancient statesman and hero, in a manner which showed that he was envious of the greatness of his superiors. As a reproof upon his ambition, Themistocles relates the following fable: "There once happened a dispute between the feast day and the day after the feast. Says the day after the feast, I am full of bustle and trouble, when as with you, folks enjoy at their ease every thing ready provided. You say right says the feast day, but if I had not been before you, you would not have been at all." It is very much so with those who envy the happiness of others. If it had not been enjoyed before them, they would have had no knowledge, no idea of it.

The only remedy I can offer for this anti-religious spirit is the genuine influence of Christianity. It is to love ones neighbor as himself. In the exercise of this virtue, and bearing in mind the relationship which God has established between man and man, we shall be able to rejoice in the prosperity of others, though we may be compelled to gaze on them far above us. There is no truth more evident than that we ought to rejoice with those who truly and substantially rejoice. It is the only way by which we can be personally benefitted by the happiness of others. If while they are rejoicing, we look on with an envious eye, we are aliens from the common good—if we rejoice with them, and even aid them, we make their happiness our own.

PROSPECTS OF HAPPINESS.

Our lives are but a transient dream,
A bubble on time's narrow stream,
That passes like the noon-tide beam,
Forever from our view.
When those we love are called away,
From earthly scenes to endless day,
Then faith and hope shall whisp'ring say,
Friends shall their love renew.

"When earthly scenes" shall be no more,
And we have passed the cold stream o'er,
And all have met to part no more,
From sin and sorrow free,
The ransomed round Jehovah's throne,
Angel and seraph—all shall own
God all in all, his praise make known
Through all eternity. COLA.

STANZAS.

BY MRS. ELLET.

Wouldst thou know wherefore the dull crowding cares,
And envious strifes, and ills of this sad world,
Vex not my thoughts serene,
Nor fright my peace of soul?

Wherefore its fierce commotions fret me not,
And the vain pageants of its Summer smile,
(More fleeting than the light,)
Nor dazzle nor distract?

It is not that a swelling pride doth lift
My spirit 'bove the reach of changeful fate,
Or shield me from the ills
To mortal lot assigned;

Or teach me with a scorn unwise to turn
From good on all bestowed—the boon of Heaven:
'Tis not that spells I bear
By stern cold Reason wrought:

But in my spirit's inmost treasure-house
There is a blessed world from evil free;
No wearying ills come nigh
The chambers of the soul!

In that fair home hath Thought her palace reared,
And planted living flowers: there flow the springs
Of Fancy, pure and bright,
In aye rejoicing streams.

There bends the azure heaven of Poesy,
With golden sunlight fraught; there airs divine
Breathe o'er the living soil,
And palmy groves ascend!

Thus is it that Life's clamors and complaints,
And idle vaunts, unheeded pass me by,
Like the dull streamlet's voice,
Or inarticulate wind.

Amid the jarring storm's discordant strife,
Oh, searcher after rest! may'st thou, too, hear
The mightier melody
From chords attuned of Heaven!

FALSE PRIDE.

It has always been a matter of surprise with me, that false pride could not be made, like theft, a criminal offence. It is the partner of about as many crimes as any other vice—for such I hold it to be—at least some description of it. It is much to be pitied, and generally leads to impropriety. How many honest men have been made scoundrels by the false pride of a foolish wife, and extravagant family. It is a compound of ignorance, deception and envy, and the world is full of it. So long as it operates upon individuals alone, it is a matter of trifling consideration, but strange as it may appear, its influence strikes at the very root of a virtuous and flourishing community.

Does the successful merchant make his son a mechanic? Very seldom. Does the professional man make his son a mechanic? More still. But does not the more fortunate mechanic make his son the guardian of cloths and calicoes? Why is this? Is the yardstick more honorable than the jack-plane?—the goose quill more dignified than the type? But unfortunately, the absurdity runs farther! Look back thirty or forty years, and behold the barefooted adventurer at the present time rolling in wealth, or spending his annual income of some three thousand dollars per annum in manufacturing ladies of his daughters. Does he teach them the usual rudiments of housewifery? Very rarely. Is it because the healthful exercises of domestic duties is disgraceful? Oh no! false pride says "it is ungenteel for ladies to work"—as it would tarnish the fair hands and fingers that bring such sweet sounds from the piano, to dust the glorious instrument itself.

How extremely ridiculous is this illegitimate pride? Thousands of daughters, whose mothers have been raised in a kitchen, and their fathers in a horse stable, would feel insulted if asked if they had ever made a loaf of bread, or washed out a handkerchief! They would more likely prate about "good society," "mixed company," and the dignity of their ancestors! A few years more roll round, and the thrifty and imprudent parents die, and then comes the scramble, often to twelve divisions of his hard earned estate. How small does a large fortune appear when apportioned to numerous heirs. The daughters must marry gentlemen, for pride dictates it, and gentlemen of course, must squander their patrimony. And what has the parent bequeathed to society and his country? Children raised in idleness, without the stimulant to add one iota to the general substantial prosperity of the community.

ONE'S MOTHER.

Around the idea of one's mother the mind of man clings with fond affection. It is the first dear thought stamped upon our infant hearts, when yet soft and capable of receiving the most profound impressions, and all the after feelings are more or less light in comparison. Our passions and our wilfulness may lead us far from the object of our filial love; we may become wild, headstrong, and angry at her counsels or opposition; but when death has stilled her monitory voice, and nothing but calm memory remains to recapitulate her virtues and good deeds, affection, like a flower beaten to the ground by a rude storm, raises up her head and smiles amidst her tears. Round that idea, as we have said, the mind clings with fond affection; and even when the earlier period of our loss forces memory to be silent, fancy takes the place of remembrance, and twines the image of our departed parent with a garland of graces, and beauties, and virtues, which we doubt not that she possessed.

Dean Swift says—"It is with little souled people as it is with narrow necked bottles, the less they have in them the more noise they make in pouring out."

Committee of One.—It is proposed in a Boston paper, that every man should constitute himself into a self-examining committee, to inquire into his own conduct.—It is believed that the business each committee would have to transact, would keep it constantly and usefully employed.

A GOOD ONE.—A gentleman recently lodged at a hotel somewhere in the Middle States, and in the morning was observed looking among a quantity of newly cleaned boots, in seach of his own.

"What kind of boots was your boots, Sir?" inquired Billy.

"Quite new ones: have you seen them?"

"New ones! why lor bless you Sir, the new boots be all gone an hour ago."

He that wrestles with a chimney sweep is sure to get besmutted, whether he falls over or under.

Old men more willingly talk of age than hear others talk of it; and neither fool nor philosopher likes to think of the time when he shall talk no longer.

DEATHS.

In Schuyler, Herkimer county, September 25th, Mr. PAUL PRATT, aged 82 years and 11 months.

In Troy, on Sunday morning, September 1st, 1839, HORATIO PHELPS PRIME, of the firm of Fitch and Prime, aged 33 years, 7 months and 2 days.

On Monday morning, August 26th, he was attacked with a bowel complaint, so violently, that the best of care and medical attendance proved unavailing. He became sensible of his danger as early as Tuesday the 27th, and expressed then, and subsequently, an entire resignation to the will of Providence; but desired that all might be done for his recovery, which was possible, on account of his family, his children being yet young. He continued clear in the exercise of his reason, till the evening before his death.

Mr. Prime was a firm and consistent believer in the doctrine of universal grace, and a member and ornament of the Universalist Society in Troy. With him, this sentiment was not a mere matter of speculation and disputation; he felt and loved and lived the doctrine. Nor was he less esteemed by the community in general, than by those of his own peculiar faith. He had no sympathy with that acrimonious spirit which engenders animosity between Christians of adverse views: but sought and cherished that mutual good feeling in social intercourse, which is seldom unreciprocated in an enlightened community.

Carrying out the principle of the final elevation of all moral intelligences to holiness and bliss, he delighted in befriending the unfortunate, and raising up the degraded. As a Trustee of the Troy Orphan Asylum, Vice President of the Troy City Temperance Society, and Superintendent of the Troy Universalist Sabbath School, he had commenced a career of active usefulness which gave high promise to community; and which a wise Providence has seen fit thus early to terminate. Aside from his public capacities, as a husband, a father, a neighbor, and a citizen,

"None knew him but to love him,
Or named him but to praise."

But the brightest feature in his character, was an amiable simplicity—a noiseless unassumingness, which sweetened his deportment, and heightened all his virtues. No man sought attention or promotion less than he. It was often remarked, by those who knew him best, while living, that his value was not fully appreciated. His friends have now discovered their error. He enjoyed a silent esteem, which was more congenial with his taste and habits than loud encomium. Many have remarked that they were not sensible, till since his death, how much they really esteemed him. Never has the writer known the death of a man, so unpretending, occasion so deep and general sympathy.

When the Sabbath School assembled for their usual exercises, a few hours after his death, the announcement of the event was almost overwhelming. Both scholars and teachers seemed to feel as if they had lost a father. The Sunday previous he was with them.

His funeral was attended on Tuesday, the 3d ult., at 10 o'clock, A. M., from the Universalist church, which was entirely filled. The Masonic institution, fire companies, Universalist Sabbath School, and the larger children from the Orphan Asylum, with a large circle of friends and acquaintances being in attendance. A discourse was delivered by the writer from Isa. xxxviii: 1. The Masonic service was performed at the grave, Rev. W. F. Walker, Rector of Christ church, reading the Masonic prayer.

He has left an affectionate companion and two children, to feel their loss. But we trust the consolations of religion will sustain them; and they have the nearest sympathies of his partner in business, Mr. Fitch and his family, with whom he had lived in the greatest harmony and mutual esteem, for the last twelve years. May they all find comfort in the faith he cherished, and which sustained him to the end.—Union. L. C. B.

Very suddenly, in Hastings, September 1st, Mrs. GILSON, consort of Mr. Luther Gilson, aged 28 years. By this afflicting dispensation of Providence, Br. G. has been deprived of an amiable wife, four children of an affectionate and tender mother, and society of one of its brightest ornaments. Proofs of a universal resurrection to immortality and eternal life, were presented to a numerous and sympathising congregation by the writer. C. B. BROWN.

In Darien, Georgia, on the 2d ult., Capt. JOSEPH W. ALLEN, aged about 35 years, and formerly a resident of Auburn, N. Y.

Preached in the Universalist church in Rochester, in the afternoon of September 22d, 1839.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

"O thou of little faith; wherefore didst thou doubt?"—MATT. xiv: 31.

Faith, in its true religious sense, lies at the very foundation of every Christian duty, performance and enjoyment. And notwithstanding the many amiable and virtuous traits of human character, which may, and often do, distinguish those who exercise little or no faith in revealed religion, still, such persons, not acting under the guidance of the great and glorious principles of Divine confidence, and humble reliance upon the assurances embraced in the Gospel of the grace of God, can not participate of those exalted hopes and joys, which constitute the moral inheritance and life of those who act under the refining and elevating influence of the faith of Christianity. I know it is said that "a good man is a good man, whether a believer in Christianity or otherwise—that he is just as worthy, and useful, and happy a member of society, who rejects all revealed religion, as he who has ever so much faith, provided he is honest, virtuous and benevolent in his intercourse with the world." But, notwithstanding I admire the character of the morally good man, whatever may be his opinions of the Christian religion, I can not subscribe to the above sentiment. I am willing to admit the correctness of the conclusion, however, so far as the secular and social obligations, and courtesies of human life are concerned. If a man does me an important favor, it is not for me to inquire whether he is a believer or an infidel, with a view to determine what degree of gratitude I am bound to feel and manifest; the favor is just as valuable, and merits from me just as great a degree of gratitude and love, coming from an *un*believer, as though it came from a believer. And so the subject should be considered, as it stands connected with all the secular, and social, and relative duties of the present life.

And I cheerfully concede to the correctness of the foregoing conclusion still further. I will admit that the man who rejects all religious faith, but lives up to the standard of strict morality, is in a good degree a happy man. He enjoys the pleasant and profitable fruit of his upright conduct, and escapes the fearful apprehensions and gloomy horrors that are the never-failing attendants on vice and folly. But, after all, he does not enjoy that genuine kind, and full degree of heart-felt satisfaction that fall to the lot of the faithful disciple of the Redeemer.

FAITH is not, strictly speaking, relative and social, but personal and individual, both in its existence and immediate effects. Therefore, none but those who have the true Gospel faith can know any thing of its elevating operations, or its happifying effects upon the mind and affections. There is but little difficulty in determining, by association with, and a close examination into the social conduct of, an individual, whether he be a moral man or the reverse. But the closest examination in this way, even in all the various relations of life, will not enable you to decide with certainty whether he is possessed of the faith of Christ, or is destitute of it. In fact, two men may pursue a course of moral conduct that is precisely the same to all visible appearance, and yet, one being a well instructed believer, and the other an unbeliever, their personal and individual conditions will be widely different, so far as moral enjoyment is considered.

I frankly confess, that good works without faith, are far preferable to faith without good works, be that faith ever so consistent and strong. But I feel justified, not only by the principles of reason, but by revelation also, in affirming, that the Christian faith, exemplified by a uniform course of virtuous and upright conduct, imparts to the soul of man a far greater degree of real, substantial personal enjoyment than all the abstract morality in the whole world is capable of securing. The skeptic, though morally speaking, the best of men, knows, to be sure, that he lives to-day, but imagines that he may be annihilated to-morrow. He feels that his good deeds are beneficial to himself and to his fellow-beings, and he obtains his reward in the approbation of conscience. But his enjoyment is not of that deep, and abiding, and refined character, nor does it partake of that spiritual, and comforting, and elevating nature, of the enjoyment experienced by the true practical believer. His mental operations are confined to the earth and earthly things, and all beyond is dark, and gloomy, and forbidding. But this is by no means the case with the faithful disciple of our Saviour; he looks away from the earth, and up to heaven where his divine Father, Benefactor and Redeemer dwells; and as he contemplates the Divine perfections, purposes and designs, brought to view in the Gospel, his reconciled soul expands with gratitude, joy and holy rapture, and he can say in confident assurance, "Though the earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

But I am extending my introductory remarks to an unnecessary length, and will therefore come now to a more particular consideration of the text selected for our mutual improvement.

During the personal ministry of our Lord, on a certain occasion, he made use of his miraculous powers, in feeding five thousand of his famishing followers, who had assembled around him in the desert, upon five loaves and two fishes; after which he constrained his disciples to get into a ship, and go before him to the other side of the lake, while he sent the multitude away.—After he had fulfilled his benevolent design, he went alone on to the silent mountain to spend a short time in holy communion with his Father above; and when the evening was come, he was there alone. But the vessel containing his disciples, was now in the middle of the lake, and the winds being contrary, the rude waves were foaming, and dashing, and tossing the ship in the most fearful manner. And in the fourth watch of the night, Jesus went unto them walking upon the raging element. At this astonishing sight they were troubled, being educationally superstitious and fearful, and cried out, "It is a spirit." But immediately Jesus addressed them, saying, "Be of good cheer; it is I, be not afraid." Now Peter, professing great confidence in his divine Master, said to him, "If it be thou, bid me to come unto thee upon the water." Jesus says unto him "come." Upon this Peter descended from the ship and attempted to walk upon the water to Jesus. But, on seeing the lake extremely boisterous, he began to be afraid; and beginning to sink, he cried out saying, "Lord save me!" Upon this, Jesus, ever ready to extend the hand of relief to doubting, and suffering, and sinful humanity, "stretched forth his hand and caught" Peter, and then addressed him in the admonitory language of our text; "O thou of little faith; wherefore didst thou doubt?"

My friendly hearers, doubts, and fears, and unfavorable apprehensions, have ever characterized human nature, under all the various circumstances of conscious and active existence; especially has this ever been the case with the great mass of the religious professors. And this will remain the case in a greater or lesser degree, till "faith is lost in sight, and hope ends in fruition." For, what is positively known, is not an object of faith; what is not positively known, and is yet a truth, is an object of faith; and so far as religious truth is concerned, is a worthy and important object of faith. But faith being the ground or confidence of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen, falls short of that positive knowledge which forbids the intrusion of doubt, and uncertainty and fear. "We walk by faith," says the apostle. Hence, where sight and knowledge can not penetrate, faith kindly steps in as a light to our path and a lamp to our feet—as a safeguard against those gloomy contemplations and fearful apprehensions which unenlightened and unbelieving souls are ever subject to.

It has undoubtedly been noticed by the observing hearer, that the sinking of Peter was the consequence resulting from his doubts relative to the ability and the disposition of Jesus to sustain him in his attempt to walk on the surface of the water, in obedience to his command. And it is obvious that Peter's doubts and fears originated from the want of a proper degree of faith in the power of the Son of God. Hence, on taking him by the hand, Jesus says to him, "O thou of little faith; wherefore didst thou doubt?" It was impossible for Peter to know positively that Jesus possessed the power and the will to uphold him in his daring attempt to walk upon the surface of the raging element. But if he had possessed and exercised that degree of faith and confidence in his Master, which an intimate acquaintance with his sublime teachings, and benevolent examples, and merciful miracles, so fully warranted, he would not have been seen sinking in despair, nor heard calling out in the agonies of alarm, "Lord save me;" but he would have walked cheerfully on in obedience to his Lord's command, fearing no evil, and apprehending no dangerous disaster.

From the foregoing circumstances which gave rise to the gentle rebuke of Jesus, contained in the text, and from the remarks that have been offered, you will all perceive the great necessity and utility of full faith in Christ as a complete Saviour; and on the other hand, the horrible consequences of a want, or absence, or decline, of such faith and confidence. We will therefore proceed now, to an illustration of the blessings of such faith, and also of the miseries resulting from the want of it.

1. We are to speak of the blessings of a true and full faith in Christ as a perfect and impartial Saviour of sinners.

The physical, mental and moral organization, condition, and standing of mankind in this inconstant state of existence, render us liable every moment to a variety of temporary evils, and trying calamities, from the grasp of which it is impossible wholly to escape. The boisterous winds of disappointment and adversity are frequently blowing a tremendous gale upon the sea of human life; while the raging waves of temptation, and sin and sorrow—of disease, and pain, and death, are rolling mountain high from shore to shore. Every earthly prospect is constantly liable to blight and destruction, from the physical and social changes that every returning day exhibits. Every thing which relates particularly to the temporal existence of man, must be contemplated by the reflecting mind as transitory and uncertain; and therefore, the man who is destitute of a sound and living faith in the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Supreme Being, is left in a situation very much resembling that of despairing Peter, when Jesus reached forth his compassionate hand and saved him from sinking in a watery grave.

Are there any present who entertain doubts of the existence of a Supreme Being, who wisely and graciously directs all things in a manner to effect the best, the immortal good of all his dependent children? If so, to them I would affectionately say, in the language of my text, "O thou of little faith; wherefore dost thou doubt?" Do you not discover enough in the astonishing mechanism of physical nature, fully to warrant you in believing that such an Almighty Architect must have been the author? And when you contemplate the mysterious operations of the human mind, the elevation and improvement of which it is capable—the benevolence clearly exhibited in the structure, connection, harmony, utility, adaptation and combination of all the respective parts of which the mighty universe is composed, are you not constrained to cry out with the pious and devotional Psalmist, "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy work; day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world." Yes, and further—"I meditate on all thy works; I muse on the work of thy hands. Thou art good unto all, and thy tender mercies are over all thy works?"

I really feel that I am addressing candid, and reflecting persons, and I am therefore confident that my remarks will be fully understood, and and properly appreciated and remembered. I proceed then to observe, that such a Creator and beneficent Benefactor, is the Father of Jesus, in whom, as Mediator and Saviour, we are morally and religiously bound to believe and implicitly trust.

But there may be those present, who believe in a Supreme Creator and Administrator, but have no faith in the reputed Saviour of the world. If so, to them I would affectionately say, examine the pretensions of Christ, and then carefully peruse the faithful history of his life and actions. When this is done, institute a faithful comparison between his pretensions and his conduct, and then, if you are not convinced of the fact, that he was the Son and Sent of God; the true Mediator between God and men; the moral light and life of the world, it would be perfectly proper to inquire of you in the language of the text—"O thou of little faith; wherefore didst thou doubt?" His pretensions were, that he was the Son of God, and at the same time, the Son of man—that God was with him, sustaining him in the labors and toils of his mission—that he was the compassionate friend and Saviour of sinners, and came to exemplify the impartial love of God to the ignorant and misguided children of men—that the Father had given all things into his hands, that he might reconcile, purify, and save from sin and suffering, all that the Father gave him—that he would never relinquish the merciful object of his mission, till the last wretched prodigal was brought home to the bosom and table of the universal Parent. These were his pretensions. What were the traits of character exhibited by him? He was humble, unassuming, meek and lowly, free from enmity and ill-will; while the principles of unbounded love and compassion dwelt in his soul, and characterized every event of his useful life. These divine virtues shone conspicuously, and in all their sublime radiance, in his every word and act. The poor, the despised and the sorrowful, were the particular objects of his attention and sympathy. Every miracle was a miracle of mercy, every motion was an evidence of sincerity, every word was fraught with forgiveness and love, and every breath was scented with the refreshing fragrance of heavenly purity, grace and affection.

The foregoing facts relative to Jesus Christ, challenge contradiction, and stand forth to the mind of every candid and well informed person, as so many incontrovertible evidences, in confirmation of the repeated declaration, that Christ is "the Saviour of the world"—the sure pledge of God's immutable love to mankind, and his eternal purpose to crown man universally with the bright and imperishable robe of immortal perfection, bliss and glory! They seem to have no room for doubt or cavil, in relation to the ability, and the disposition of Jesus of Nazareth, to transform the human mind and character, to enlighten the human soul, strengthen the wavering confidence, confirm the languishing hope, purify the defective motives and affections, and render the individual whose faith is unwavering, virtuous and happy through life and in death.

We can not but marvel, on perusing the circumstances connected with our text, and finding that Peter, who had so long associated with the Saviour, listened to his wise and gracious precepts, witnessed his many benevolent acts—particularly the miracle so recently wrought, in feeding five thousand in the desert on five loaves and two fishes—should, notwithstanding all this, be filled with doubts and fears, relative to the propriety of executing the command of coming to Jesus upon the water, or to his Master's ability and disposition to sustain him in so doing. But we have equally as good reason to be astonished in view of the skepticism of thousands in our own times, who read the sacred history of the birth, life, sufferings, death and resurrection of the Son of God, pretending to believe in the truth of what they read, and are therefore acquainted with the benevolent object and design of his mission; and who, after all, begin to sink in the troubled waters of doubt, and fear, and despair, in relation to the accomplishment of the important work he has undertaken.

It may be objected, that we have not enjoyed a personal acquaintance with the blessed Saviour, nor heard directly from his immaculate lips the truths of heaven, nor witnessed with our own eyes the miracles of mercy wrought by him. All this is true; and so far it may be supposed that Peter was more blameworthy for his want of faith and confidence than we are. But we should remember that we are not required, as an evidence of our faith, to walk on the surface of a toisterous sea. The requirements which Christ imposes upon us, are perfectly consistent with the amount of evidence with which we are presented. And as that evidence comes to us in the ordinary way of authentic history, nothing but ordinary evidences of our faith are required—such as walking in the true spirit of the Gospel, trusting in the rational truths of revelation, and enjoying the rich assurances of divine grace and universal salvation from sin, suffering, and all permanent and positive evil.

Jehovah says, (Gen. iii: 15,) that the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head. And it is universally admitted that Christ is intended by the seed of the woman; and whether it be a personal devil, a spirit of opposition to truth and righteousnss, or moral evil in the aggregate, that is intended by the term serpent, makes no difference so long as Christ is to effect that destruction of the serpent which is represented by bruising his head, the seat of life. Here, my respected hearers, is a never-failing source of gratitude and joy to the faithful believer in the divine Word.—St. Paul's joy was beyond description, when he dwelt upon this inspiring theme in his letter to his doubting Hebrew brethren. He says of that Saviour of whom we are speaking, "As the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself, likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them, who, through fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage." We here learn, that the serpent, devil, or whatever it may be called, of which so much fearful talk is uttered, and of the endless existence of which, so many appear to be positively sure, is to be utterly destroyed. Hearer, do you believe this? If you do, and exercise the faith which works by love, your peace will no more be disturbed by frightful descriptions of the devil's reign and success, world without end. You can look up to God with a heart full of gratitude, and anticipate the approaching day, when holiness shall triumph over all iniquity, happiness over misery, and joy immortal over sorrow and tears. But if you do not exercise this faith in God's word and promise, I will only repeat to you the language of Jesus—"O thou of little faith; wherefore dost thou doubt?" and leave you to reflect.

Again—God hath said, that Christ shall reconcile all things to him, by the blood of the cross, and raise all mankind from corruption to incorruption—from dishonor to glory, and from mortality to immortality. Do you believe this? and that "the counsel of God shall stand," and all his pleasure be thus fulfilled? If so, happy and joyful is your condition. You can even walk through the valley and shadow of death, fearing no evil, and harboring no intruding doubts. But if you have not this faith, if you will not believe the record God gives of his Son, I have no disposition to abuse you, nor deal out upon you denunciations of human or Divine wrath; but will only inquire earnestly of you, what reason you have to question the veracity of Heaven? "O thou of little faith; wherefore dost thou doubt?"

Through the instrumentality of St. Paul, we are kindly assured that all shall be made alive in Christ, death the last enemy be destroyed, sin deprived of its existence, death of its sting, and the grave of its victory; that Christ shall deliver up his reconciled kingdom to his Father, and God become all in all, world without end. O, my hearers, what possible assurance, fully revealed, could fill the soul with a greater degree of peace, and holy rapture, than this? He who enjoys it, can encounter the trying ills of life, not only with patience and resignation, but also with joy, knowing that tribulation worketh patience, experience and hope.

2. We must offer a few remarks on the miseries of unbelief, and then close our present labors.

Reason teaches us to judge of things by comparison and contrast. We have hinted at some of the blessings of true faith; and now, by noticing a few of the consequences of unbelief, we shall be able to perceive in some measure, the difference; and seeing the difference, it is fondly hoped that the prolific cause of much moral misery, will be overcome and removed.

My hearers, look around upon society; behold the sorrowful and dejected countenances of many, who are fearfully apprehensive that the love and tender care of the Divinity is limited in its extent and duration; that Jesus will fail of accomplishing the object of his mission, that a vast number of the human family—fathers, mothers, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters, children, and dear friends, will finally be rejected of God, slighted by the Saviour, and sunk in infinite and irretrievable despair and unending wo. Witness the tears and the agonies, and hear the groans, and cries, and lamentations of the great majority of the world, who are laboring and writhing under the oppressive influence of religious doubts and fears, concerning the final result of the Divine administration; and you will no longer need to be told that a want of faith in God, as the Saviour of all men, and in Jesus as the reconciler and purifier of all hearts, and in heaven as the final home and resting place of a ransomed universe, is the procuring cause of deep and lasting misery, anguish and despair. * * * * * *

Look again—behold the toil, and care, and earthly mindedness—the down cast eyes, the impenetrable gloom, and fearful prospects of the reflecting and avowed infidel. This class of fellow-beings is numerous, and as respectable, perhaps, as most others. But what is their foundation of moral enjoyment, and from whence can they derive that moral support and nourishment, which sustains the moral constitution of man? A few short years, or months, or days, and that utter dissolution must come, which they contemplate as the final end of existence—an "eternal sleep." Now we know from our own experience, that man is a moral as well as intellectual being—he is naturally prone to look upward and onward to a future and immortal state. "Hope springs eternal in the human breast." And nothing earthly and transitory can satisfy the natural cravings of the mind for happiness and immortality.

Tell me not that this class of fellow-beings are contented and satisfied with the dreadful prospect which their want of faith presents before them! No, they are at times wretched—deeply wretched—in contemplation of their Fatherless and precarious condition! And when they, together with the class before noticed, feel as did Peter, that they are sinking beneath the angry waves of affliction and despair, may they hear and realize the language of Jesus to Peter—"It is I, be not afraid." And may they heed the affectionate admonition contained in the text—"O thou of little faith; wherefore didst thou doubt?" and be profited, and blessed, and redeemed by it!

My hearers, let us examine this subject closely, for nothing can exceed it in importance. Let us weigh the evidences of the Bible in the even balance of reason and candor. By pursuing this course, we may surmount every obstacle, and obtain that saving faith which banishes all doubt and fear, and imparts confidence and joy to the humble and dependent soul. AMEN.

RELIGION.

BY REV. F. WHITAKER.

Many are the views that have obtained in the Christian world relative to the nature, design, and utility, of religion. Some assure us that it consists in certain rites, and ceremonies; others that it is an indefineable something, instantaneously imparted to them by supernatural means. We often hear this class of people inquiring of each other how long it has been since they got religion, when, and how they got it, etc. We were not a little amused in hearing one of this class relate his experience, and the manner in which he came in possession of what he called religion. We subjoin it verbatim, not on account of its silliness, but to show the views that obtain in some minds on this subject. Said he, "I tried first to get religion by my learning; I acquired considerable learning for this purpose, but soon found that this would not help me to it. I then thought that I would try some other method; I thought I would get it by living a good life, but in a short time I ascertained that I never should get it by morality. I abandoned this project and thought I would try no other way. Then I sought the Lord, and believed his word, and soon came into possession of religion."

This man seemed to have a religion which he could not define, and which had not much to do with morality, but consisted of a routine of ceremonies, and differed materially from that which has been explained by St. James. The religion of the New Testament, does not consist of rites and ceremonies, but of deeds of mercy and kindness. James defines it thus—"Pure and undefiled religion, before God and the Father is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

It is generally believed that the design of religion is to avert the wrath of God, so that he may open the portals of immortal bliss to the sinner; and it is frequently represented, as a means calculated to turn the anger of God, or the demands of justice from its ordinary course, so that the sinners can obtain an entrance through the pearly gates of heaven. We are often told that the religious person, while in this state of being, has to suffer a great amount of trial, trouble, and deprivation, and hence, ought to be rewarded with everlasting bliss for his suffering here. They tell us that while the religious one is made to endure so much, the irreligious are not troubled like other men, but are in the enjoyment of the greatest blessings, and consequently should be hurled down to the regions of endless wo. This opinion has shed abroad a very deleterious influence; it has induced man to plod the path of irreligion, sin, and iniquity, thinking that it was conducive to his highest happiness. It is high time that this error was eradicated from the minds of men, and the principles of true religion introduced in its stead. Religion never was designed to avert the wrath of God, or to diminish our happiness while tabernacling in the flesh. We want it at all times—we want its joys and consolations at all seasons. If sorrow beset our path, we want it to console us. If affliction seize us, if the clouds of adversity lower around us, and disappointment and distress environ us, we want it to enable us to bear up, and to direct our minds to the time when they shall all end in good. If the grim messenger of death appears before us, to take us hence, we want it to assure us that he is not an offspring of chance, but an angel of mercy, commissioned to waft us away from the perplexing scenes of this transitory world, to our everlasting resting place. Every person who is without true religion is groping his way in darkness, whereas the person in the possession of this glorious boon, views all the different events as ordered in wisdom and love; some as blessings in disguise, but all proceeding from the hand of infinite goodness, and eminently calculated for the best good of the whole creation of God.

AN INCIDENT.

In the Spring of 1833, I had the misfortune to lose a kindred friend. My father had removed with his family to the town of P. It was here he was to close his earthly pilgrimage, and leave the widow and the fatherless to seek the protection of strangers. Dyspepsia, that had for nearly two years preyed upon his frame, had now touched the vital springs of life, and the physician told that he was beyond the reach of human skill.—He was a Universalist. He lived for many years in the enjoyment of this faith, and died rejoicing in the same. Yes, he died in the hope of a world's salvation—in hope to meet beyond the dismal shores of time, the loved ones that clung round the death-bed side, to receive the last blessing from a dying father's lips. That scene I shall long remember. During a whole day, every moment of which we expected would be the last to our suffering friend, not a footstep was heard to cross the threshold of the house of mourning. The lone mother and her devoted children, composed the little group that surrounded the bed of death. Still he lingered; another day dawned, and the cold-hearted stranger came. He came—but for what? To extend the alleviating hand, or tender the healing balm of consolation? No. It was to rob the dying man of that hope which had long been an anchor to his soul; but he did not succeed.

The sufferer expired, and his remains were consigned to the earth. The fortitude of the widowed mother now seemed the only support of her disconsolate children. She taught them to dry their tears, for weeping could not recall the dead. She taught them that though in a land of strangers, still God was their father and friend.

Two weeks had passed away. Resignation seemed, in some degree, to rest upon the hearts of the afflicted, when the stranger again, for the second time, came. It was a visit to the widow and the fatherless indeed; and would to Heaven, it had been to bind up the broken-hearted, and pour the oil of consolation into the cup of human sorrow. But the man whose countenance bore the marks of bigoted zeal, and superstitious frenzy; came

'Like Milton's devil of paradise
With ghastly grin and many lies"— not with the Gospel of truth and light; but with a worthless, senseless, bundle of tracts, calculated to harrow up and sharpen the pains of the already grief-smitten soul, and bury deep in the afflicted bosom, the poisonous darts of a hell-fire dogma! These he recommended to the family for a careful perusal. The mother glanced her eye at them, and perceived that they contained foul denunciations against the doctrine of Universalism, and threatened eternal ruin to its possessor. She spurned them as the productions of narrow-minded, selfish man; and was in turn pronounced an unbeliever, denying the records of Heaven. But the bereaved mother nobly defended her faith, and with arguments drawn from Scripture, too powerfully to be resisted. She even silenced the lips of her opponent. The stranger went away to return no more, and the widow was left to enjoy her faith unmolested. She was no longer disturbed in her devotions, but the darts of the enemy were next hurled at her unoffending children. While one of these was engaged in the peaceful avocations of life, one of these soul-saving missionaries crossed his path. He told him that he was standing on the brink of endless ruin and exhorted him to turn from the error of his ways by forsaking the heresy, Universalism. He even told him there was a doubt respecting the fate of the deceased, and if he was miserable, he must be reconciled, and in whatever the justice of God required, say thy will be done.

Reader, these things have transpired in my youth. I have seen the cold clods of the valley close upon the remains of my paternal friend; and to add grief to sorrow, I was told, that perchance, unending wo was his portion. I have heard the sighs of the widow and the fatherless, when there was no eye to pity and no heart to feel. Amidst these scenes of adversity, my soul was troubled, and I sought for truth; I sought, and have become convinced that nothing short of universal happiness, can allay the heavings of the throbbing bosom, can satisfy the desires and hopes of man, and accomplish the good pleasure of Heaven. THE PRUNER.

PROFANITY.

I asked the profane man why he swore? "Oh," said he, "it is a habit which I imbibed when a mere child, and I swear before I think." Paul said, "When I was a child, I thought as a child, I spake as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things." But this man is still a child, in thought and word, with the gray hairs of age! Strange man! speak before he thinks! the reverse of this is the practice of the wise man. For shame, brethren—no longer talk without thinking. God never made the faculties of thought to remain dormant, nor the powers of speech to take his name in vain. Your excuse only makes a bad matter worse.

Then pause, we beseech you, and consider the folly and wickedness of your practice. "Cease to do evil, learn to do well," and speak the words of truth and soberness, that your "sins may be blotted out." APELLES.

SOMETHING WRONG SOMEWHERE.

MR. EDITOR.—As you are doubtless well aware, there is quite a number of societies in western New-York, (and even several that have meeting houses,) who are destitute of preaching, and have no meetings, but suffer moths and bats to quietly inhabit the edifice devoted to the worship of God. And this is not because there are no preachers to minister to them, for sad experience proves there are more than are sustained, or supported; nor is it because these societies are too poor to support preaching a part or all of the time, for many are possessed of thousands, and rich in this world's goods. Wherefore then is it so? Who answers! R. T.

THE TEMPORAL AND THE ETERNAL.....NO. II.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

"While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."
Rom. iv: 18.

The reader will here perceive that the temporal are contrasted with the eternal, and hence must be of a contrary signification. When we cast our eyes around us, we perceive that every thing belonging to time, is fleeting and transitory in its nature, and will soon have passed away. The seasons flit by us in their rapid course, and the flowery decorations of Spring are exchanged for the rich delights of Autumn; the scorching beams of the Summer's sun, for Winter's darkening cloud and chill boreas. The vegetable creation springs up but to wither and fade, and "beast, bird, fish, insect," with man himself, die, and return to their primeval dust. Infancy is succeeded by youth, youth by manhood, and manhood by old age. Pleasure is succeeded by pain, health by sickness, and life by death. The rocks crumble, the trees decay, the leaves fall, the flowers fade, and the grass withers. But change and succession end not here; for the earth beneath our feet, and the stars that glitter like diamonds above our heads, are of the same mutable character.* Whatever is seen is not eternal: these all had a beginning and must necessarily have an end.

Whatever is mutable—whatever had a beginning—whatever our natural senses can perceive—whatever exists in the intercourse and conduct of the world—are temporal and will cease to be. And in this list we may place all the evils of life, and all the wicked works of man—the pangs that excruciate our frames, and the sins that embitter our days. None can deny that these are among "the things which are seen," and which now exist in the intercourse and conduct of the world.—Hence,

"We find that sin and unbelief,
Sickness, sorrow, pain and grief,
Did not exist till time begun,
Nor can exist when time is done."

And it is supremely absurd to suppose that a temporal cause can produce an eternal effect—that punishment will be endless, while sin its producing cause, is limited.

"By this we find that unbelief
Can not support immortal grief;
Nor faith, nor hope, eternal peace,
Because, when time is done, they cease."

In the eternal state, sin will be superceded by holiness, grief by joy—faith and unbelief will be swallowed up of certainty, and hope will end in fruition.

"Man hopes for that he hath not got—
Has faith in that which he sees not;
In what he sees he hath no faith,
Nor can he hope for that he hath."

The Scriptures declare eternity to be a high and holy place, and hence it can never be applied to an unholy, sinful, and changeable mode of being. "Thus saith the High and Lofty One, that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy, I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the hearts of the contrite ones." Isa. lvii: 15. What high and holy place does Deity dwell in or inhabit? Is it not plain that it is eternity? And is it not true, then, that eternity is a holy place, and can not possibly be the residence of any but those who are such? Nothing opposed to truth, to holiness, to love, to God, can claim an eternal existence. It is the temple of the great Jehovah, consecrated in purity and holiness for his residence. God inhabiteth eternity! What a glorious truth! what a sublime conception! "God occupies this inconceivable duration; he pervades and fills throughout this boundless dwelling."

Though change and decay are connected with all terrestrial things—though the "grass withereth and the flower fadeth, yet the word of the Lord endureth forever. And this is the word by which the Gospel is preached unto you.' His benevolent design and immortal purpose, in the ultimate salvation of his intelligent creation, are of an everlasting date.

"Salvation was in Christ the Son,
Before creation was begun;
From endless ages it was sure,
To endless ages will endure."

Whatever is holy—whatever is assimilated unto the divine nature, will doubtless have an endless duration. Fire will not burn fire, matter will not annihilate matter, holiness will not destroy holiness, nor will love ever quench love. But it is utterly impossible for sin and unholiness to be eternal, and God still be the sovereign of the universe. Whatever is eternal, is infinite; and it is evident two opposite infinite principles can not exist together. God is holy, and every thing opposed to his perfections must cease, or he must. There can no more be two opposite eternities, the one holy and the other unholy, than there can be two opposite deities.

Nothing unholy can go beyond the bourn of time. Nothing unholy can have an immortal existence. To suppose the contrary would be an absurdity, a contradiction and an impossibility. Whatever is immortal, must be holy and divine. If spirits return to the Great Spirit—if minds ascend to the Purer Mind, and dwell forever in the blissful presence of their great Creator, it is because they are of the same nature. The Scriptures assert, that "God only hath immortality." Spirits are not immortal, unless they are divine. Hence, when this mortal shall put on immortality, Paul says, "God giveth it a body as it pleaseth him, and to every seed [person] his own body." If God only hath immortality, and man receives at his resurrection an immortal constitution, it is evident it must be of God, and divine in its nature. Hence we hear the same apostle speaking in the language of assurance: "For we know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." "Look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen, are" not eternal, "and the things which are not seen, are eternal."

The end of evil and sin then appears, 1st, Because they are temporal and must pass away; 2d, Because eternity is a holy state, which they can never enter; 3d, By the contradiction involved in supposing holiness to be eternal; and, 4th, By showing that nothing unholy can possibly be immortal. It was the great object of the Saviour's mission, to take away the sin of the world, to finish sin, make an end of transgression, bring in everlasting righteousness, and thus destroy the works of the devil. But when shall this be effected?—when shall time, with its mutations, be brought to a close, and a fadeless and holy eternity dawn upon the intelligences of creation?

Time, when not connected with any other word as a qualifier, signifies "a duration relative to a mode of being, that has both a beginning and an end. It always ends with a change of the condition of all things belonging to its duration." This can not be till the dead are raised immortal and incorruptible. For this mortal must put on immortality, and this corruptible must put on incorruption:" and this is a change, and must belong to time.

Some have supposed that time ends at death, but this can not be: "For behold I shew you a mystery: we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; (for the trump shall sound;) and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." "And the seventh angel sounded, (the last trump,) and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever."—Rev. xi: 15. "And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to heaven and sware by him that liveth forever and ever, who created the heavens and the things that are therein, and the earth and the things that are therein, and the sea, and the things that therein are, that there should be time no longer; but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God shall be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets."—Rev. x: 5 and 6. Hence, when the seventh angel—the last trumpet sounds, the dead shall be raised, time shall end, the mystery of God be finished, and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God.....that God may be all in all." Then cometh the end of time, sickness, sorrow, pain, sin, death, hell and damnation, and then cometh the end of the Mediator's reign, but not before. "For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet." "Him must the heavens receive, till the times of the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Then "the mystery of God shall be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." "For he hath made known to us the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and on earth, even in him." Here we are told that the times, or periods from one change to another, will arrive at their fulness or completion at the final ingathering of all in Christ. The conversion of every individual sinner is a change, and presupposes one of those times, included in the Gospel dispensation; and should these be as many as there are human beings, still time must include them; and it can not arrive at its fulness, till all shall be gathered together in Christ their spiritual Head. But when this is effected—when the Son shall have subdued all things to himself—when the last enemy shall have been destroyed—when the 7th and last trumpet shall sound, and the dead be raised in Christ, then time shall end, and the mystery of God be finished. Then no longer will a changeable existence be allotted to mortals. Then will that time which had a glorious beginning, have also a glorious end.

But Christ must reign—time must continue till there is no more sin, pain, or death. His saving power will not cease to be exerted, till all are "the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

"But," says one, "there is no change after death." Not so: "we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed;" and that after death, too. Hence we look for the glorious appearing of our Lord from heaven; "who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things to himself." As long as time continues there will be change, and time will not end till the last trumpet sounds, and the dead come forth immortal and indissoluble. There is no change after the resurrection. No change belongs to God, nor can to us, when he is all in all.

Eternity knows no variation, diminution or increase. All that inhabit it are immortal, indissoluble, and perfected in holiness of heart and purity of life. Its happiness can not be increased, nor

* Not only the solid matter of our globe, but the twinkling luminaries of heaven, are of a transient and perishable nature. There is now every reason to suppose that the four asteriods, [Ceres, Pallas, Juno and Vesta,] are but the fragments of a large planet, which in the revolution of ages, has been dashed to pieces and broken into fragments. Within the last century, Dr. Good informs us, that not less than thirteen stars seem totally to have perished, forty to have changed their magnitudes by becoming much greater or much less, and ten new stars have appeared to take the place of those that were lost. Thus "heaven and earth shall pass away."

can it ever decay. It is one unbounded sea of glory and delight. No fading glory dwells in its realms:

No friendship's parting tear is shed;
None mourn the loss of kindred dead:
No trials and sorrows are witnessed there;
For what is eternal, must ever be fair.

Here is change: here men love and hate, marry and are given in marriage. Here alternately they are elated with joy, and depressed with sorrow. There shall these mutations of time be unknown. There shall be love without hatred, pleasure without pain, and joy without sorrow.

"No cloud those blissful regions know;
For ever bright and fair;
For sin the source of all our wo,
Can never enter there."

But time must first cease. The works and doctrines of men must first fall. Every thing not in accordance with the eternal word must come to nought. Every plant, not of divine origin, must be rooted up. Error must be superceded by truth; sin by holiness, and the earthly by the divine. Hence all is commotion and change, all is transitory and fleeting. The world changes, and we change; and so it must be till all are moulded into the divine image—till all shall be changed and made like unto the angels in heaven. Change after change shall come over us, till we are changed from sin to holiness, from error to truth, from hatred to love, from one degree of perfection to another, and from glory to glory. Then the "seen" shall be exchanged for the "unseen,"—the temporal for the eternal. Then naught remains but that bright world of light, where nothing new and nothing old appears, but God the source of all our joy, and the eternal river from "whom will flow without alloy, the bliss that ceases never."

"There, no more at eve declining,
Suns, without a cloud, are shining
O'er the land of light and love:
Heaven's own harvest woos the reaper:
Heaven's own dreams entrance the sleeper,
Not a tear is left the weeper,
To profane one flower above.

No frail lillies there are breathing,
There no thorny rose is wreathing,
In the bowers of paradise,
Where the founts of life are flowing,
Flowers unknown to time are growing,
'Mid far richer verdure glowing,
Than is sunned by mortal skies."

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Chenango Association of Universalists—for 1839.

Convened in Binghampton, Broome county, September 3d and 4th—and organized the council by choosing Hon. A. Cary, Moderator, and Br. J. T. Goodrich, Clerk. The first morning, prayer was offered by Br. A. B. Grosh—the second by Br. J. S. Sherburne.

During the session, made the appointments, passed the resolutions, and transacted the business here named.

Read and approved of the proceedings of the last session. Read the credentials from delegates and letters from societies. Granted fellowship to the first Universalist society in East Greene. Invited ministering brethren from other Associations to take part in the deliberations of the council.

Committee Reports.—On fellowship and ordination, that they had received no application during the past year. On discipline, "no complaint." On Conferences, that Conference meetings had been held at South Bainbridge, South New-Berlin, Columbus, and Upper Lisle. On visiting places destitute of preaching, that upon the whole the prospect for the future is encouraging—all of which were accepted.

Appointments.—Brs. A. Cary, C. S. Brown and A. G. Clark, committee on fellowship and ordination—Brs. Brown, Clark and J. T. Goodrich, committee of discipline—Brs. Sherburne, Clark, Brown, Goodrich, H. Torrey and H. B. Soule, committee to visit every society in the Association, destitute of regular preaching, for the purpose of rousing them to life and encouraging them to action; also to visit and preach in other places, and where practicable, organize societies, and recommend such measures to the friends as in their judgment the good of the cause demands; authorised said committee to divide the whole territory of this Association into six districts, as may suit the field of labor to each member of the same.—Brs. C. S. Brown, and J. T. Goodrich, ministerial, and A. Cary and J. Hawes, lay, delegates to the next State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes—Br. Clark to preach the next occasional sermon, with power to appoint a substitute—Br. J. T. Goodrich, Standing Clerk; the Standing Clerk to appoint Conferences on application therefor, during the present year—Br. Goodrich to prepare the minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist Union, and accompany the same with such remarks as he may deem proper.

Resolutions Passed.—Resolved, That the thanks of this council be tendered to Br. J. T. Goodrich, for his excellent occasional discourse, and that he be requested to furnish a copy for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist Union.

Resolved, That the report of the committee on fellowship and ordination for the present year, conferring ordination on Br. S. P. Landers, at this session, and granting ordination to Br. Goodrich at such time and place as he may select, be received and accepted.

Resolved, That at this and future meetings of this Association, the council will not assume the direction of the public services, farther than relates to the annual occasional sermon, together with extraordinary services, as ordinations, etc., but will leave it to the societies in which the Association meets, or their committee, to make such arrangements as they may deem proper.

Whereas, Br. J. G. McAdam has returned the letter of fellowship which he received from this Association in 1836, and signified his intention of devoting the remainder of his life to another profession, therefore, Resolved, That said letter be received, and that we sincerely regret that the public can no longer be benefitted by his highly useful labors in the Gospel ministry, and pray that the richest blessings of Heaven may rest upon him, wherever his lot and whatever his occupation may be.

Whereas, Br. Samuel Finch, a preacher in this Association, owing to various causes, has been unable to attend fully to the duties of the ministry, and has tendered his resignation of fellowship as a promulgator of the Gospel, therefore, Resolved, That said resignation be accepted.

Whereas, Br. N. Doolittle is about to remove from this Association to Ohio, and has resigned the office of Standing Clerk, therefore, Resolved, that said resignation be accepted; and that the thanks of this Association be presented to Br. Doolittle, not only for his performance of the duties of that station, but for his long continued and faithful services in this region, where he has "borne the heat and burden of the day," and been instrumental in greatly advancing the cause of universal benevolence; and that we cordially recommend him as a true and faithful brother to the liberal Christian public, wherever God in his providence may send him.

Whereas, we believe that the Constitution of every society should be so framed as not to admit any immoral person as a member, therefore. Resolved, That we recommend to our brethren within the boundaries of this Association, that they appoint a committee of discipline in every society, whose duty it shall be, if any member is known to walk disorderly, to call on him in the spirit of meekness and love, and by gentle persuasion endeavor to reclaim him; but if he or she refuses to hear the committee and continues to walk immorally, his (or her) case shall be reported to the society for further consideration; and if the offending member shall manifest no disposition to reform, then let the hand of fellowship be withdrawn.

Resolved, That the societies in this Association be recommended to take up collections, on or before the first Sunday in January next, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the delegates to the State Convention, the amount thus collected to be forwarded by the Clerks of the societies to the Standing Clerk of the Association, who shall equitably apply the same, keep an account of its receipt and expenditure, and report at the annual meeting of this body.

Adjourned to meet in South Bainbridge, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in September, 1840.

Six sermons were preached by Brs. Clark, Goodrich, Potter, Whiston, Grosh, Doolittle, and one by Br. Potter in Union. Brs. Brown, Sherburne, Landers and Green took part in the services. East Pharsalia—Organized 1832—society members 40, has not been represented in council since 1836. no preaching, no house, and has probably lost its legal existence.

REMARKS.

We believe above, we have mentioned all of the societies now legally existing in this Association. If there are others we trust that they will immediately report to us their rise, progress and condition.

Some of our statistics were compiled from the letters of societies to the council, some appended from personal knowledge, and for the remainder we have spared no small pains to obtain correct information. We only regret that they are yet incomplete, and hope that at the next annual meeting, the clerk of every society, will prepare a full statement of its history, from its organization down to that time.

Our council has seldom, if ever, been as well attended as at its present session—and we trust that in future every society will be fully represented. The business was all transacted with great unanimity and friendship. Let the visiting committee faithfully attend to the duties for which they were appointed, and every society institute discipline according to the recommendation of the council, and great good will be effected.

The heavens were clear, the congregations large and very attentive, the singing good, and the preaching, as far as becomes me to speak, unusually instructing and interesting. Our brethren "proved themselves workmen that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." They "spoke in demonstration of the spirit and with power." They reached the hearts of their hearers, filled their souls "with joy unspeakable," and caused the tear of gratitude to trickle down their cheeks; and many exclaimed that it was good for them to be there. "The seed fell on good ground," and will doubtless yield a life-lasting harvest. Our friends at Binghamton were very attentive to our wants, and in return have our best wishes for their kindness.

The ordination services were solemn and impressive, and from a long and intimate acquaintance with our worthy brother Landers, we fully believe he will prove faithful to his promise, and zealously proclaim the undying love of God to a lost and sinful world.

In regard to the onward progress of Universalism, it will be perceived, that in our Association it is generally permanently prosperous. It is neither losing nor stationary in many places, and we believe that where it is not now perceptibly progressing, our friends will yet arise from their coldness and respect themselves, and their hands will be strengthened, their hearts encouraged, sin and error dissipated by the heaven-imparted beams of truth and righteousness, and the period hastened when "there shall be one fold and one Shepherd."

Per order, J. T. GOODRICH, Clerk.

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1839.

CONSCIENTIOUSNESS—ITS PUNISHMENTS.

No objection is more common among our opposers, than the following, which is urged in Fowler's Manual of Phrenology, from whence I have selected it for examination and reply. The authors are speaking of the operations of Conscientiousness.

"This faculty, then, while it actually prevents the truly conscientious man from committing as much sin as he would probably commit with but feeble Conscientiousness, makes him feel the more guilty; and allows those who have but little Conscientiousness, and are therefore less restrained from committing sin, to live on, comparatively insensible to their faults, dead to the reproach of a guilty conscience, and justified in their own eyes.

"This fact refutes the doctrine, that the goadings of a guilty conscience in this life, constitute the only punishment for sin: for it is a plain dictate of reason and of conscience, that the punishment of sin must always be proportionate to the iniquity committed. Yet we here see that the punishment inflicted by Conscientiousness, is lightest upon those who sin the most, and most severe upon those who are least deserving of it, and that it is often inflicted when the actions are even virtuous."—pp. 134, 135.

To save room, I will remark that the authors suppose therefore, that there must be other punishments, reserved for infliction in another state of existence. The argument omitted will be attended to in due time. My present aim is to correct either the loose phraseology of Mr. Kirkham, or the erroneous ideas of Messrs. Fowlers.

What is sin? It is the transgression of a law, known to the understanding. The Jews had a revealed law, which, being received into their minds as correct, its transgression was sin to them. But the Gentiles had not this law, and their disobedience to its requirements was not sin to them, except so far as the Jewish law agreed with the law which each Gentile had in himself. (See 2d chapter of Romans.) It follows, then, that all the light and knowledge of moral good and moral evil, received and applied by Conscientiousness, constitutes that law in each mind, the transgression of which is sin. Many an action not deemed sin, may be morally wrong in the largest sense—and many an action deemed sinful, may be morally right in the largest sense—but to the individual whose light and knowledge has been obeyed, it is not sin—or whose law has been transgressed, it is sin. If any one wishes to see these positions further argued, they may be gratified by consulting "Ballou's Treatise on Atonement."

It will readily be seen, by duly considering these facts, that though the divine standard of good in the largest sense, is immutable, yet its reflection in, and the understanding of it by, the mind, must vary materially in different individuals—just as all other gifts of God vary in his children—to one he has given ten talents, to another five, and to yet another but one. It follows, also, that each one is judged only according to what he has received, and not according to that he hath not. Hence, to judge the actions of a man that has received but one talent, by the ten talents of another, is unjust—contrary to the divine dealings with man. Each one is governed by that portion of light reflected into his understanding from the divine law, and not by the portion not reflected into his mind—nor yet by the larger (or even the lesser) portion which is reflected into his neighbor's understanding. For it would be as wrong, morally, to judge one with small Conscientiousness (or large Consctentiousness unenlightened) by the standard of one with a large and enlightened conscience, as it would be intellectually wrong, to measure the productions of a schoolboy's mind by the standard of the minds of Milton, Locke, Bacon, Shakespear, and Newton. No—every mind has its own law of moral right and wrong, perfectly adapted to its capacity, and by that law Conscientiousness judges the motive of every action brought before its tribunal, and rewards or punishes accordingly.

Hence I would alter the first paragraph quoted above, so as to declare, that though large Conscientiousness, properly enlightened, prevented its possessor from committing as much moral wrong (in the largest sense) as he would probably commit with feeble Conscientiousness; yet, by giving him a clearer perception of what is morally right universally, it makes him feel, and really be guilty for committing acts, which those who have but little Conscientiousness commit without remorse, their knowledge of universal moral right being dim and feeble. But those who are "justified in their own eyes," can not be "dead to the reproach of a guilty conscience;" for it must be evident, that their consciences are not guilty, and do not reproach them. Therefore, though the truly conscientious man does less moral evil, than one with feeble Conscientiousness, yet he may sin nearly as much, because, to him many things are sinful, which, to the viler man, are indifferent actions. But it must be confessed that this, though possible, is not probable—because the good man will make his moral impulses his guide, and therefore better and more constantly obey the law of his understanding; while the vile man will follow the impulses of his propensities, and therefore more frequently go counter to what his own conscience points out as morally right.

We now see the error of the Messrs. Fowlers. They put down as sin for every one, what is sin only to them. Making their Conscientiousness the judge of every person's sinfulness, they decide that those more conscientious than themselves, are unduly punished—"most severely, when least deserving of it"—punished "when the actions are even virtuous." Then, turning to those who are less conscientious than themselves, they decide that they are "less restrained from committing sin"—that the punishment "is lightest upon those who are the most guilty"—and therefore conclude that God has either unjustly punished the innocent and let the most guilty go comparatively free, in this life; or, that there must be some other punishment than the goadings of a guilty conscience, and to be inflicted in another state of being! The whole error consists in making the Conscientiousness of one man the judge of the sinfulness of another! If Messrs. Fowlers were judged in this manner by a person more conscientious than they are, they would be sentenced to that "some other punishment," "in another state of existence," to fill up, through eternity, the measure due to them—and if they were judged in like manner by a person less conscientious than themselves, they would be considered as suffering most, when least deserving of it—as being punished even for being virtuous, etc. Who does not see the fallacy of a conclusion which is drawn only from such easily changed and shifted premises! It is not true—(every man being judged by the only judge of sinfulness God has given him, and according to the only law by which he can, in reason or equity, be judged—) it is not true that "the punishment inflicted by Conscientiousness is lightest upon those who sin the most, and most severe upon those who are least deserving of it"—nor is it true "that it is often inflicted when the actions punished are even virtuous"—i. e. the virtue being judged by the judge, and according to the law, aforesaid. True, as before remarked, this judge may decide wrong as regards universal moral right—and God's law may be very imperfect and very dim as written in the culprit's understanding—but it is the only judge that can righly decide on the real, actual guilt of that individual, and it would be unjust to try him by any other law, than the one from which, only, he learned his duty, and the only one, in fact, that he is, or can be made, conscious of having transgressed. The punishment inflicted by Conscientiousness, then, is "always in proportion to the iniquity committed," as reason and conscience dictate. "The principle of accountability, which necessarily implies accompanying rewards and punishments, enters into the very nature and constitution of man," and hence it can not possibly be otherwise, than "that men are punishable for their sins, and punishable in proportion to their guilt." But what are their sins? Only what each one's knowledge of moral good and evil declares to be sin. What is their guilt? The feeling of condemnation which each man's conscience pronounces on his own (and not on another's) motives and acts. It follows, then, that if the culprit's Conscientiousness, which has arraigned him before the moral bar—and has judged the criminality of his motives and acts according to his light and knowledge of moral good and evil—will now inflict the penalty of that law, the criminal will be punished "exactly in proportion to his guilt"—though not in proportion to what another person might suppose was his guilt.

This is an important, and very little understood subject, and I have therefore dwelt upon it at greater length than may be pleasant to some of our readers—but I hope not. The subject, though phrenologically considered, is not so technical but that it can be readily understood by every plain, common-sense man; and I have made the articles as brief as I well could, and wrote them so as to render them entirely independent of each other—one subject to each article. In my next, and last, I will show that Universalists do not, any more than Phrenologists, contend "that the goadings of a guilty conscience in this life, constitute the only punishment" of wrong actions. (I avoid the use of the word "sin," purposely, until I can have room to use it without the risk of being misunderstood.) Some other matters of interest, and the remainder of the popular objection, will also be stated and answered in my next.

TO LAYMEN.....THE PREACHER.

Dear Brethren—Every one of us owes some obligations to the truth that has cheered our minds with light from on high, directed our steps in the way of peace, given us comfort in sorrow and support in trial, and encouraged us by the hope that is full of immortality.—The same truth has disclosed our relations to our fellow-beings, and shown us that our obligations to it, are our obligations to them—that we can best serve God by serving our fellow-men, and manifest our gratitude for the innumerable joys and benefits of the Gospel, by making known its holy and peace-inspiring tidings to society around us. All these obligations, then, resolve themselves into one—and that one has two modes by which it may best be discharged. These are—

1st. By teaching the Gospel principles in our example—our daily life and conversation. This, blessed be God, is the most important mode, and may be equally well performed by the layman as by the minister.—Though it can not be denied that both the tongue and the pen, the pulpit and the press, may materially aid in directing how, when, and why it should be done. 2d. By teaching the doctrine of the Gospel to others, or preceptive teaching. This mode, though measurably in the power of laymen, generally, is most the province of those who speak publicly to mankind, in the pulpit or through the press. This mode appeals most powerfully to the unobservant mass of mankind, and tends to awaken to inquiry. Even to the confirmed believer, it is highly beneficial, furnishing food for his understanding, materials for further reflection, and guidance for his practice. No true Universalist would be without the silent but instructive periodical, or the public and living preacher of glad tidings—and no unawakened Universalist should be without their monitions, that, peradventure, he may be awakened from his lethargy, and live an active life by faith in the Redeemer.

But though laymen are limited in their means and opportunities for preceptive teaching, they are the main-springs to set it in motion. By their aid, only, can it be made so extensive, that every portion of community may hear the glad tidings of God's universal favor, and hearing, may live. In this light, the subject divides itself, here, into two great branches—one relating to the preacher and the editor, and the other relates exclusively to you—and will be considered in this article, with all due modesty, yet plainness—with all necessary affection, yet earnestness. I address myself, therefore, to you, my lay brethren, on what I deem your peculiar duties and obligations to the cause of truth and to your fellow-men, so far as preceptive teaching is concerned.

The preacher.—Our ministers, so far as I have had opportunities and abilities to judge, are a talented, humble, and self-sacrificing body of men, industrious in their calling. With what are considered as far inferior advantages of education, they are on a level with the clergy of other denominations generally, as public speakers—in acquaintance with the nature and wants of their fellow-men—and in general knowledge, with few exceptions; and superior to them in acquaintance with the true spirit and meaning of the Holy Scriptures. This is now being accorded to them by the public voice—even by those of our opposers themselves, who have had a fair opportunity of judging.

Their general humility is well known to you. They are brethren among brethren, and do not aim to exalt themselves in station and power above their congregations. You know, my brethren, that this is true of your ministers; and I need not, therefore, do more than thus call it to your minds.

Self-sacrificing, indeed, have been our preachers—especially in this, and the Western and Southern States. For years have they exerted their talents and powers to the utmost, for a bare subsistence; when, if they had chosen to enrol themselves among our popular and wealthy opposers, or to enter any other profession or business, they might have gathered together a sufficiency of "this world's goods," with half the labor. For, there are few employments or professions among us, where money can not be made—and certainly our ministry is not behind other employments and professions in talent. By so much, then, as they have failed to make money, have our clergymen been self-sacrificing. Many might be named, who, though poor, have indirectly given, annually, more for the spread of Universalism, than the wealthiest members of their congregations!

Need I show that our ministers are industrious? No—it is well known—their labors, their sacrifices of ease and comfort, are the witnesses of this fact.

Now, what is your duty to your preachers? Are they the only ones who should preach the Gospel? Are you not bound, by the most solemn obligations, to hold up their hands—to contribute of your means for their support—and to encourage others, by precept and example, to aid the preacher in his arduous labors? Let reason, conscience, and Scripture give the answer! The question rightly answered, your own minds will not fail to suggest the modes and the occasions. Ask not their time and labors without preparing a recompense for them. Invite them not to attend your funerals, without paying their expences, and allowing them, besides, what will enable them to live decently for as great a time as they require to prepare for the occasion, and then require, to rest after its fatigues. The day spent in going to and from the funeral, is not the only time they have spent in your service. Call not on them to visit your families, or to preach to you and your neighbors, without bestowing that cordial aid which will enable them thus to devote their best hours and thoughts to your service. You would not thus give your time and labors to any body of men, without requiring a compensation that would enable you to do it—neither should you ask of them to do it. And to your money, add your presence and approbation—for why should you not get, and profit by, what you have thus paid for? Besides, you know that money is not the highest aim of your preachers—if it was, sadly have they mistaken their calling!

Brethren—one and all—am I right? Have I not spoken correctly regarding your duties to the preacher of the word of eternal life? A. B. G.

AT HOME AGAIN.

I have not attempted any regular journal of my travels, nor detailed statements of what I did or saw—some of the last may form editorial articles hereafter, so far as I deem a notice of them beneficial to our cause in general—so that I can very briefly wind up this article.

After visiting, seeing the curiosities in the vicinity of Boston, and making many most pleasant acquaintances, we bade farewell to our dear friends, on Thursday morning, September 26th, via Worcester, for Belchertown, where we found a conveyance waiting to carry us to South Hadley. Here, among friends of a different faith, but I trust a kindred spirit, we remained till Sunday morning, when we went to Cabotville, where I preached three times to an excellent society of Universalists, but without a settled pastor. It is to be hoped that they have engaged and secured one by this time; for the location is an important one, and they well deserve a good and active preacher. Visited some friends in Springfield, on Monday, and returned to South Hadley, which latter place we left on Wednesday evening for Northampton, where we took stage the next morning at 2 o'clock, reached Albany, very tired of being jolted over the everlasting hills, in time to take the cars for Utica, and reached home on Friday morning at 3 o'clock. Thanks to divine Providence, we found all well. And now, seated down again at the editorial table, and busily engaged in my usual duties and avocations after an absence from home (including my visit to Binghamtom) of five weeks, the busy scenes through which I have passed, seem like a sweet, delightful dream—bright eyes, and familiar features of our new and distant friends float over the paper, and the kindly tones that lately greeted us at a first introduction, or bade us farewell, seem to mingle with the familiar sounds of the domestic circle, and carry me for a time back to New-England.

On the whole, my journeys have not been useless to me. I have learned much I wished to know—much, which I humbly trust I can render profitable to others. Nor have I been idle, or engaged in a mere dissipation of time. During these five weeks, besides hearing others preach sixteen sermons, and attending one Association, one Convention, two dedications, and several Conferences, I preached twenty sermons, and travelled in all nearly 1400 miles, without including what I travelled on foot in and around the several places I visited. To name all the places I visited, and all the kindnesses received in each, would be but to burden paper with names which would communicate no pleasure or information to the reader, and would not unburden my mind of a delicious load of recollections, and my heart of as sweet a load of gratitude. I therefore omit them, and thus close my informal journal. A. B. G.

NEW ASSOCIATIONS IN MASSACHUSETTS.

A few weeks since we gave notice of a meeting for forming a new association in the western part of Massachusetts. We are glad to learn that Br. A. B. Manley and Br. W. Wilcox, are successful in their exertions for the glorious cause. A new association has been formed in that part of Massachusetts west of the Connecticut river, by the name of the Winchester Association, Br. W. Wilcox, Standing Clerk. Its first annual meeting will be the second Wednesday in September 1840. Br. Whittemore says the part embraced within its bounds is the strong hold of Partialism.

POETRY.

AUTUMN.

See! Autumn's sombre rays appear,
And all around is dull and drear.
The leaves are borne upon the gale,
That whistles o'er the lonely vale

The flowers that once were bright and gay,
Are withered now, and pass'd away
Before the frown of Autumn's gloom!
Forever fled their sweet perfume!

The birds that cheer'd the morning ray
Whose wild notes rang from every spray,
No more are heard; their music's gone,
And they to warmer climes have flown.

The forest leafless, bare, and brown,
Its foliage reft by Autumn's frown,
Presents an aspect dark and drear,
Its barren boughs look dry and sere.

Thus Autumn's months o'erspread with gloom,
Are emblems of the rayless tomb,
Whose dark and dreary terrors roll
A chilling damp upon the soul.

But birds and flowers shall come again.
And cheer the grove and deck the plain.
When Spring shall shed her genial ray,
And dress the vales in vesture gay.

So man shall triumph o'er the gloom
And darkness, of the dreary tomb;
And live in heaven where flowers divine.
Blossom and [illegible] CORA

Our esteemed correspondent, "W. B. M." has just handed us the following touching lines on the death of Br. King.—We can not find a more appropriate place for them, than following the notice of Br. K.'s death and burial. The writer, Br. Marsh, first heard the doctrine of universal grace from the lips of our deceased brother. Allusion is made to this circumstance in the fourth verse.—Union.

THOUGHTS,

ON THE DEATH OF REV. THOMAS F. KING.

Toll not the solemn bell,
[illegible] with its thunders loud,
Nor hearse, nor plume, nor glittering shroud,
The mournful tale to tell.

His laurels were not gained
On tented fields, amidst the clash of arms
Where shrieks and groans are mixed with war's alarms,
And the green turf blood-stained.

His was a nobler fight—
A conflict with the armies of the air
Bright gleaming from the armory above—
A victory of right.

Yea! herald of free grace!
First from thy lips I heard the gladsome sound—
A world redeemed from sin—a Saviour found,
For Adam's fallen race.

When darkness spread its pall
And doubts and fears disturbed the troubled breast,
Thou didst proclaim, "Peace to the troubled breast—
My Saviour died for all."

'Twas thine to lift thy voice,
And give the Gospel-trump a glorious sound,
Which carried faith and hope to all around,
[illegible]

Alas! that voice is still.
No more to calm, with soul-subduing tones,
The widow's grief—the orphan's piteous moans,
Responsive to thy will.

Beneath the damp, cold sod,
The body moulders now—earth claims her own;
But the rapt soul hath near'd its Father's throne—
Thou dwellest with thy God. W. B. M.

GRANDEUR OF ASTRONOMICAL DISCOVERIES.

BY WILLIAM WIRT.

It was a pleasant evening in the month of May, and my sweet child, Rosalie and I, had sauntered up to the castle's top, to enjoy the breeze that played around it, and to admire the unclouded firmament, that glowed and sparkled with usual lustre from pole to pole. The atmosphere was in its finest state of vision: the milky way was distinctly developed throughout the whole extent, every planet and every star above the horizon, however near and brilliant, or distant and faint, lent its lambent light or twinkling ray to give variety and beauty to the hemisphere; while the round, bright moon, so distinctly defined were the lines of her figure, and so clearly visible (even the rotundity of her form) seemed to hang off from the azure vault, suspended in pathway air; or stooping forward from the firmament, her fair and radiant face, as if to court and return our gaze.

We amused ourselves for some time, in observing through a telescope, the planet Jupiter, sailing in sheer majesty, with his squadron of satellites, along the vast ocean of space between us and the fixed stars: and admired the felicity of that design, by which the distant bodies had been parceled out, and arranged into constellations, so as to have served not only for beacons to the ancient navigator, but as it were, landmarks to astronomers of this day; enabling them, though in different countries, to indicate to each other with ease, the place and motions of these planets, comets, and meteors, which inhabit, revolve, and play in the intermediate space.

We recalled and dwelt with delight, on the rise and progress of the science of astronomy; on that series of astonishing discoveries through successive ages, which display in so strong a light, the force and reach of the human mind; and on those bold conjectures, and sublimer reveries which seem to tower even to the confines of divinity, and denote the high destiny to which mortals tend; that thought, for instance, which is said to have been first started by Pythagoras, and [illegible] although they appear to us to be nothing more than large spangles of various sizes glittering on the same concave surface, are nevertheless [illegible] suns, shining, like him, with original, and not reflected light, placed at incalculable distances asunder, and each star the solar centre of a system of planets, which revolve around it, as the planets belonging to our system do around the sun: that this is not only the case with all the stars which our eyes discern in the firmament, or which the telescope has brought within the sphere of our vision, but according to the modern improvements of this thought, that there are probably other stars whose light has not yet reached us, although light moves with a velocity a million times greater than that of a cannon ball: that those luminous appearances, which we observe in the firmament, like flashes of thin, white clouds, are windows, as it were, which open to other firmaments, far, far beyond the ken of human eyes, or the power of optical instruments, lighted up, like ours, with hosts of stars or suns: that this scene goes on through infinite space, which is filled with thousands upon thousands of those suns, attended by ten thousand times ten thousand worlds, all in rapid motion, yet calm, regular, and harmonious, invariably keeping the paths prescribed to them; and these worlds peopled with myriads of intelligent beings.

One would think that this conception, thus extended, would be bold enough to satisfy the whole enterprise of the human imagination. But what an accession of glory and magnificence does Dr. Herschel superadd, when, instead of supposing all these suns fixed, and the motion confined to their respective planets, he loosens those multitudinous suns themselves from their anchors, sets them all in motion with their splendid retinue of planets and satellites, and imagines them, thus attended, to perform a stupendous revolution, system above system, around some grander, unknown centre, somewhere in the boundless abyss of space!—and when, carrying on the process, you suppose even that centre itself not stationary, but also counterpoised by other masses in the immensity of space, with which, attended by their accumulated train of > "Planets, Suns, and adamantine spheres > Wheeling unshaken through the void immense," it maintains harmonious concert, surrounding in its vast career, some other centre still more remote and stupendous, which in its turn——

"You overwhelm me," said Rosalie, as I was hurrying to pursue the [illegible]: "my mind is lost in the void, and has no power to follow you, and I must request of you to [illegible] its weary wings. [illegible] I imagine that the ultimate centre, to which this vast and inconceivably magnificent apparatus is attached, and around which it is continually revolving. Oh! what a spectacle for those her dear and scriptural [illegible] of the just made perfect, who dwell on the right hand of that throne, if, as may be, and probably is the case, their eyes are permitted to pierce the whole, and take in, at one glance, all its order, beauty, sublimity, and glory, and their ears to distinguish that celestial harmony, unheard by us, in which those vast globes, as they roll in their orbits, continually hymn their Creator's praise.

HARD RUB.—Mr. Bildad W——, of K——, one of the pleasantest towns in Plymouth county, Mass., was a stone cutter, and withal given to hard jokes. One morning, as he was busily at work, surrounded as usual by a number of tombstones, carved out with the usual inscription, "In memory of," he was greeted by Dr. F. who was riding by, on a visit to some of his patients.—"Good morning, Mr. W.," said the doctor, "hard at work, I see; you finish your grave-stones as far as 'In memory of,' and then you wait, I suppose, to see who wants a monument next." "Why, yes," replied the old man, resting a moment on his mallet, "unless somebody is sick, and you are doctoring him, and then I keep right on!"—Hartford Courier.

HOW TO RENDER OURSELVES AGREEABLE.—The surest way of rendering ourselves agreeable to others, is by seeming to think them so. If we appear fully sensible of their good qualities, they will not complain of them in us.

DEATHS.

At North East, Erie county, Pa., on the 25th of August 1839, Mr. WILLIAM CANFIELD, of Manchester, Ontario county, N. Y., aged about 60 years.

Br. Canfield was a man of exemplary deportment and Christian character. He left home in usual health, [illegible] expecting to return in the same state [illegible] and friends. But alas! in the absence of these, the destroyer overtook him, and he is no more. He expressed confidence in "the faith once delivered to the saints," as the shades of death gathered around him, and rejoiced in hope of the salvation of God.

His funeral was attended in the Baptist meeting house in Manchester, on the 3d Sabbath in September, by a large circle of friends and relatives, to whom our worthy Br. O. Ackley delivered the consolations of the Gospel of peace, life and salvation. T. D. COOK.

In Leroy, Michigan, August the 18th, of inflammation on the brain, BETSEY, eldest daughter of Joshua and Harriet Robbinson, aged 12 years and 6 months. "Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted."

In Byron, Genesee county, September 18th, of consumption, Mrs. LAURA M. MARSH, consort of Richard Marsh, aged 41 years. Sister Marsh lived in the enjoyment of that "faith which works by love and purifies the heart"—and has now gone to possess that building of God, that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." She has left a companion and two sons, to lament her loss. Her funeral was attended the day following by the writer.—May the consolations of the Gospel be richly felt, and make up their loss by imparting heavenly joys. OCCASIONAL SERMON, Delivered before the Chenango Association of Universalists at its session for 1839, in Binghampton.

BY REV. J. T. GOODRICH, OXFORD, N. Y.

[Published by request of the Council.]

"Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?"—ISAIAH xxi: 11.

Through the unfailing goodness of almighty God, it is our privilege to assemble together on this interesting occasion. I see before me several promulgators of the truth as it is in Jesus, and a multitude of believers, doubtless grateful to their heavenly Father, that they are permitted to meet in annual convocation, to mingle their smiles and tears, adore the Author of their being, and praise the name of him who died to save the world.

We shall use our text merely as an appropriate motto to our discourse, without any particular regard to its original application, or the circumstances under which it was uttered.

Then, of the watchman on the walls of Zion, who are "set for the defence of the Gospel," we inquire, "what of the night?" Declare unto us, what seest thou? Can you say of error, as the watchman, in our context, did of Babylon? "She is fallen, is fallen, and all the graven images of her gods are broken unto the ground." Are her slaves emancipated, her captives freed, and basking in the joy and liberty of the Gospel of glad tidings to all people? Is the Sun of righteousness setting in everlasting night, or lighting the path of the weary pilgrim through life; dispelling the darkness that lingers around the tomb, and shining on and on, forevermore? Is the tide of iniquity rolling back toward the ocean of oblivion, and a lost and sinful world emerging from the waters "that cast up mire and dirt," and wending their way to the clear and crystal fountain of virtue, happiness and peace; or are they yet wallowing in sin and drinking to the very dregs the cup of misery? Do they rejoice in the great and glorious truth that God is a universal Father, Christ a universal Saviour, and heaven a universal home; or do they still regard their Creator as a being from whom "they have little to expect and much to fear," and tremble and stand aghast as they hear denounced the horrors of an endless retribution? As one of the watchmen, I would say, from my own observation and information from sources on which I can with confidence rely, upon the whole, though sin and error yet remain, many of their pillars have crumbled, and their prisoners, one by one, are bursting their shackles, inhaling the pure air of Gospel liberty, basking in the sunbeams of righteousness, and joyfully anticipating the time when a ransomed, redeemed and regenerated world shall pass the dark valley of death, and live in a more congenial clime, clothed in spotless robes, enthroned in the majesty of virtue and piety, surrounded by the rich garniture of heaven, and the highest and holiest beings, and verdant with emblems of immortal bloom.

Our cause, within the boundaries of this Association, is decidedly onward. In the county in which your speaker resides, it is universally conceded that there never was a time when we were more rapidly increasing than at the present. The future wears a most cheering aspect. Our societies are continually strengthening, and truth is widely disseminating. It stands upon a permanent basis in almost every town. Its votaries are more strongly feeling its power, and more faithfully living its precepts; and the whole community are beginning to feel its redeeming influence, and to exhibit the fruits of a more expansive benevolence. In the United States, the number of our preachers has increased, in 70 years, from 1 to 450—our societies, in 60 years, from 1 to 1,000 nearly—our State Conventions, in 40 years, from 1 to 14—and our Associations, in the same time, from 1 to 60 nearly. And in our own State, our societies in 34 years have increased from 1 to near 300—our meeting houses in 24 years, from 1 to 100—and our Associations, in 17 years, from 2 to 15.

Nor in the sentiments of the opposing denominations, is the change less perceptible. The doctrines of unconditional election and reprobation, original sin, total depravity, no change after death, the salvation of but a small portion of the human family, the indispensable necessity of faith and repentance in this world to obtain salvation in the next, etc., are being numbered among the "things which have been but are not." And it is now generally conceded that a vastly greater portion of mankind will be saved without, than with faith and repentance; or in other words, that all, or at least many, heathen, infants, and idiots, who never exercise either in time, will be happy in eternity. Our sentiments extensively prevail among the Unitarians of England, and the Lutherans of Germany. And in our own country there are, in almost every church, some who privately, perhaps, but still firmly and sincerely believe them; and it has recently been conclusively shown, that there are preachers and communicants of the Greek church—that vast body of Christians—who are firm believers in the final holiness and happiness of all men. Who then shall despair of the broad banner of Emmanuel waving in all its fulness over the vine-clad hills of Italy, the snow-capt hills of Siberia, and the burning sands of Africa—floating in triumph over all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth! In many places within our limits, one year has wrought a change astonishing to all.—And though the period may be still distant when all shall bear our name, yet we trust the present is the dawning of a day, when what is more essential will be accomplished, and all turned "from darkness to light, from error to truth, from sin to holiness, from hatred to love, from selfishness to liberality, from sorrow to joy, from hell to heaven," shall bow before one common throne, and offer up devotions on one common altar. It is indeed the harbinger of an era when the wail of woe shall yield to the peaceful workings of universal grace, the power of guilt to purity, and rebellion to obedience; when the desire for holiness and happiness shall be universal; when man shall be one in faith, one in hope, one in charity, one in spirit, one in love, and one in worship; when not a stone of the partition wall of bigotry, which now separates the different denominations, "shall be left upon another that shall not be thrown down;" but when all, prelibating in the prospect of the destruction of hell and the devil, the deliverance of a world from all the evils that infect it, the consummation of the prayers of all good men, and the desires of all saints, and the joys of an endless association in the immortal world above, shall surround one common table in commemoration of the sufferings of Him who shed his blood on Calvary's brow to ransom all from guilt. Such are the bright prospects that present themselves to our view.

But notwithstanding all the advances that have been made, it must be admitted that much yet remains to be performed to accomplish so desirable an object. Ignorance, bigotry, intolerance and superstition to a considerable extent are still to be removed; and the question naturally arises, What measures are best calculated to accomplish so glorious a purpose? We answer, the general diffusion of information. A knowledge of the truth is what is needed to lead men to embrace and love it. We know not a man of any denomination, who is well acquainted with our peculiar views, and who at the same time is their superstitious and bigoted opposer. Ignorance is the most powerful adversary we have to encounter. Now, what means within our reach are most conducive to its removal? We answer:

1st. The more extensive circulation of our periodicals, and the establishment of Universalist Libraries. Our periodicals can be more widely circulated, and Universalist libraries established in many places where the friends can not support the stated administration of the word. And where the Gospel is regularly dispensed, they may carry the glad tidings of salvation to multitudes who would never receive them from any other source in time; those who are deprived by sickness or infirmity of listening to the preacher's voice; "the timid maiden who fears the unmoving finger of scorn, and the detestable man—if man he may be called"—who worships the God of popularity, basks in his smiles and trembles at his frowns, may partake the oil and consolation which they impart. They improve those who can not, and are secretly and attentively read by others who, from various reasons, will not attend our meetings. They melt mountains of prejudice which otherwise might remain till the Almighty softens all hearts, and prepares them for the joys of immortal felicity. Their influence is powerful, their benefits incalculable. They keep many a youth from the scenes of folly, and the haunts of idleness and dissipation. And were they extensively circulated in every place, many who now spend their Sabbaths in strolling over the fields, and in holiday amusements, would read them, behold piety displayed in a most lovely and attractive light, embrace it, and perhaps be saved from vice and the perpetration of crimes.

The power of the press is inconceivable. Though not omnipotent, it is almost boundless; and though not omnipresent, it spreads the same truth before thousands at one and the same time. Its productions remain for examination, reflection and re-perusal, long after most information received from the desk has been forgotten. It enlightens the ignorant, awakens the indifferent, instructs the inquiring, corrects the opposing, establishes the wavering, and prepares the way for multitudes of societies, preachers and temples of religious worship. Then let each of us see all of our neighbors whom we can probably persuade to subscribe and pay for our periodicals, and induce them so to do. Let our rich friends send for as large a number as they are able, and circulate them among opposers who will read them, and brethren who are poor. Let every reasonable exertion be made to increase their patronage, and our proprietors, publishers, and editors, will realize that compensation for their services which they so justly earn, and really need, but seldom have received. Under such circumstances our papers will improve and prosper, the intellectual and religious energies of their conductors be stimulated to new and increased exertion, and a flame of gratitude rise from the bosoms of conductor and patron for the mutual benefits conferred. Neither the unparalleled depression in business, the consequent diminution of circulation, the bankruptcy of subscribers, impossibility of collecting many of their wide-spread dues, nor even the danger of involving themselves in pecuniary ruin, has yet prevented them from week to week from bearing to thousands of hungry souls a rich "a rich feast of fat things." And a Universalist public never can become so insensible to justice—much less to gratitude—as to demand that they should fill so responsible stations, and perform so arduous tasks, without they strive to encourage, remunerate, and competently support them. Universalists profess to be Christians, and Christianity teaches that every man must live by his calling; and that "he that provideth not for his own, and especially for those of his own household, has denied the faith and is worse than an infidel."—Hence if we demand the continuance of our periodicals, and feel interested for the prosperity of our cause, let us, one and all, sacrifice a little time and make a laudable effort to sustain them. Let us say it must, IT SHALL be done, and act accordingly, and the work will be accomplished and truth promoted. And let me add, it can be accomplished in no other way.

In every place where ten or more dollars can be raised for such a purpose, (and where is the neighborhood that can not do this?) let a committee be appointed to purchase books and pamphlets, and a Universalist library be established, well regulated, open to all under reasonable restrictions, enlarged as means will permit, and governed as circumstances shall demand. Let opposers be invited to draw and read upon the same conditions as friends, and if desired so to do, let us peruse works advocating their sentiments in return. A few individuals united could easily purchase a quantity of books, containing the requisite information to impart a thorough understanding of our views, for an expense to each comparatively trifling, but which one alone might never feel able to bear. If no opposer could ever be induced to peruse them; if they never should be instrumental in bringing a single person to a knowledge of the truth, the peace and joy they would bestow upon present believers, and the weapons with which they would arm them to triumphantly defend and maintain their sentiments against all opposition, would be a sufficient reason in favor of their establishment. But thousands would be induced to read them, the scales would fall from their eyes, and they "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." Then let us not only talk but act. Let our preachers and most influential and energetic friends declare that the work shall be performed, and beams of light and truth will be poured upon myriads of our race, and transmitted to future generations, who will arise, bless our names, venerate our memories, and shed the tear of gratitude over our graves.

2d. Another measure we would recommend as well calculated to further the cause of Zion is, to immediately organize a society in every place, where there are a dozen individuals, old and young, male and female of unblemished reputations who believe in the universal love of almighty God, and a sufficient number for officers of which are males. Let them adopt a constitution which provides a way to exclude all members whose deportment shall ever prove inconsistent with the claims of the Gospel and the well-being of the society. Then let it be enforced indiscriminately, whenever necessary, and they will be freed from the prejudice-fostering and pernicious influence of the vile.

If they are unable to support preaching, at least one-fourth of the time, let them meet together every Sabbath to sing, pray, exhort, confer with one another upon the glad tidings of the kingdom, and let them read some interesting published sermon not generally circulated among them, and our books and periodicals will be brought into notice, our views promulgated, contentions quelled, our religious gifts improved, our hearts cemented in the bonds of love, and Zion decked in her most beautiful garments. A united movement of this description would soon enable them to procure a preacher, and eventually a temple of worship. The history of the temperance reform, and of almost all parties and sects, shows how much can be accomplished by organization and united effort. The advocates of partial grace believe that God will do far less for man than our faith teaches us to expect, and consequently should not feel under as many obligations to love, serve and obey him. And while they meet for successive days, and nights, and even weeks to worship him, to our disgrace shall it be said that we can not meet one day in seven, for so laudable a purpose, without we are blessed with a preacher's presence? "Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph."

We are no advocate for the abuses and excesses which too often characterize the popular worship of the day, but while we reject the evil let us carefully cling to the good. That man exhibits but little wisdom who starves himself, or refuses to slake his thirst because food has been made subservient to gluttony, or an excessive quantity of water to instant dissolution. Gold is none the less valuable because it has been hoarded by the miser, or because the love of it has led to knavery and the perpetration of daring crimes. So religious worship is no less our privilege and duty, because of the unwarrantable fanaticism of some professed servants of God.

In every neighborhood where there are less than a dozen, and one or more friends of impartial grace, let our condition and numbers be ascertained and reported to some clergyman of our order, and he be invited to visit them and proclaim the Gospel to them, as often as the means they can impart will enable him to do so. Instead, as many now do, of rearing with one hand and demolishing with the other, professing to believe in the final holiness and happiness of all men, and bestowing money and lending their influence to the inculcation of the dogma of endless wo—instead of striving to worship God and Baal at one and the same time—let the course above noticed be pursued, and universal grace will be proclaimed in every town, its banner wave triumphant over those places where as yet it has seldom if ever been unfurled; but where the soul-chilling, peace-destroying doctrines of men, derogatory to the character of God, the truths of Christianity, and the well-being of humanity, have reigned with nearly unlimited sway.

3d. A third means of promoting the prosperity of Universalism, is, to induce all our societies to contribute with their utmost abilities to support the Gospel ministry. Were this done, many societies would not only support double the preaching they now do, but our ministers would be much better sustained, their hardships immeasurably lightened, and many others induced to enter their Master's vineyard. But it is a fact that many of our ministering brethren toil incessantly, and frequently obtain with difficulty the necessaries of life, while their employers oftentimes roll in affluence, and pay but a trifle for their support. Those who spend all their time and devote all their energies, physical and mental, to the service of Christianity, should be kept from poverty and all its attendant evils. Preaching is acknowledged to be indispensably necessary to the advancement of truth, and yet many talented and faithful heralds of the cross, have reduced themselves to want, in endeavoring to enlighten their fellow-beings, enhance their joy and increase their happiness. I consider it proper for me to allude to these things, my friends, in behalf of my brethren in the ministry, because no one acquainted with me, and the circumstances under which I have labored since I entered the Gospel field, will accuse me of speaking particularly for my own personal benefit. If any think me actuated by sinister motives in adverting to this subject, I ask not their attention—for I deem them unworthy of it. But though, comparatively speaking, I have been highly favored, and have no cause of complaint, yet others, at least equally deserving, have encountered the evils to which I have adverted. Then remember, my friends, that however much your ministers may be honored and praised, such alone will never feed and clothe them. They are at your mercy, and we trust you will soon remedy the evils which they have too long and patiently suffered, and your consciences will smile upon and bless you for your kindness.

4th. Another means of building up the walls of Zion, is the establishment of Sabbath schools, and the religious instruction of the youth. There is a lamentable indifference existing among us upon this subject—there being not one school within the limits of this Association. If the aged will remember the events of their youth long after those of after years are obliterated; if the impressions of early life are so permanent that they can not be effaced by time, or dissipated by sickness, drunkenness, or even insanity—as facts abundantly prove they are—ought not Universalists to exert themselves, by all honorable means, to impart their soul cheering, peace-giving views, to their children and all under their care? Do any object to the religious education of their children because it may be erroneous? So may literary instruction, and who will deprive their offspring of its benefits for this reason? Do any contend that their judgments are too weak to enable them to decide betwixt truth and error? When will they acquire the necessary strength if they are left wholly uninformed—kept in total ignorance upon the subject? When think you that a man destitute of any information relative to the character of Martin Van Buren or Henry Clay, and obtaining no knowledge of either, would be qualified to decide which is best calculated for a President of the United States? If you would have him prepared to act rationally and consistently, you would instruct him upon the subject. The same is true of religious opinions. The attainment of Christian knowledge should be a portion of the business of every person in life. It makes him wiser—it can make him better here, and it "will constitute the happiness and glory of the eternal world."—"It is ecstatic in enjoyment, perennial in fame, unlimited in space, and infinite in duration."—And if children do not embrace truth, they will imbibe error. The mind will not long remain a blank. It is true, we believe, that others, though undesignedly, are poisoning the minds of their children with erroneous and pernicious sentiments, but who would not supply their offspring with food and drink because poisons have sometimes been infused into them? The fact that error is inculcated by others, should induce us to rear the temple of truth in the hearts of ours, that they may be effectually fortified against every assault of the adversary.

In youth too, the mind is the most susceptible and capable of instruction, and information then imparted, more useful than at any other period in life. Then let the young be made acquainted with the Bible—and particularly that part of it which treats of the parables, miracles, words and deeds, life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ—let it be impressed upon their minds with all its animation, truth and force—let them learn the situation of the country in which he lived; the customs, characters, faith, hopes, expectations, and superstitions of the people among whom he resided; the causes of the opposition against which he had to contend; and the character of his defenders. Let them see him, in dress and occupation, a carpenter—followed by those who were illiterate, plain in their appearance, and awkward in their manners, and who were wont to toil for a living—despised by the proud and earthly minded, astonishing the ignorant, healing the diseased, pleasing the pure in heart, and imparting instruction upon the mountain top and the sea shore, in the temple dedicated to religious service, and in the open field—and they have something of the powers of his mind, the glory of his nature, the height of his wisdom, the depth of his devotion, the purity of his motives, and the extent of his love to his fellow-beings.—They will be enabled to understand many passages of Scripture, of which they would otherwise long remain ignorant. They will admire and imitate his spirit, and perceive the great object of his mission, and exultingly look forward to the period when salvation! salvation! shall burst from every lip, and joy and gladness, and songs of praise, be felt and heard throughout the vast domains of God. If you desire that your children should be free from sour-hearted bigotry and soul-withering fanaticism on the one hand, and cold skepticism on the other—neither "living without God and hope in the world," or dreading and yet believing in eternal annihilation, nor with an imagined, frowning, fickle monarch above them, and an everlasting hell beneath them—if you wish them to be quiet and peaceable Christians, "abounding in every good word and work," and possessing the disposition of their Lord and Master, teach them that they have a God on high, in whom they can confide as their everlasting Benefactor, unchanging Friend, and eternal Father; and a Saviour, whose benevolence is as broad as creation, whose love is deeper than hell, higher than the heaven of heavens, and as lasting as eternity, and that all on earth, of every nation, kindred and tongue, are brothers and sisters of one great family, journeying to a common home—make them realize these truths, and feel in their hearts their consequent duties and obligations to their Creator, and all their fellow-creatures, and they are fortified in every temptation, sustained in every trial, healed in every disease, and comforted in every affliction.

These truths lead us to lean on an Almighty arm for direction in youth, guidance in active life, support in old age, deliverance in every difficulty, refuge in every sorrow, salvation in every danger, and life even in death. They are a "balm for every wound, a cordial for every fear," a chart and compass to safely guide us amid the rocks, shoals and quicksands of the ocean of life, a song in the hour of dissolving nature, a star as abiding as God's throne, far shining through the weeping skies, and lighting the road through death's dark vale to the haven of eternal rest.—They give us peace with God and our consciences—peace in prosperity and adversity, in health and sickness—peace when we are here, and when we go hence "to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns." Are not these sentiments important? Would they not soothe many pangs of grief, bind up many broken hearts, dry many fountains of tears, and save thousands from despair, insanity and suicide, deliver those who have been swayed from the path of rectitude, who have been tempted to partake of the forbidden fruit, and lulled into false security till resistance becomes powerless, from their wretched situations, set them again sailing down the stream of time with fair skies and propitious breezes, and guide many now hopeless, comfortless pilgrims of earth across its fertile plains and barren deserts, and over the Jordan of death, to the ocean of infinite Love? Would they not crush the walls of every prison and penitentiary, crumble even the pillars of hell, and deliver millions of victims from those ever consuming fires of conscience which burn within, and are as deadly to all rational joy as the Simoom of the desert is to life?

Give a man the philosophy of a Newton, the fame of a Cicero, the power of an Alexander, or the wealth of India, and without piety he is sailing a vast unknown, with no established principles to direct his course. But with the Gospel to guide him on the journey of life, he can be wrecked by no storm, overturned by no wave.—It is better to be a slave and crouch before the lash of a cruel master—to be scourged, imprisoned, or even put to an ignominious death, and know God, perform the duties we owe him and our kindred race, and here enjoy eternal life, than, destitute of it, to be the proudest monarch that ever possessed a throne. It is productive of vastly more happiness. Nought this side of heaven can mitigate the undying gnawings of guilt, which, though surrounded by all the pomp and splendor of kings, would still goad us on in the way of despair and death. It is as much, fond parent, your duty to supply the wants of the moral nature of your child, as of his physical nature.

If you need the word of God to direct you in the path of rectitude, and a knowledge of his protecting care, universal paternity, and illimitable grace, to call every noble, latent energy of your nature into vigorous action, so do your children, who are alike clothed with flesh and blood, subject to vanity, imperfection and sin, and exposed to difficulties and dangers. Would you benefit your offspring? Then let these truths, which are so vitally important to the happiness of man, be the first that are instilled into their youthful bosoms, that they may rely upon the promises of the Almighty and drink the waters of salvation. And what place is better calculated to impart this instruction than a Sabbath school? "I speak as to wise men, judge ye what I say."

5th. A fifth means of extending a knowledge of the truth, and the last which we shall particularly notice on this occasion, is to live our faith—to live it "by a well ordered life and godly conversation." This is incalculably more important than all other means without it. Universal love can exert a power when fear of every kind must fail. The threatenings of no law, human or divine, can purify the heart or cleanse the fountain from whence proceed the "issues of life."—They can never annihilate the causes of evil, nor create the principles of goodness. They may restrain men from the commision of daring crimes, but can never rectify the heart, or rule the motive, the mainspring of human action. Search the wide creation round, and whenever the intentions of a "man are right, no matter what his creed may be, he is prompted to obedience by love, and love only. Hence the great purpose of Christianity can never be accomplished by preaching terror. And hence the superiority of our system over all others. It reaches the heart; and all men who act from principle, act according to it, and all men who do not thus act, act in opposion to it, whatever views they may profess. And hence also the importance of living it. Brethren and sisters, our faith is perfect. It as far surpasses, and widely differs from, the noblest principle of Partialism, as does the light of the sun from total darkness. Entertaining as we do, the noblest conceptions of the character of God and the result of his moral government; of our duties to him, ourselves, our fellow-race; and of our final destiny, we should at all times strive to crush every evil feeling, desire, and thought, as well as action—to exercise charitable and forgiving dispositions, maintain unblemished Christian characters, and stern and unyielding determinations to perform all reasonable requirements. We should love God supremely, man universally—even our enemies—"bless them that curse us, do good to those who despitefully use us," and pray for those that persecute us. We should not "be overcome of evil," but "overcome evil with good," "do good to all to the extent of our abilities, and thereby become imitators and practical "followers of God as dear children." "For he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust;" "is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works;" "is love;" "loveth all the things that are, and abhorreth nothing that his hands have made," for he never would have created any thing to have hated it. "He is a just God and a Saviour," and will therefore "have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth."

We should be patient in all the vexations, and resigned to all the allotments, of life. Our hope should be anchored within the vail; our faith should be firm as the pillars of God's throne, and should govern our conduct. This the world have a right to demand. Our lives should exemplify the attributes of Jehovah. They should be a practical commentary upon his word. But it is a truth—alas! a painful, a melancholy, a degrading truth! that while there are worshippers at the shrine of Partialism, who with all their imperfections are almost infinitely better than their creeds, there are yet some in this day of light and knowledge, who advocate the only principles that can be practiced without deluging earth in crimes; who fall so immeasurably short of living their faith, as to exhibit the very counterpart of those awful scenes, which the advocates of a false theology believe and teach. Inconsistency of all inconsistencies!

My friends, "let us fight the good fight of faith," and so fight as to conquer. Let us present that argument which will incalculably outweigh all others combined, however reasonable and convincing they may appear. In all our dealings and social relations, let us not only talk but preach our doctrine—preach it in an overpowering manner, not only in our words but in our actions; adorn it in all things, aid the needy, "visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions," enlighten our understandings, strengthen our holy resolutions, "keep ourselves unspotted from the world," exhibit the fruits of the spirit, love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness and temperance, "strive together for the furtherance of the Gospel," "depart from all iniquity," "let our light so shine before men that they may see our good works and glorify our Father who is in heaven," "for if these things be in us and abound, we shall be neither barren nor unfruitful in the work of the Lord," but shall be enabled to do more than, destitute of them, could be performed by all the eloquence of earth combined with the tongues of angels.

My friends, let the means of which I have spoken be put in operation. Let our societies, periodicals, and preachers, be well supported; new societies be organized, and assemble for worship every Sabbath, whether they have preaching or not; our condition be ascertained in every place, and every friend be active to improve it; let Universalist Libraries and Sabbath schools be instituted; and in addition to these things, whenever circumstances are favorable to so desirable an object, let churches be organized and the ordinances administered to all such as esteem it a duty or a privilege to observe them; and at the same time let us be careful not to mistake the shadows for the substances, but remember that every substance has a shadow, and look upward to the throne of God for the realization and full fruition of the scenes we celebrate; and above all, and more than all, let us live our faith, and error will quail before the power of truth.

But if we disregard our Bibles, neglect the institutions of Christianity, and the means of promoting our cause; if we are absent from our meetings without they chance to be in our immediate neighborhoods, or attend and sleep away the hours of worship, the seed sown in us is like that which falls by the way side, in stony places, or among thorns, and the world never will conclude that there is any thing good in our doctrine while they behold us so indifferent and dronish in our Master's hive. But if from day to day we derive instruction from the word, and strive to promote the cause of God—if from Sabbath to Sabbath, we wend our way, with our families and friends, to the temple of devotion, and listen with satisfaction to the promulgation of the Gospel; the world will conclude that that is salutary and important in which we feel so deep an interest, and which so favorably affects our actions, and men will be induced to read our works and hear our ministers, until they rejoice in the full expectations of sharing immortal bliss with a ransomed, redeemed, and regenerated world in the paradise above. Wherever public opinion is enlightened upon the subject of Universalism, opposition recedes. Some of our opposers are aware of this, and use all their exertions to keep the people in ignorance. But the work is commenced, and in every respect progresses; and shall it not be consummated and our hills and vallies echo and re-echo with the praises of God?

Let us consider that we have an enemy yet to encounter. Though often conquered, he still lives, seducing the children of God, desolating the fair portions of human society, causing tears to flow and hearts to tremble. His course is marked by the moan of the orphan, the groans of the captive, the sighs and tears of the mourner, and the ravings of the maniac. He fills the asylums of the insane, the haunts of vice, and the dens of infamy. He blasts the brightest prospects, withers the fairest hopes, clouds the loveliest brows, and blights the noblest works of the Almighty. Shall sin continue to curse, and error to condemn the world to wretchedness and ruin, or will you, humbly and constantly relying on Heaven for aid, say that the chariot wheels of the reformation shall roll on, that our works and periodicals shall be circulated in every family, our cause progress in every place, believers multiply in every section, societies be organized in every town, temples be reared in every village, and future generations escape the curse consequent upon believing in endless suffering, come to the knowledge of the truth, and worship God in the beauty of holiness? Could the world feel the power of truth, wrongs of every kind would forever cease. Just in proportion as we are judiciously active, we are aiding in producing so desirable a state. Then let us strive to emancipate man from sin, misery and every moral ill, and our cause will prosper, God be glorified, and the world continually grow wiser, better and happier. Let us be active in our several spheres and neighborhoods, and use all the powers that God has bestowed upon us to extend his cause. Let us never become cold or indifferent, and sleep on and on, regardless of the reign of God or satan. Our own peace and welfare, our duty to ourselves, our relatives, our friends, our enemies, the whole world, and above all to our God—every principle of philanthropy, every spark of love that beams within our bosoms, for universal happiness demands that we never lay down the arms of our spiritual warfare till our eyes are closed in death—or the monster is exterminated—his throne totally demolished, his subjects wrested from his service, and a lost and ransomed world sound the loud clarion of victory from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. The welfare of near 900,000,000 of immortal beings, the salvation of the ruined myriads of creation implores us to "raise the shout onward, ONWARD, and still ONWARD, and our work is done. Nay, more: God himself calls upon us to labor, and directs us to take the field."

"To arms! to arms! I hear him cry,
'Tis your's to conquer or to die."
"Lift your banner—let it wave—
Onward march a world to save."
"Give the aching bosom rest—
Carry joy to every breast—"
"God of mercy! hear us plead—
For thy help we intercede!"
"Hasten Lord the happy day,
When truth shall rule eternally."

Brethren and sisters, the subject is before you. My object is not novelty or originality, but utility. I have spoken of subjects that are of the utmost importance to the prosperity of truth. They may have been before adverted to, but several of them are yet sadly neglected. And though I have failed to do them justice, I have done the best I could according to the ability which hath been given me, and the limited time my health and avocations permitted me to occupy. Let something be done and done soon. Let us all live our faith. If there are any who will not, let us separate the wheat from the chaff, preserve the former and rid ourselves of the latter, and God will bless our exertions. And when we assemble on the returning anniversary of our Association, and the inquiry shall be, "Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?" the "Watchmen will lift up their voices together," and exclaim, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." In conclusion, my friends, let us live and die in peace and love with God and all men, and when we shall have passed away from earth like the ripple upon the sea, may the broad banner of love which we have so faithfully defended, both by word and deed, float over our graves, and our spirits soar aloft "to the Master of assemblies, in the realms of celestial glory, to hold an eternal convocation around the throne, to adore the excellence, praise the goodness, and sing the love of God—the song of Moses and the Lamb, of angels and archangels," with every creature in heaven, on the earth, and under the earth, where incense shall rise from every heart, thanksgiving tune every voice, gratitude fill every bosom, and a regenerated world forever bask in the smiles of approving Heaven. AMEN.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE HOMELESS STRANGER.

BY J. S. KIBBE.

"I have no father there," exclaimed the little wanderer, who in the providence of God had been deprived of the only remaining friend on earth, and was now left without a guide, and with no hand to administer to his wants, and no fortune but the charities of a cold and unfeeling world. He stood upon the threshold of a stately mansion, where plenty smiled, and joy sparkled in each eye. Within, an aged sire's bosom swelled with intonations of gladness, as he looked around and beheld the countenance of each of the little group that formed his fireside circle, sweetly blooming beneath the garland of health, and happiness, and peace softly beaming from each joy-lit eye. Sorrow was a stranger to their bosoms, for its bleak wintry winds had never assailed their frail barks as they floated upon life's changeful sea, or swept across their youthful brows, leaving their gloom deeply painted there; but Hope, the sweet singer, harped her songs of delight in their ears, as she mounted on her pinions of gold to the throne of heaven, and bright anticipation smiled in their path like an angel of peace. They had never bent in agony over the grave of a doating mother, or a solicitous father, whom love's magic spell could not save from the ruthless destroyer, for both lived to guide and protect the pledges of their early affections. The one followed them day after day with anxious care and solicitude for their future welfare and prosperity, and watched over them with the mellow light ever beaming from love's kindled eye—the other filled their minds with deep treasured thoughts of instruction, and wreathed with each thought, warm feelings and earnest desires for their well-being.

There stood the little wanderer, with the deep gloom of melancholy on his brow, and sorrow's impress visibly penciled upon his cheek, contrasting his own situation—with no father's friendly voice to guide him, and no fond mother to watch over him with the sleepless eye of affection—with that of the happy group before him, when one of the number, who had assembled around the plenteous board, beholding him standing at the door, raised his voice in sweet accents, saying—"Come, here is enough for us and for you." And with his sparkling eye and joyous smile, he seemed to say, Let sorrow flee from your heart—it is not meet that your young bosom should be chill with the cold frosts of grief, or that your eyes should be dim with the tear of anguish; but cheer up and be glad with us. The homeless stranger, with a deep sigh that plainly told he was a child of misfortune, meekly asked—"How shall I be glad when I am a homeless and friendless wanderer in the world? Or how shall I be joyous among strangers, as I partake of the bounties kind Heaven has bestowed on your labors, without I can meet the smiles of an affectionate mother!" And then he gently added—"I have no father there!" As this last sentence fell from his quivering lips, that cold and soul-withering sentiment, conceived (if possible) by hearts colder than itself, and propagated under the name of Christianity, and urged upon mankind as having fallen from the lips of the compassionate Redeemer, was uttered in his ears. It flowed in language like the following:—

"What countless hosts shall stand without
The heavenly threshold fair;
And gazing on the blest, exclaim,
'We have no father there!'"

This was the sentiment offered with a bitter sigh, as a consolation for the friendless mariner, crossing time's uncertain wave to the shores of eternity. It was not enough that he should experience the sufferings arising from the loss of a mother, whose tender care and love might pour their blessings upon her child—and of a father's, too, whose waking hours were spent in giving instructions to his child to guide him in the path of virtue and happiness—I say, it was not enough that he should bear these sufferings, while he was a sojourner of time, where all is changing, fluctuating and unsatisfying, and where all is perishing and destined to pass away; but anguish, deep and abiding, must be added to his sorrowing bosom, conveying to his mind the idea that such will exist in the land of spirits, where he might reasonably hope for better things. What consolation this must be to his mourning and sinking spirit, that a separation from those whom he loved and adored on earth, as lasting as eternity, may take place in the world to come! What comfort this sentiment must be to the child of sorrow and mourning! And still, this sentiment is proclaimed to the young, the middle-aged and the aged travellers to another world, to console them in the time of mourning and the hour of dissolution; this is the cup presented to their feverish lips, to allay their sorrows and soothe their griefs; and this is the beacon lighted up in their bosoms to cheer them on life's darksome way, and cast its beams upon the future. But how poorly calculated is this sentiment to afford consolation for the wounded spirit, or support it in the moments of dissolving nature; how unfit for their sorrowing hearts, and their grief-worn bosomsr and how feeble is the light it casts upon the approaching future, to guide the homeward bound pilgrims on their journey!

Kind reader, may the consolations of that sentiment which tells of no separation in the world of spirits, be yours. May its joys cheer you on the journey of life, and smoothe the pillow of death; and may its light beaming upon the shores of the eternal world, guide you onward, and enable you to behold, in prospective view, yourself, your kindred and friends, together with the whole family of mankind, basking in the smiles of one eternal day.

REMARKS.

Since the organization of this Association, it has never been so well represented in council as at its last session. Nine societies sent delegates, and the news conveyed by our brethren, gave the full assurance that the cause of God's unlimited grace is in a more prosperous state than it was three years ago. At that time there was but one faithful sentinel upon the walls of our Zion here; now there are four heralds of the Cross, whose labors are mostly confined to the limits of this Association, all living within its bounds. Our future prosperity will depend upon our unity of feeling and concert of action, fervent and well directed zeal. We can not be too careful in watchfulness over our own hearts and conversation, and actions. It is to be regretted that in some places our friends become weary in well-doing so soon—that they should be so careless about attending public worship. It is impossible to sustain the preached word, if we neglect the assembling of ourselves together as the manner of some is. Brethren, I speak as unto wise people. If you would encourage the heart of your preacher, whether old or young—if you would secure your own spiritual happiness, and if you would build up the cause of our dear Redeemer, and put to silence the many hard sayings of our opposers, fail not to repair to the place of worship, when it is in your power to hear sentiments congenial with your views, and in accordance with the best feelings of our nature. There you will hear the glad sound of eternal truth and immortal life—there you should cherish the social as well as the devotional feelings, greet each other by the hand of friendship, and welcome the stranger to your house who may chance to attend your meeting. A very great amount of good would result to our cause, if our lay brethren would take this subject into consideration. I know of some who are quite loud in their complaints against the minister, because he does not build them up, who are entirely indifferent in this respect. Let each brother and sister do their duty in this particular, and especially in attending public worship; then our meetings would be much more interesting, and the evils we so much lament, and which retard our progress, would, in a great measure, be removed.

The weather was pleasant, and the congregations much larger than I anticipated seeing. We were kindly received by our worthy friends in Carroll, who had made full provision for all who came to unite in the joyful service of worshipping God. The solemn and pleasing exercises of celebrating our Lord's dying request, so refreshing to the hearts of many of our brethren, were participated in, with appropropriate remarks from Br. Adams, assisted by Br. Thornton. Two young brothers in the ministry, were received into fellowship, viz., Br. Seth W. Remmington, whose labors commenced last winter—he had received an invitation to settle in Boston, Erie county, and has since removed to that place—and Br. Joseph Eaton, who has made it his home with me since last fall, at Fredonia. I believe no notice has been given of his public labors, although his name has occasionally appeared in the Magazine and Advocate. He is a young man of good talents and irreproachable moral character. He also has received and accepted an invitation to settle with our friends at Salem ✕ Roads, (Portland.) Chautauque county. May those worthy young men be faithful to the good cause they have espoused—and may the great Head of the Church keep, prosper and preserve them and the people under their charge, and all of us, in the path of duty.

9. Accepted and adopted the following preamble and resolution, found in the minutes of this Association for 1836:—

Whereas facts within the knowledge of many of us, daily prove, that Universalist ministers are extremely liable, in consequence of circumstances beyond their control, in the discharge of their duty, to leave at their decease their families in destitute circumstances, almost, if not entirely, dependent on the cold charity of the world—therefore,

Resolved, That in our opinion a society should be organized within the limits of this Association, for the purpose of raising a fund to be appropriated for the relief of widows and orphans of deceased Universalist clergymen, who are left in indigent circumstances.

10. In furtherance of the object set forth in the foregoing resolution, the following instrument or pledge was drawn up and presented by Br. Cook, for the signatures of those present:—

We, the undersigned, pledge ourselves to become members of a society for the relief of the families of deceased Universalist clergymen, when (in connection with this Association) such a society shall be organized, provided the constitution of said society requires not an amount over one dollar as an initiatory fee, and an annual tax from each member of fifty cents.

REMARKS.

Seven sermons were preached on the occasion, by N. Brown, (occasional, to be published,) A. G. Clarke, Wm. Andrews, A. C. Barray, T. D. Cook and O. Ackley. In our council all was harmony and peace. Christian feeling was exercised in all our deliberations. In the evening of the first day, we had, besides a sermon, a Conference meeting, in which a warmth of rational devotion was manifested, that I have seldom witnessed. God grant that such meetings may be more common among us—that Universalists may often realize the benefits which they are calculated to impart to the soul. Brs. Ackley, Green, Andrews, Barray, Clarke and T. D. Cook, took part in the exercises. The singing throughout, was (said to be) good, being performed with "the spirit and with the understanding also." The kindness of our friends in Genoa, will long be gratefully remembered by those who attended from a distance. Oh, for a thousand blessings to rest upon them!

"Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptised, shall be saved; but he that believeth not, shall be damned."—Mark xvi: 15, 16.

"He that believeth not" the Gospel, "shall be damned"—or, as the judicious Geo. Campbell has it "shall be condemned." He affirms that the word damned "is not a just version" of the "Greek katakrino, which corresponds exactly with the English verb condemn."

This is a positive affirmation—"he that believeth not, shall be condemned"—whatever the condemnation is, there is no escape from it, if the unbelief be cherished. Admitting the common view of the passage to be correct, am I to understand that infants, idiots and heathen are all to be lost, because they die without believing the Gospel? My answer is—"he that believeth not, shall be damned"—there is no escape without belief—consequently they must be lost, if the passage countenances the popular explanation which is given of it. Yet, who, in these days, believes in infant destruction, and pouring a storm of unceasing vengeance upon a heathen, for not believing a system which he had never heard? These opinions are received only as fit company for the vagaries of Salem witchcraft. Yet the common notion of this passage involves those doctrines!

I hold it a self-evident truth, that there can be no merit attached to rational belief, nor demerit to rational unbelief, for the reflecting mind must decide according to the testimony presented. If I am told that twice two make five, it would be an utter impossibility for me to believe it—and it would be the essence of cruelty to think of punishing me for that unbelief. But my mind can not resist the conviction that twice two makes four, because it is mathematical demonstration—hence, there can be no merit to such belief.

So stands faith in relation to the Gospel. The Gospel may be called the truth of God, but if that Gospel be so represented as to exhibit obvious contradictions, manifest cruelties and absurd principles, which can have no kindred with the attributes of the Deity, the reflecting mind, from the nature of its constitution, must reject that Gospel. But where is the fault? Surely not in the mind, for that can not believe a plain contradiction. The fault is in the system itself, or in the method of representing it; for if it presents cruelties and absurdities, it can no more generate faith in the mind than ice can produce heat. On the other hand, if the Gospel, which is asserted to be of God, is consistent with itself, harmonious throughout, agrees with the character of Deity, and presents principles which aim to make man better and happier, then it will as readily produce faith in the mind, as the rain of the cloud and the heat of the sun will cause the germ of the seed to unfold itself. Yet there can be no merit to such belief—you might as well say that the judge deserves a great reward for believing testimony which is so clear as to carry conviction with it. It is the operation of testimony upon the reasoning faculties of the mind. It is plain that the mere act of believing a principle whose truth we can not resist, has no merit; nor is it demeritorious to disbelieve that which appears contrary to evidence. Hence, the assertion that heaven is ours for believing the Gospel, or that hell is ours for not believing the Gospel, has no foundation in truth—consequently, one of two things must be true: either the text is not correct, or people have mistaken its meaning.

What, then, is the meaning of the text? This question we shall endeavor to answer by considering—1. What is the Gospel?—"Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." 2. What is the salvation?—"He that believeth and is baptised, shall be saved." 3. What is damnation?—"He that believeth not, shall be damned."

I. What is the Gospel? "The Gospel," says Butterworth, "signifies good news or glad tidings—it comprehends all those doctrines of love, grace and mercy, discovered in the complete salvation of sinners." In its more extended meaning, "the Gospel of Christ" embraces the whole system of Christianity. The system of Jesus is formed of certain leading truths. The first leading truth is, the future immortality of the human mind, a deathless existence for the intellect of every child of God. "As in Adam all die, even so, in Christ shall all be made alive."—1 Cor. xv: 22. The second leading truth is, that Christ shall save his people from their sins," (Matt. i: 21,)—or as Paul expresses it, "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."—2 Cor. v: 19. To enable the Saviour to effect this great object, God hath absolutely given him all power in heaven and in earth over every creature.—Matt. xxviii: 18. Hence Deity said, "Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession."—Ps. ii: 8. Hence our Saviour said, "the Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands."—John iii: 35. To save these individuals from sin, Christ gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time—he tasted death for every man—he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.

This object Christ will effect. The plan was conceived in infinite wisdom, made known by divine love, while almighty power is engaged in its execution.—Christ died to effect it, God sent him to fulfil it, and man stands in need of it. It is founded on the promises made known to Abraham, that in his seed, which is Christ, all the families, kindreds and nations of the earth should be blessed. It is the burden of prophecy, in which we are taught, not only that every tongue shall confess, "In the Lord have I righteousness and strength," but that Christ shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. In view of its truth, Paul affirmed, that when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be come in, all Israel shall be saved; while in animating strains he declared that God will gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and on earth, even in him. In testimony clear to the mind and pleasant to the heart, we are assured, that not only shall we live hereafter, but we shall "become equal to the angels of God."

The e glorious truths form the Gospel of Christ, and are connected with a system of moral practice on earth, which is made up of benevolence, virtue, honesty and righteousness. Hence, this Gospel was emphatically good news to man, as the angel said to the trembling shepherds—"Fear not; for behold! I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people, "(Luke ii: 10)—at which annunciation, there appeared "suddenly with the angel, a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace, good will towards men." This glorious Gospel the apostles were commanded to preach—but why? Because, 1. It meets the wants of men. The soul as truly yearns for life beyond the to mb, as the needle points to the North. Neither philosophy nor nature can satisfy that desire. But Christianity advanced to the tomb, broke down its gates and cast its keys into the depths of oblivion, and lighted up a torch even in the gloom of the valley of death, which flung such a flood of glory around, that the shores of immortality are visible beyond, and so death was robbed of its sting, and the grave of its victory. 2. It pointed out to man the path of his duty here, and sought to fix him in its discharge by the love of God. 3. It is a great and noble truth; consequently the world was interested in it, and it was productive of joy to make it known. 4. It had power to reclaim the erring, give virtue to the sinner, patience to the sick, confidence to the dying, and hope to the mourning. Hence Christ said to the apostles, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." Such is the Gospel.

II. What is the salvation consequent upon a belie in the Gospel? From the view of the Gospel which has been given, and the universality of its promulgation, it is evident that it is wholly repugnant to the common view which is taken of the text—for no contradiction can be more plain, than to establish a truth whose object is to reconcile all things, and, at the same time, make the consequences of disbelieving it, endless wo; for to destroy a single individual, is to falsify the very object of the Gospel. Let it be well remembered, that this salvation and damnation do not form the Gospel itself, but are consequences which flow from a reception or rejection of it. The Gospel is good news—the command was, "preach the Gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptised shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned." From this, does it not appear evident, that it is one thing to preach the Gospel, and quite another to state the consequences which descend upon its believer or unbeliever? And we freely avow that we see no reason for supposing that the result of simple belief is infinite enjoyment; because the Scriptures represent infinite happiness to be strictly the gift of God; nor that the result of unbelief is ceaseless wo, since such a notion not only militates with the very object of the Gospel, but is so wholly disproportionate to the supposed offence, as to leave it very questionable whether any power but cruelty could inflict it.

People mistake very much about the word save. It by no means denotes the evil itself from which a person is to be saved. Hence, when the ship in which Paul sailed to Rome, went ashore, and the soldiers thought of killing him with the rest of the prisoners, we read—"But the centurion, willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose."—Acts xxvii: 43. Save Paul from what? Why, from the design of the soldiers to kill him. In 1 Pet. iii: 20, we read, that in the time of Noah, eight souls were saved in the ark by water—that is, saved from drowning. In Matt. i: 21, we are certified, that Jesus shall save his people from their sins. But in no instance do the Scriptures tell of saving people from ceaseless wo.

The term saved, in the passage under consideration, may have a limited signification. It is well known that the apostles, even to the last moment previous to the ascension of Christ, were inclined to unbelief—so much so, that when after the resurrection of Jesus, they met him by appointment at a mountain in Galilee, some doubted.—Matt. xxviii: 17. Had the apostles continued in this unbelief, they would have experienced condemnation in the signal overthrow and terrible calamities which came upon their nation. But they believed, and as a consequence, they were saved from the horrid evils which Titus flung upon their nation. It is not necessary to go into a future world to find the salvation which flows from belief. What says our Saviour!—"Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life."—John v: 24. "He that believeth on me, hath everlasting life"—vi: 47. An individual who exercised belief in the Gospel, was saved from the evils in which he had previously been enveloped—he found peace in believing, while he enjoyed the eternal life of knowing the true God and his Son. It was so Paul was saved. When he became a believer in Christ, he lost the evils of a persecuting spirit, and was delivered from the power of error. All the primitive Christians were saved by belief from error and sin; and when the storm of destruction fell upon the Jews, they were exempt from it, and were taken from its grasp.

A knowledge of the Gospel confers salvation in the present world from sin, from error and from fears of death. Do you see an individual who has drowned his intellect in intemperance, and cursed his family by his vice, influenced by faith in Christ to forsake his evil habits, to once more become an ornament to community and a blessing to his wife and children?—such a man is saved! Do you see a man whose faith has made him afraid, who has shed the scalding tears of bitterness, who has been gloomy, losing all the enjoyment of his existence; yet, by faith in Christ, becoming reconciled to God, giving up his gloominess, his fears, his doubts, and rejoicing with joy unspeakable and full of glory?—such a man is saved! Do you see a man who once was afraid of death; yet, when brought down to his end, by faith in Christ exhibiting no fear, but even in the presence of dissolution singing a song of triumph and joy?—such a man is saved! And while we do know that a belief in the Gospel produces such effects, we need not wonder that Paul should say—"Who (Christ) gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world." Gal. i: 4. The salvation arising from belief, is confined to this life, and does not extend beyond it. And why any person should suppose that our future bliss in another world, depends upon the exercise of faith here, I am at a loss to conceive, since Paul expressly declares—"By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast."—Eph. ii: 8, 9.

In obedience to the commands of Christ, the apostles did preach the Gospel in all the known nations, and the multitudes who received it were emphatically saved.—On the day of Pentecost 3000 were added to the church, and they were saved from the bigotry of the Jews and the destruction of their nation. The Gentiles, who embraced Christ, were saved from paganism, and all the vices attendant upon it. This was the effect of the Gospel—viz., to save from error and vice, and give an abundant peace and joy, which were all confined to this state of existence.

CONSCIENTIOUSNESS—A PRESENT PUNISHER.

The last error, implied, if not directly taught, in the excellent work of Messrs. Fowlers and Kirkham on Phrenology, which I shall notice, is contained in the following extract taken from page 135. They are arguing against "the doctrine, that the goadings of a guilty conscience in this life, constitute the only punishment for sin."

"Now, by proving that the principle of accountability, which necessarily implies accompanying rewards and punishments, enters into the very nature and constitution of man, [admitted]—that men are punishable for their sins, and punishable in proportion to their guilt, [admitted]—and that Conscientiousness inflicts the lightest punishment upon those who are the most guilty [proven to be wrong], Phrenology proves that there is some other punishment for sin than the goadings of a guilty conscience [the truth of this depends on the meaning of the word "sin"], which, taken in conjunction with the fact, that those who sin most, often suffer least in other respects, and that the righteous are often severely afflicted in this life, [admitted,] brings us to the inevitable conclusion [which is, after all, a non sequiter], that these rewards and punishments, which must be inflicted somewhere, are reserved for administration in another state of existence."

I have added brief comments in brackets [], that the reader may see exactly, and at a glance, wherein I differ from the authors. And, before I proceed to the refutation of the sentiment contained in the latter part of the quoted paragraph, I wish to state, that I give my views, for which the denomination is responsible only so far as they agree to them, and that I would not be understood to oppose the doctrine of a moral discipline in another state of being, by which the mind of man may be improved, and ultimately brought to holiness and happiness. My aim is the refutation of false principles, which, if carried out, would lead to establish the doctrine of endless sinning and suffering; and to show "that the principle of accountability," which "enters into the very nature and constitution of man" in this state of being, "necessarily implies accompanying [and not merely following-after] rewards and punishments," and that, therefore, "men are punishable [and punished] for their sins, and punishable [and punished] in proportion to their guilt."

If by "sin" is meant the violation of any law which God has established in nature or in his moral government, then "there is some other punishment for sin than the goadings of a guilty conscience," and in this life, too; but if by "sin" is meant merely the transgression of the law of the sinner's understanding of moral right, then there is not any other "punishment for sin than the goadings of a guilty conscience," either in this life, or in another state of existence, supposing sin to exist in any other state. Nor (unless Messrs. Fowlers intend to punish the sinner by outward tortures of material fires, etc.,) can I imagine what other punishments than the goadings of a guilty conscience, they expect will be inflicted in another state of existence. And if, as they (erroneously) declare, "the punishment inflicted by Conscientiousness" in this life, is "most severe upon those who are least deserving of it," and the next state is analogous to this, (as they argue, pp. 135, 136,) it appears to me that the saints will be worst off to all eternity!

Their argument for "some other punishment," is based on analogy, and drawn from premises so erroneous, that, if admitted, they would overturn their analogy!—For instance, compare these two classes of assertions—"Conscientiousness inflicts the lightest punishment upon those that are most guilty;" and "those who sin most, often suffer least in other respects," and "the righteous are often severely afflicted in this life."—These assertions are the premises from which they draw the conclusions, 1st, That there is some other punishment for sin than the goadings of a guilty conscience—and 2d, That these punishments are reserved for another state of existence.

Now look at this analogy.—"And since the administration of [some] rewards and punishments in the present state of existence, is not only not incompatible with the benevolence and the government of the Deity, but is even demanded by both, why should not the same administration of rewards and punishments in another state of existence, not only not be incompatible with the same character and government of the same unchangeable Being, but be even demanded in another world, in like manner as it is in this?" pp. 135, 136.

I give it, italicising and all, as it is in the book—and will now answer the question.

Because, if it is compatible "with the benevolence and government of the Deity," "in the present state," that Conscientiousness punishes most severely those who are least deserving of it—and that those who sin most often suffer least in other respects, as well as least from the goadings of conscience—then "the same administration of rewards and punishments in another state of existence," administered, too, "in like manner as it is in this," would prove that men would not be punished in proportion to their guilt in another state of existence, any more than they are in this! For there, as here, conscience would torment most, those least meriting punishment, and there, as here, those who sin most would suffer least—and hence, still another state of existence—and yet another, still, would be needed ad infinitum—during all which states of being, God would unjustly punish the best men most, and the worst sinners least! So much for arguments based on such premises, and backed by an analogy drawn from an imperfect state of being when compared with the end for which it was instituted. If Messrs. Fowlers have evidence that God does not punish men in proportion to their guilt in this life, what evidence can they produce that he will punish more equitably in any other state of being? As to the sufferings "in other respects," of which they speak, they ably answer themselves in the very next paragraph after the objection! and just preceding the analogy which we have already quoted.

"Not that rewards and punishments, as such, are not administered in this life; for we know, indeed, that obedience to the laws of our corporeal organization, [and of our intellectual and moral nature,] produces health, [vigor, delight and an approving conscience,] and with it, [them,] a great degree of [corporeal, mental and moral] happiness—and that the violation of these laws, produces severe punishment, examples of which are to be found in those pains caused by cutting, bruising, burning, poisoning, or otherwise injuring our bodies;" [and in those agonies preceding and accompanying the derangement of mind, in remorse of conscience, horror, despair and moral death]. p. 135.

I have added my comments in brackets, to show that the same just, wise and benevolent administration of a "just God that ruleth in the earth," extends over the whole man, as well as over his merely corporeal frame—and that in regard to spirit, as in regard to matter, he doeth what is right—recompenses the righteous in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner. By reading the extract without the comments in brackets, you have Messrs. Fowlers' arguments on which they base their analogy—and by reading it with the words in brackets, you have my views of the matter. In their language, on page 136, I may say—"All sectarian prejudices aside, are not these fair inferences from phrenological principles?" I am prepared to prove that they are—and that they are the doctrine of rewards and punishments taught in the Bible.

From what has been offered, then, it appears that every faculty is a judge of right and wrong, according to its own standard; but that Conscientiousness is the only judge of the moral character of feelings, motives and actions—that every faculty executes the punishment of its own sentence, (as, intellect in the agony of having directed unwisely, approbativeness in mortification at having acted unpopularly, and self-esteem in vexation at having acted unworthily,) but that while all can only inflict regret, Conscientiousness inflicts "REMORSE" for sin—and that all these judgments, and their inseparable penalties, are in exact proportion to the amount and kind of wrong, which, according to their several standards, the several faculties declare has been committed.

It is further evident, that fulfilling the moral law, will not exempt any one from the penalty of violating the laws of his corporeal nature, any more than observing the physical laws will shield a man from remorse of conscience when he violates his law of moral right. Every class of laws has its appropriate class of penalties, so that the saint who disobeys the laws of his fleshly frame, must suffer for the wrong that he has done, as well as the careful man in regard to physical laws, must suffer for the wrong he has done, if he violates the moral laws of his nature—for there is no respect of persons with God. How futile, then, is the objection brought against the doctrine of God's present, certain punishment for sin, by declaring that the sinner suffers less than the righteous man in this life; for if he suffers less in his physical frame (except in hereditary diseases), it is because he has sinned less against the physical laws—or by saying, "the greater the sinner, the less his remorse of conscience;" for the man is a greater or a lesser sinner before God, according as is his light and knowledge of moral good and evil, and his conscience gnaws with remorse accordingly, while his deprivations, compared with what the good man enjoys, are correspondingly great. So testifies reason, nature, Phrenology and the Bible, to A. B. G.

NOTICE.—TO AGENTS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

This is no dun, but an important business notice, therefore please to read it carefully, for from henceforth it shall be a STANDING RULE.

At the close of the present volume we shall strike from our list the name of every subscriber who is owing any thing on volumes previous to the present, unless in cases where we are assured that the subscriber is responsible.

Now let this rule be understood. At the close of each year we will discontinue the papers sent to all persons who are owing for more than that year, and of whose ability and willingness to pay us our just dues, we have not been informed by an agent or other creditable person. Of course, all subscribers who are not owing for more than that one volume, or who owe for more, but who we are informed are willing and able to pay us what they owe, will continue to receive the paper for another year at least, unless they discontinue, or other circumstances render it necessary for us to discontinue it.

Agents will see the necessity of making returns to us, (so that we shall receive them before the last week in December,) of all who have paid them for the paper. And where payment has not been made to them or to us, they should inform us early whether the subscriber is responsible or not. For where any are thus owing, of whose responsibility we have not been certified—or where payments have been made, but not reported to us—we shall most certainly discontinue the paper, and urge the collection of the account, until we find cause to do otherwise.

Subscribers who are thus owing us, will see the necessity of making speedy payment if they would continue to receive the paper and spare us the disagreeable necessity of forcing collections. It is true that by this rule we will be obliged to strike off some responsible subscribers, out of ignorance of their responsibility, unless all who are responsible will make it known by paying up what they owe. It is also true that some may have paid, whose payments have not been returned to us.—But in all such cases, we hold ourselves ready to acquire correct information, and to correct all errors of ourselves or agents, and hope to find them prompt to correct us, and to continue their subscriptions as heretofore.—Honest men will not readily distrust the honesty of others, and will be willing to forgive ignorance and error, when a disposition is manifested to learn the truth, and to do justly. Such a disposition we know is ours.

REASON FOR THE RULE. We are obliged to adopt it by the continued pecuniary embarrassments we have labored under for the past two and a half years, imposed on us by the remissness of a large majority of our subscribers—and by our utter inability to be at the expense of sending out thousands of papers, without receiving pay for them within the year. One year is longer credit than we can receive, and much longer than we should give on any terms; for we have no capital to enable us to do it. That our cause will suffer by thus striking from circulation so many of our papers, we believe, and we greatly, deeply deplore the necessity.—But the fault is not ours, and ours should not be the blame.

Finally—Is it not rather discreditable to Universalists in this and the adjoining states, that the two papers published in New-York, (this paper, and the Union,) should have had to struggle so hard and so long, (with such large lists of subscribers, too,) and eventually have to lessen their circulation so greatly, in order to enable them merely to live? Is it creditable to the promptness (we will not say the justice, and generosity, and zeal) of those of our subscribers who are now owing us more than $20,000, that we must thus cease circulating so many papers where they were doing much good, in order to sustain the paper against their indifference to our wants, and cold hearted delay in payment of our hard earned dues? We, for two, feel really mortified and grieved that such is really the case—and long have we suffered, and earnestly and laboriously have we struggled, to avoid a measure so injurious to our cause, and so discreditable to our friends. But in vain. We are humbled to the exposure, though we yet hope that our careless friends (for many are not careless) will at last arouse to doing their duty and to aid us to prevent its ill effects. G. AND H.

POETRY.

ONCE UPON A TIME.

BY MRS. ROBERT SOUTHEY.

Sunny locks of brightest hue
Once around my temples grew,
Laugh not, Lady, for 'tis true;
Laugh not, Lady! for with thee
Time may deal despitefully;
Time, if long he lead thee here,
May subdue that mirthful cheer;
Round those laughing lips and eyes
Time may write sad histories;
Deep indent that even brow,
Change those locks so sunny now,
To as dark and dull a shade,
As on mine his touch hath laid.
Lady! yes, these locks of mine
Cluster'd once with golden shine,
Temples, neck, and shoulders round,
Richly gushing if unbound,
If from band and bodkin free,
Wellnigh downward to the knee.
Some there were took fond delight
Sporting with those tresses bright,
To enring with living gold
Fingers, now beneath the mould
(Wo is me!) grown icy cold.

One dear hand hath smoothed them too,
Since they lost their sunny hue,
Since their bright abundance fell
Under the destroying spell—
One dear hand! the tenderest
Ever nurse-child rocked to rest,
Ever wiped away its tears—
Even those of later years.
From a cheek untimely hollow,
Bitter drops that still may follow.
Where's the hand will wipe away?
Her's is kissed—(ah! dismal day)
Pale as on the shroud it lay.
Then, methought, youth's latest gleam
Departed from me like a dream—
Still, though lost their sunny tone,
Glossy brown those tresses shone,
Here and there in wave and ring,
Golden threads still glittering;
And (from band and bodkin free)
Still they flowed luxuriantly.

Careful days and wakeful nights,
Early trenched on young delights.
Then of ills an endless train,
Wasting languor, wearying pain,
Fev'rish thought that racks the brain,
Crowding all on Summer's prime,
Made me old before my time.
So a dull, unlovely hue
O'er the sunny tresses grew,
Thinn'd their rich abundance too.
Not a thread of golden light
In the sunshine glancing bright.

Now again a shining streak
'Gins the dusky cloud to break;—
Here and there a glittering thread
Lights the ringlets dark and dead—
Glittering light!—but pale and cold,—
Glittering thread!—but not of gold.

Silent warning! silvery streak!
Not unheeded dost thou speak.
Not with feelings light and vain,
Not with fond regretful pain,
Look I on the token sent
To declare the day far spent;—
Dark and troubled hath it been—
Sore misused! and yet between Gracious gleams of peace and grace
Shining from a better place.

Brighten—brighten, blessed light!
Fast approach the shades of night—
When they quite enclose me round,
May my lamp be burning found!

CALEB TICKNOR'S OPINION.

A very great mistake in preaching consists in depicting, with the aid of a vivid imagination, the glowing flames of a burning hell, the awful abyss yawning to receive the sinner, and hosts of devils rejoicing with fiendish malignity over the anticipated torments of their victims. In another part of the picture is represented an angry God, disgraced by passions which agitate our breasts, and burning with all the indignation and wrath of a raving madman, thirsting for vengeance on poor, frail man, whom his word could in a single moment annihilate. Another feature in this gloomy picture, and it is complete—and that is the almost utter impossibility of escaping unutterable torment. Here, then, is placed before the mind's eye, a hell flaming with brimstone, an angry God, and devils eager to seize their prey; and all, or nearly all, by means of our total depravity and total helplessness, in the preacher's judgment, condemned victims. In a religious assembly there are some whose nervous sensibility is great, whose passions are easily excited, and possibly some of weak intellect who are unable to endure such an awful representation; and is it any wonder that they are thrown into despair, or that their fears lead to delirium? Some ministers as well as prominent individuals among the laity, allow themselves to dwell quite too much on doctrinal points and speculative theology; subjects which they themselves do not understand, and which their hearers can not comprehend. Distraction, doubt and perplexity are the consequences, which lead, perhaps, to a rejection of all revelation, or terminate in mental derangement. Such wanderings on debatable grounds are not profitable to a mixed audience; neither is it wise to denounce the terrors of the Lord on all public occasions. The timid, and nervous, and devotedly pious, are apt to appropriate all the threatenings to themselves, while the abandoned sinner for whom they are intended, turns them all over to his less hardened neighbor. More good is done to the latter class, on whom the invitations of the Gospel have no effect, by private admonition and reproof—when the declaration, thou art the man, can be brought home—when there is no escape, and no chance to misapply it. The former need encouragement, and the cheering, consoling promises of the Author of our religion. The shepherd ought to know his flock; and to recall the wayward and wandering, he should be careful and not frighten and disperse those already in the fold. The raving, ranting denunciations of some modern preachers, are but little analogous to that inimitable and too often unimitated sermon on the Mount.

The Gospel is said by inspiration to be a message of glad tidings, and that Christ came into the world on purpose to save sinners; and in accordance with this Divine plan, he has given an invitation to all to come to him—he has promised rest to all who will come; and therefore instead of rendering it difficult to escape eternal punishment, he has made it extremely easy. The Saviour of the world is compassionate and merciful—he is love itself; and the whole Gospel is full of the most generous offers, the most liberal promises, and the warmest entreaties. Professing, then, to preach this Gospel of glad tidings, and to practice its precepts, why such fearful images, such bitter denunciations, and so great effort to frighten sinners into love to their Maker and bountiful Benefactor? The fear of punishment, may compel an evil disposed person to obedience to certain precepts, but it is not true that love grows legitimately from fear. And it may well be questioned, nay, we are irresistibly led to the conclusion, that the dread of hell, even if it should operate to produce a foretaste of itself upon earth, never brought a single individual one step nearer to heaven—never induced an erring mortal to love his God with all his might, and his neighbor as himself. If this be so, instead, then, of threatening the sinner with the torments of hell, why not oftener use the mild, persuasive, and more effectual language of Scripture, and say to him, "Come, let us reason together," as he would do who was thoroughly acquainted with the avenues of the human heart.—Philosophy of Living.

Custom is the law of one description of fools, and fashion of another; but the two parties often clash; for precedent is the legislator of the first, and novelty of the last. Custom, therefore, looks to things that are past, and fashion to things that are present, but both of them are somewhat purblind as to things that are to come; of the two, fashion imposes the heaviest burden; for she cheats her votaries of their time, their fortune, and their comforts, and she repays them only with the celebrity of being ridiculed and despised; a very paradoxical mode of remuneration, yet always most thankfully received! Fashion is the veriest goddess of semblance and of shade; to be happy, is of far less consequence to her worshippers, than to appear so; even pleasure itself they sacrifice to parade, and enjoyment to ostentation. She requires the most passive and implicit obedience, at the same time that she imposes a most grievous load of ceremonies, and the slightest murmurings would only cause the recusant to be laughed at by all other classes, and excommunicated by his own. Fashion builds her temple in the capitol of some mighty empire, and having selected four or five hundred of the silliest people it contains, she dubs them with the magnificence and imposing title of the world! But the marvel and the misfortune is, that this arrogant title, is as universally accredited by the many who abjure, as by the few who adore her; but this creed of fashion, requires not only the weakest folly, but the strongest faith, since it would maintain that the minority are the whole, and the majority are nothing! Her smile has given wit to dulness and grace to deformity, and has brought every thing into vogue, by turns, but virtue. Yet she is most capricious in her favors, often running from those that pursue her, and coming round to those that stand still. It were mad to follow her, and rash to oppose her, but neither rash nor mad to despise her.

Monuments.—Those only deserve a monument who do not require it; that is, those who raised themselves one in the minds and memories of men.

DEATHS.

In the town of Spring, Crawford county, Pa., August 20th, Mr. ORIN GREEN, aged about 36 years. Br. Green was a believer in the doctrine of God's impartial goodness, and an active friend to the cause. He has left a wife and nine children, besides a numerous circle of relatives and friends, to mourn their loss. May that grace that bringeth salvation to all men, comfort the bereaved.

In Newport, Herkimer county, October 4th, of consumption, Miss LYDIA WATSON, daughter of Samuel P. and Polly Watson, aged 19 years, 2 months and 19 days.—Though called away from earthly enjoyment in the bloom of youth, she was resigned to the will of Heaven, and cheerful in death. The writer visited her the day previous to her death, when she conversed composedly and freely of her approaching dissolution, and manifested a faith without doubt, and a hope without fears, not only in view of her own salvation, but also the salvation of the entire Adamic family. She gave directions for her funeral, and requested the writer to administer, which was accordingly done on the 5th inst., in the village of Newport, to a respectable and very attentive congregation, in the Baptist church. The God of peace, and hope, and love console and bless the mourners. M. B. SMITH.

Killed, in Antwerp, Jefferson county, by the fall of a frame which was being raised, July 6th, ALVIN HOWE, son of Daniel and Judith Howe, aged 21 years. He survived the hurt, in extreme pain, about one hour, long enough to see and bid his almost distracted parents a lasting farewell, expressing a willingness to depart. His funeral was attended on the 8th, by a numerous assembly of sympathising relatives and neighbors to whom a discourse was delivered by the writer. A. WOOD.

In Antwerp, July 10th, of consumption, Miss LUNANCY, daughter of Thomas and Martha Wicks, aged about 30 years. She endured a tediously protracted illness with patience, fortitude and resignation, trusting her eternal all to the wise disposal of her heavenly Father. Funeral on the 12th, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered by the writer, to her numerous surviving relatives and a large congregation of friends and neighbors. A. WOOD.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED....NO. VIII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TO HUSBANDS.

DOMESTIC DUTIES AND PLEASURES.

"Domestic Happiness! thou only bliss
Of Paradise that hath survived the fall!
* * * * * *
Thou art the nurse of Virtue; in thine arms
She smiles, appearing, as in truth she is,
Heaven-born, and destined to the skies again."

One of the most important secrets in the attainment of happiness, is to accommodate ourselves to the peculiar condition or circumstances in which Providence has been pleased to place us. This is equally true whether in prosperity or adversity. It is in vain that the utmost success attends a man in his business affairs, if his mind is so absorbed and harrassed by schemes of future adventure, as to prevent his enjoyment of his present prosperity. He can not be happy, because he allows future uncertainties to poison present certainties. On the other hand, it is in vain and unwise to struggle against that which is inevitable, and which strugglings and repinings can not prevent. Instead of this, true philosophy and Christianity alike dictate, that it is wiser and better, to submit cheerfully to those things which can not be avoided; and that, instead of vainly repining at our lot, we should turn our attention to seeking out and securing whatever sources of enjoyment may still be within our reach. And whoever is guided by correct views, will soon ascertain that a kind Providence has scattered around those in apparently the most abject and miserable circumstances, more abundant means of enjoyment, than is apparent to the casual and careless observer! It was upon this wise principle of accommodating himself to his particular circumstances, and of bringing himself within a proper control, that Diogenes in his tub, was a happier man than Alexander upon the throne of a conquered world!

In passing from the single to the married state, the young man experiences one of the most important changes in condition, that life affords.—This change may increase or decrease his happiness—as his anticipations have been sober and reasonable, or chimerical and unreasonable. In all ordinary cases, matrimony will equal, and more than equal, every rational and consistent expectation. But when visions of extatic bliss are allowed to fill the mind—when it is supposed that marriage is to free from all care, anxiety and trouble, and that it will continually strew flowers without thorns, upon the pathway of life—disappointment and chagrin will unavoidably ensue. It is a lamentable truth that thousands have, in this manner, had their expectations unrealized; and from a want of proper reflection and discernment, from a want of due appreciation of the peculiarities of their new condition, the marriage state has proved to them one of unfulfilled hopes and bitter wretchedness. Although these disappointments may, in some cases, be caused by the wife, yet I am disposed to believe that in the great majority of instances, they are to be attributed to the inconsiderate course pursued by the husband himself.

The husband should reflect, that in uniting his destiny with that of another, he has effected a striking change in his circumstances, and has entered upon entirely new relations and associations in life. This calls for a corresponding change in his manners, habits, and to some extent even in his tastes. And if he fails to conform himself to his new condition, all expectations of permanent happiness, will inevitably perish. In becoming a husband, he has arisen a grade higher in community; he occupies a more responsible station, and has enlarged his sphere of usefulness. From a single, isolated individual, having none particularly to care for but himself, and thus necessarily acting more or less on the selfish principle of pleasing none but himself, he has become the responsible head of a family—his being, his prosperity, his happiness, have become intimately blended with that of others. Hence to conform himself to his condition, he must throw aside his former selfishness, and allow the views, the feelings, the enjoyment of those thus intimately connected with him, to mingle freely in the motives that govern his actions. While it is not at all necessary for him to withdraw from society and live in utter seclusion, it is his obvious duty to relinquish the more immediate companionship of his former associates, and to some extent at least, concentrate those attentions which he formerly gave to others, upon the one object of his choice and his love. Perhaps he was formerly indifferent as to his location, and inclined to roam from place to place; but now he has become a householder—he has established a Home! To him that home should seem to be under the very zenith of the heavens—he should view it as the central point, the emporium of the world, and all other places as but foreign provinces—and should esteem absence from it, as banishment from the fountain head of his earthly peace and happiness. And all his designs, plans, amusements and pleasures, should have his home for their converging point. As the ever-living stars of heaven continually circle the glowing sun in their ceaseless flight, so should the husband cause his every thought, wish, anticipation, to revolve with undeviating fidelity, around that brightest, holiest spot on earth, "Home—sweet home!"

I consider a love of home and of domestic scenes, the conservative spirit of all earthly happiness. This love strongly and fondly cherished, not only saves from a thousand evil habits and vices, but like the diviner's rod, leads to numerous mines of pleasure, which would otherwise have been unknown. Let me understand that a man loves his home, his family—takes pleasure in the society of his wife and children, and prizes all his domestic ties—and in the great majority of cases, I will warrant him to possess the other virtues essential to a good man's character—I will warrant him, as a general rule, to be honest, temperate, industrious, economical, a lover of his country, of his country's government and institutions, and interested in all measures that have the public welfare for their object. For I insist, these are the natural fruits and influences of domestic love. Although there are some exceptions to this rule, yet it will hold good in regard to the great mass of the community. "To be happy at home, is the ultimate result of all honorable ambition, the end to which every laudable enterprize and labor tends, and of which every desire prompts the prosecution." On the other hand, show me a man who slightly values domestic enjoyments, one who prefers almost any other place to his home, and I shall behold one who is already addicted to some vicious practices, some improper habits, or speedily becoming so. To prove the correctness of these remarks, let the reader notice in his own vicinity, the drunkard, the gamester, the idle spendthrift, and tell me if they are men who exhibit much attachment to their firesides—and tell me, too, if many of their sinful habits have not been brought on by the habit of abandoning home, as frequently as possible, and passing their hours of leisure in improper company!

The domestic circle is a much better location for judging of a man's real disposition, than the crowded mart, the public assembly, the social party, or any other place. When out in the world engaged in business, or when mingling in society, men can readily put on appearances which are hypocritical and deceptive. But when the husband enters his dwelling and mingles with his family, all disguises and restraints are thrown off, he "shrinks to his natural dimensions," and the man in his true character and disposition is revealed. And how great is the disparity between the public and private deportment of thousands of husbands! How many are there, who in public are all smiles, and blandness, and affability, who seem incapable of cherishing any other than the most kind and gentle emotions, and yet the moment they cross their own thresholds, allow a dark and frowning cloud to settle upon their brows, and exhibit a fractious, fault-finding, bitter disposition towards all the family! I have known a man in public life, whose appearance and deportment before the world, were of the most prepossessing character, and who by his smiling sociability won the applause and admiration of those in whose society he mingled. But let his admirers go to his residence, and tell me why that wife has the lineaments of a bruised spirit and a broken heart enstamped upon her countenance? It is because the husband and father at home is as different as the same individual abroad as the two extremes can well be separated. When I behold a husband disposed to be cold, unsocial, cross, and arbitrary towards his family, I am always led to look upon him with suspicion—there is something lacking either in his disposition or habits—some thing that needs correction, before he can have my confidence as a man of upright heart and pure intentions.

It is a wise saying that "those who would do well must begin well." And as much depends upon habit, the young husband must look to it, that he establishes proper customs, when he first commences house-keeping, in regard to the spending of his leisure hours. When the business of the day has been concluded, and the period for relaxation arrives, he should remember that he has a home and a companion—and that a just appreciation of his duty will not allow him unnecessarily to absent himself from the one, or do any thing to jeopardize the peace of the other. Instead, therefore, of seeking the society of his former associates, and mingling with them at the public house, the reading-room, or any other lounging place, he should make it a duty and a pleasure, to pass his leisure hours under his own roof, and in the society of his family. I do not say this should be an invariable practice; for it is neither possible nor necessary that it should be so. But I insist, it is highly important the young husband should establish it as a general rule, and that he should strive to have it become a settled habit with him. Although it may at first, interfere with his inclination, and break up some agreeable associations, yet a very little effort and perseverance will soon overcome his propensity to go much abroad, and make it both easy and agreeable to tarry at home. And I here repeat, that young men must expect when they enter the marriage state, to make a material change in their habits. Whoever becomes a husband with the expectation of still continuing in the associations and customs peculiar to the unmarried, will not only be mistaken, but will be peculiarly exposed to discontent and unhappiness in his marriage relations.

It should be remembered by the husband, that propriety as well as custom, requires his wife to renounce, to a great extent, the society of her youthful companions, and remain much of her time at that home to which he has removed her. Now when evening arrives and she can consistently anticipate the pleasure of his society, is it proper, is it generous, to deprive her of this expectation, and leave her perhaps in dreary solitude, while he is wasting his hours at some public resort? And is not this doubly ungenerous and dishonorable, when he has removed her from the circle of her relatives and friends, into the midst of strangers? Surely every man of principle—every husband who has a proper regard for his chosen companion—will not pursue a course so dishonorable and unmanly! He will rather adopt any consistent measure to make his wife's happiness as perfect as he can wish his own to be.

The happiness of the domestic circle does not depend so much upon outward circumstances, as upon the disposition cherished towards each other, by the different members of the household. A gracious Father has so directed, that neither riches, nor honor nor power, are necessary to domestic enjoyment. Without either, a man may be happy in his own family—with them all, he may be exceedingly wretched. Yea, it is an undoubted general truth, that while the sweet pleasures of unalloyed love flee the sumptuous palace, they more naturally take up their abode in the lowly cottage, among those in the humbler walks of life. Domestic bliss is to be found where the loud call of ambition has not been heard—where a miserly love of gold has not seared all the better feelings of the heart—where jealousy, strife and bitterness are not allowed to prevail—but where mutual forbearance and forgiveness reign, and contentment and peace abound.

"Domestic Love! not in proud palace halls
Is often seen thy beauty to abide;
Thy dwelling is in lowly cottage walls,
That in the thickets of the woodbine hide;
With hum of bees around and from the side
Of woody hills some little bubbling spring,
Shining along through banks with harebells dyed;
And many a bird to warble on the wing,
When morn her saffron robe o'er heaven and earth doth fling."

Can a husband, and especially a father, want attractions to bind him to his home? When he returns from the labors and cares of the day, what can be more pleasant than to be met by the bright smile of his affectionate companion, who with care has seen that the board has been neatly spread for the evening repast, and that every thing is made agreeable and pleasant for his reception—or to behold his little urchins rush forward with shouts of childish glee, in eager and fond rivalry to see who shall first clasp his neck, or imprint the first sweet kiss? Oh! if Heaven grants to mortals a foretaste of its pure bliss, it is in moments like these!—if the benignant eye of eternal Love looks down with approbation to earth, it is to witness and to bless these fond scenes of domestic endearment!

The husband whose disposition and habits are as they should be, will look upon home enjoyments as the most valuable the earth affords to mortals. I have often admired the natural simplicity and beauty of Cowper's lines in his "Winter Evening:"

"Now stir the fire, and close the shutters fast,
Let fall the curtains, wheel the sofa round,
And, while the bubbling and loud hissing urn
Throws up a steamy column, and the cups,
That cheer but not inebriate, wait on each,
So let us welcome peaceful evening in."

What pleasures can exceed those experienced in the family circle on a Winter's evening, so beautifully described by this sweetest of poets? The day, with its labor, and care, and turmoil, has passed—night's sable curtains envelope the skies—and although storms and darkness may reign without, all within is smiling cheerfulness. The glowing fire sends forth its grateful heat and sheds a mellow lustre through the apartment, while the happy family instinctively circle around the beloved hearth-stone, with joy painted on each countenance, and with a desire in every heart, to give each other pleasure. Then comes the full flow of unrestrained conversation—the grateful interchange of sentiment—intermixed with the kind and lively repartee and the laughter-moving anecdote. The husband, perchance, reads aloud some instructive and entertaining work, with occasional comments suitable to the age and comprehension of his hearers—or relates some little ditty of wonderous adventure, to satisfy the eager curiosity of the rosy-cheeked urchin, who has clambered upon his knee, or listens, with all a parent's fondness, to his replying prattle, as he declares, under the promptings of budding ambition, the wonderful feats to be performed, when "I get to be a man!" Oh! blissful scenes—sweet antepast of heaven! What husband, what father, will rob himself of these delights, these pure and holy joys, that he may go abroad to find that which has no substantial happiness!

"O evenings worthy of the gods! exclaimed
The Sabine bard. O evenings, I reply,
More to be prized and coveted than yours,
As more illumined, and with nobler truth,
That I and mine, and those we love enjoy.
Is Winter hideous in such a garb as this?
Needs he the tragic fur, the smoke of lamps,
The pent-up breath of an unsavory throng,
To thaw him into feeling; or the smart
And snappish dialogue, that flippant wits
Call comedy, to prompt him with a smile?
The self-complacent actor, when he views
(Stealing a sidelong glance at a full house)
The slope of faces from the floor to th' roof
(As if one master-spring controlled them all)
Relaxed into a universal grin,
Sees not a countenance there that speaks of joy.
Half so refined or so sincere as ours."

The domestic relations of man, pressing as they do, the most sensibly upon the heart, give character to the whole tenor of his emotions. Let him undervalue the enjoyments to be found in the bosom of a beloved family—let him be, comparatively, a stranger to his own fire-side—and it is in vain that he seeks for happiness elsewhere. He may mingle with the bacchanalian throng, and join in their phrensied glee—he may visit the crowded theatre and listen to the stale jokes and lascivious songs, and gaze upon the paste-board grandeur and tawdry displays of the "scenic stage"—or lounge his time away at some favorite haunt in company with "congenial spirits," relating thrice-told tales, and laughing at threadbare witticisms—but still he is a stranger to true enjoyments—an aching void is in his soul, which he has no power to fill; for the spirit of domestic love sheds not its holy influences in his heart—he overlooks, he rejects, he destroys it! But the husband who values home as he ought, finds it a fountain of the purest delights. Let his labors be multiplied and the cares of business increase, he can bear up beneath them—let the clouds and tempests which so often convulse the business world, gather around, they fill him not with despair, they rob him not of peace—for when evening comes, in his home, he finds a little paradise to which he can retreat, and in the sunshine of love's warm rays, and amid the fond endearments of those most precious to his soul, forgets all the outer world, with its cares and vexations. The evening glides sweetly away, amid mutual smiles and kind attentions, and richly rewards him for all the toils of the day.

Is there a husband who is a stranger to these domestic enjoyments, and who doubts their existence? Alas, that he should doubt that which can so easily be known! Let him test the reality of the picture I have endeavored to paint. As an experiment, let him set apart one month, and resolve that he will spend each evening in the bosom of his family, unless called away by some special business. To allow the trial to be a fair one, he must cast aside all his testy, querulous, sour feelings, and commence with a determination to be pleasant, sociable and agreeable, and with a strong desire, not only to be happy himself, but to make others happy also. If this experiment is made in a proper manner and with a right spirit, I am confident the husband will soon look upon those evening scenes as the happiest periods of his life; and as each day rolls away, will exclaim—

"Come, evening, once again, season of peace;
Return, sweet evening, and continue long!
Methinks I see thee in the streaky west,
With matron step slow moving, while the night
Treads on thy sweeping train: one hand employed
In letting fall the curtain of repose
On bird and beast, the other charged for man
With sweet oblivion of the cares of day."

"After the labors and studies of the day are ended, nothing can be more appropriate, or delightful than one, or two, or three hours of conversation—the length of the time to be determined, of course, by the length of the evening—around the domestic fire-side; the whole family, whether large or small, being together. The damp air of the evening seems to admonish us; the darkness admonishes us; the danger to health and morals, admonishes us—why will we not heed the admonition?"*

This subject is of the utmost importance to the young husband. The happiness of his life depends greatly upon the habits which he establishes in this respect. He should, therefore, seriously contemplate, and rightly value the salutary and happifying influences exerted by a strong attachment to domestic enjoyments. He should strive to cultivate the spirit of domestic love, and allow it to become a living, active principle within him, so that he can truly and feelingly join in the thrilling language of the poet Croly:—

"O love of loves! to thy white hand is given
Of earthly happiness the golden key;
Thine are the joyous hours of Winter's even,
When the babes cling around their father's knee;
And thine the voice that on the midnight sea
Melts the rude mariner with thoughts of home,
Peopling the gloom with all he longs to see.
Spirit! I've built a shrine; and thou hast come,
And on its altar closed—forever closed, thy plume."

JESUS "HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL."—NO. VIII

BY REV. S. GOFF.

The attentive reader, who has followed us through the preceding remarks and illustrations, will perceive that Jesus, the great teacher sent from God, so far as the duties and the joys of earth are concerned, by precept, by miracles, by parables, by example, and by illustration, "hath done all things well." In every particular there is a grandeur, a vastness, a beauty, and a glory in the execution of his mission. But its crowning excellence is in the sublime felicities of the final result. Mortality "will be swallowed up of life," human nature exalted to an equality with the angelic hosts of heaven, and constituted the children of God to die no more forever.

"Then the end;—beneath his rod
Man's last enemy shall fall:
Hallelujah! Christ in God,
God in Christ is all in all."

Oh, had I the wisdom of all the master-spirits of the eastern world, and the eloquence of a Demosthenes or a Cicero—

"Had I all the knowledge human and divine,
That thought can reach, or science can define,"

I would employ them all in making known to my fellow-men the beauties of the character of Christ—the glories of my Redeemer's kingdom, and in proclaiming to the world this glorious, this everblessed truth, my Jesus "hath done all things well." And oh, that every intelligent being of earth could see the grandeur, the vastness, the beauty, the glory, and the sublimity there is in the mission of Jesus moving on harmoniously, under the directing hand of omnipotent Love, to the ultimate perfection of the plan of Providence in the complete redemption of all our kindred race from the power and the dominion of sin and error, to share in the felicities of universal emancipation. Could they see this by faith, as unfolded in the Gospel of God's dear Son, I am persuaded there is not a soul of Adam's posterity but would shout in hallowed strains—"Our Saviour hath done all things well." But the time is coming, thank God, when all shall see, when all shall be taught of God, and his knowledge shall cover the whole earth. Then all will unite in sweet accord in the song of salvation. In anticipation of this, let us unite our voices, and shout the universal, the everblessed, the endless harvest home, and loud proclaim, "Our Saviour hath done all things well."

ESSAYS ON WAR.....NO. V.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"There are two kinds of contention; the one by argument, the other by violence; the one belongs to man, the other properly to the brutes." CICERO.

We come now to one of the most fruitful causes of war, a cause which is alleged with a great degree of triumph.

1. We refer to that of self-defence. It is triumphantly asked, suppose your wife and children are attacked by a ruffian; would you not take his life? Now, one thing is kept out of sight. Has not my wife something to do with the principles of Christianity? She is bound to practice its great principles as much as the other sex.—The woman is as much the keeper of the man, as the man is of the woman. Under such circumstances, woman must act from principle.—But we will admit the whole matter. My family are attacked. The war-spirit says, kill him. I commit the deed. Now if I can be justified in killing one human being to preserve my family, I may kill any number for the same purpose, and carrying out the principle to its full length, I have a right to murder every being on earth to save my own family!! The Massachusetts Constitution is founded on this very principle; only there it is made a State affair: "The Governor shall have power to lead forth the inhabitants, and with them to encounter, repel, resist, expel, pursue, kill, SLAY and DESTROY all who shall at any time, attempt on enterprize the destruction, invasion, detriment or annoyance of this Commonwealth." This authorises the chief magistrate to do that for the State, which it is said I ought to do if my family are attacked. But the whole principle is wrong. Our ground is, that no being in the universe has a right to take human life, but God himself! I have no right to take my own life; where then do I obtain the right to take the life of my fellow-being? But then it is said, the case may be that one must die. Be it so. I will go to my Saviour and learn my duty: "Love your enemies." Can I do that, and blow out their brains? But I will go to the Cross. There I learn that one must indeed die; but who? not the injurer, but the injured; not the enemy, but the friend. "God commendeth his love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." From Jesus I learn the great lesson that this world has never acted on, that I must die for my enemies. What a lesson! how slow its progress! How it calms every passion! It is enough to hush the world into silence! Had it its full weight, every sword would drop from the warrior's hand, every spear would be beaten into a pruning hook, and every sword into a plough share. The dove would be seen, bearing the olive branch of peace, denoting that the storms had subsided. The bow would again appear in the heavens, and brightness, beauty and glory would again dawn upon our benighted and erring world.

2. Another cause of war is found in the idea, that the precepts of the Bible are for individuals, and not for nations. We maintain that the Bible is as much designed to regulate the one as the other. But what is meant? When acting in my individual capacity, am I to consider myself bound by the divine precepts; but when I come to act in a national point of view, am I to be allowed to tread them beneath my feet? To illustrate; is it wrong for me to kill him who attacks my life, and right to kill him who invades my country? But then, how many constitute a nation? How many does it take to make that right in a mass, which is wrong in a single human being? Were Robinson Crusoe and his man Friday a nation? If not, how many must be cast away there, to make a nation? San Marino is called a nation, yet said not to contain more than six or seven thousand. Some of our Indian tribes are more numerous; yet our government does not allow them to be nations; only when it makes treaties with them, but never when it breaks those treaties. There is an absurdity in the objection, which can never be taken from it, until the precise number is determined on, to which a family, a tribe, or a gang must arrive before they can be called a nation. In an absolute monarchy, the king himself declares war, or, as Frederick the Great expressed it, Kings make war, and leave it to some laborious civilian to assign a plausible pretext for it. God will not excuse a man for breaking his commands, because he wears a crown, and murders on a large scale. We know that with man, but not so with God. "He seeth not as man seeth." He considers that all intelligent beings are subjects of his moral government. "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons with God." The idea we are combatting may account for the reason why rulers are so corrupt. They perhaps imagine that, as magistrates, they may do what they could not do as individuals.—In one capacity, they must not take life; but in another they may. Thus there is a continual conflict in the mind, between the law of God and that of man.

> "One murder makes a villain; > Millions a hero;"

But let us remember that we can not place ourselves beyond the obligations of the divine commands; to those commands, nations must bow as well as individuals, and until it can be shown clearly to the writer, that he has a right to take the life of a fellow-being as an individual, it will be in vain to attempt to convince him that he has that right in a national capacity.

EFFECTS OF PREJUDICE.

Unholy bigotry! "Thou hast made Thy fetters fast and strong."

Not long since, as I was journeying through one of the adjacent counties, I was compelled to pass the night at a village inn. It was Winter, and the long evenings afforded much room for agreeable conversation. After giving the necessary directions for myself and horse, I was shown the sitting room, where I found two gentlemen, apparently in earnest chit chat. I took up a public journal, and pretended to peruse the news of the day, though by the way, I was an attentive listener to all said. I soon discovered the subject of their conversation. It was concerning one of their neighbors—a man highly respected by all. It appeared that he was a doer as well as sayer of the word—that his benevolence knew no bounds—that his generosity and kindness were his leading traits—"that he dealt justly, loved mercy, and walked humbly with his God."

It seemed that the two individuals, (already alluded to,) either through pride or resentment, required something else at his hands. They were not satisfied with his well ordered life, and useful conversation. With respect to his moral character, they made no objection, but his religion was the dreaded upas tree. The worst of it, said one, he is a Universalist. What a pity, remarked the other, that one so amiable, kind and generous, should imbibe such a licentious doctrine. Thinks I to myself, the world has come to a strange pass: what would our blessed Saviour say unto such? "Judge the tree by its fruit—men can not gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles." It shows how strongly men are bound by the despot, prejudice. Like one of old, they are ready to inquire, can any good thing come out of a Universalist? Among latter day saints, virtue and goodness, and Universalism are as far distant from each other, as the ophelion and penhelion of a planet orbit. Universalism is regarded as the sine qua non of iniquity, vice and crime. Will there not be a change in regard to this matter, in the eyes of community? Yes, for truth is mighty and will prevail, in spite of the bigot's torch, or tyrant's chain, or the imposition of priesthood. Even so, Amen. A. W. T.

CONFERENCE AT SHERIDAN.

The Chautauque Association held a Conference in Sheriden, on the 18th and 19th of September, but on account of the very rainy weather, and the well known fact that our Methodist, and also Presbyterian brethren, had denied us the use (though unoccupied) of both their houses, only a small number assembled for divine worship.—It will be seen that such little conduct is full proof that our neighbors here are very small Christians; and although it is supposed by some that such small souls can not be saved in this visible world, still a hope is cherished that the popular doctrine that there is "no change after death," may prove untrue, and that the work of redemption will go on, until, in the invisible world, all such fallen spirits will be rescued from such intolerable bigotry. We should say, however, that there are some of our neighbors, who saw and lamented this unchristian conduct, that were anxious to accommodate us, and that they would assist the Universalists in building a house of worship, if they should propose to do so.—They have commenced the work. A subscription is already in circulation, our friends are able and willing, and all that is wanting is perseverance.—I feel confident that the good work commenced, will be carried into effect another year. Sermons were preached by Brs. Martin, J. Eaton, Paine, and Adams, to the satisfaction and edification of all who heard. Adjourned to meet in Stockton, the last Tuesday in December, and the first Wednesday in January, where we expect to meet with a far nobler Christian spirit than was manifested by our opposers in Sheriden. Our friends will see that our meeting will begin in 1839, and close in 1840. I trust we shall have an interesting season. The question whether our meeting should be held two days, or only one, is to be agitated at our next Conference. The reason assigned is because so few attend the first day.—Brethren, how shall this question be determined? Your presence or absence on the first day will determine. T. C. EATON

TEACHINGS AND TENDENCIES....NO. V.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

GRATITUDE.

There is beauty and appositeness in the interrogation of the Psalmist—"What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits?" He felt that God had dealt mercifully and bountifully with him. His obligations were innumerable, and what else had he than thankfulness to return again to God? What else than pious acknowledgments for his ever-abounding favors?

There is something exceedingly touching in the simplest demonstration of heart-felt gatitude. They show that the memory holds on to the past and present—that the recollection of received kindness has not yet faded out—that the hand that gave it is identified with the good enjoyed, and that the heart feels that its richest oblations can not cancel the debts which goodness has pressed upon it. Beautiful and touching indeed is all this, when God is deemed the liberal Giver; and the grateful soul turns to him as a never failing fountain of mercy, and continues to offer up its sincerest thanksgivings.

We are induced to believe that the influence of religious sentiments operates here, as in every other branch of practical duty. Their peculiarity must necessarily affect the currents of gratitude, as they linger, or stream on, in their opened channels. If "much is given," there is much to be grateful for. The system embracing the greatest abundance of spiritual munificence for the recipient, demands, "in God's behalf," the greatest aggregate of returned thankfulness.—They are to be correspondingly proportionate.

In this respect, no doctrine can be superior to Universalism. It stands far before all others.—They hold but a faint comparison with it. They speak of being and blessings conferred, it is true; but, if it so happens in the final issue, that this being and these blessings are any thing else than good, what propriety is there in asking—or what incentives would there be for cherishing gratitude, "wherewithal" the subsequent infinite loser should appear before the Lord? Suppose of some individuals, that the Jewish proverb, that "it had been good had" they never existed, primitively signifying nothing more than the sufferance of severe temporal calamities, should, in relation to them, be ultimately fulfilled in its modern and extremest literality; with what consistency would they be called upon now or ever, to render thanksgiving and praise unto God, for all their wasted yet keenly sensitive powers, and for the deep desolation which livingly and forever is to prey upon their unconsumed beings? Is there any thing in all this, calculated to cause the heart to overflow with warm and abiding gratitude, and to contribute to its fulness, the joy unspeakable and full of glory?

My vision reaches not thus far. I can think, in trembling horror, of the awfulness of the anticipated result; but it does not appear to me, how this can possibly excite the least emotion of thankfulness. The undying Mind, and Time, and Eternity—all are before me; but from neither can I extract inducements for being peculiarly grateful. Mortal life—its unrelished enjoyments—its illusive, hollow hopes—its futile and aimless ambitions—all, evaporated amidst clouds and darkness; and the prospective perpetuation of existence—ah! it is an unwelcome theme.

We turn to another view. The sentiment we plead for, is the reverse of this. Its teachings are different from those of the other doctrine, in regard to every stage of man's being with which it has the least concernment. And it goes back to the great beginning. It starts from the moment when the morning sons bent down and shouted their joy over a finished world; and it runs along through the lapse of ages, like a river of living light, gilding life, and brightening the tomb and pouring a full flood of glory over all the wide domain of immortality! Divinity is revealed to you in untarnished splendor, planning in benevolence, and executing in power, and governing in love. The few fleeting clouds which fall upon human life, are but the shadows of some winging angel, passing between us and the great Sun.—Afflictive dispensations are missions of good.—Dealt out by the kind hand of God, we are to abide their visitations in cheerful submission and unyielding trust. Death is, indeed, the stern devourer; but aided by this faith, his sting is unfelt; and we are taught that his dim dominion is yet to be broken up. And the future; nothing—save it, itself—can be more glorious than the views inculcated of that; when, after the bright sunlight and the brief shadows of time have alike faded, universal man, redeemed from all earthliness and corruption, shall come forth to live, love and adore, in God's own presence forever!

This revealed aspect of things present and to come, makes reasonable and appropriate demands upon your gratitude. Yea, it is drawn involuntarily from you. Nothing could more effectually win and secure it. The heart is touched and exhilirated in view of all this goodness and glory.—It feels that there is something even here, eminently worth the living for; and some thing beyond these mortal shores, for which it does not fear to be drenched beneath the waters of death. All around is calm and quiet. All above is peaceful and serene. Earth and heaven, time and eternity, unite in demonstrating the inexhausted love of God to his creature man. And a "peace divine" fills the soul and gladdens the whole existence. And then the sweet incense of thanksgiving is tendered "unto God for all his benefits."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

NUMBER XI.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

Chronicles.—The books that bear this title, were evidently compiled from others, and those written at different times, some before and others after the Babylonish captivity. There are a variety of opinions as to who was the author of this book. The Jews say that it was compiled by Ezra, but this is not certain. Calmet thinks it could not have been him, but does not hazard an opinion of his own, as to who was the author.

1 Chron. xv: 16.—"And David spake to the chief of the Levites, to appoint their brethren to be the singers with instruments of music," etc. The introduction of music into the service of the sanctuary, was the work of David; the ritual of Moses containing no directions about it. In the Hebrew service, vocal music always accompanied instrumental, and the hymns they recited are contained in the book of Psalms. In this part of the service, all the people might join.

1 Chron. xxi: 1.—"And Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel." This is the first time that the word Satan occurs in this history, and it is evident that it does not signify a distinct, intelligent person, but the source of evil or improper thoughts that arose in David's own mind, viz., his pride and ostentation. In the corresponding passage, in the book of Samuel, (see 2 Sam. xxviv: 1,) it is said, that "God being angry with Israel, moved David to number them"—and this is perfectly consistent with the other account.

The punishment of the people, was a proper measure in the conduct of Providence, suiting their case; and the conduct of David was the means by which this punishment was brought about. And in the language of Scripture, whatever takes place according to the usual course of nature, is ascribed to the immediate agency of the God of nature, as the obstinacy of Pharaoh, and the envy and malice of Joseph's brethren, etc.

1 Chron. xxviii: 3.—"But God said unto me, [David,] thou shalt not build an house for my name, because thou hast been a man of war, and hast shed blood." The divine disapprobation of war and bloodshed, is strongly expressed by this circumstance. Even although the wars of David had been just, yet he was considered as in a manner polluted by shedding blood, and on that account not fit to erect a temple to the God of peace and love.

2 Chron. xxix: 25.—"And he [Hezekiah] set the Levites in the house of the Lord with cymbals, with spaltries, and with harps, according to the commandment of David, and of Gad, the king's seer, and Nathan the prophet: for so was the commandment of God by his prophets." From this it appears, that the additions which David made to the music of the national worship, was with the concurrence of these prophets and by divine direction.

SOUL MERCHANTS.

"The Signs of the Times," a Baptist paper, in speaking of spiritual money changers, of those who make merchandise of the Gospel of Christ, says, "It is said by good authority, that at Pen-Yan village, N. Y., they paid an efficient protracted meeting missionary, for six weeks service, six hundred dollars, all in cash! It is stated also that within three months after this meeting, the Baptist church in Pen-Yan had cast away thirty of the fish they had caught in that missionary's net, and that forty more were under discipline."

The individual here referred to by the Signs, is undoubtedly that modern Ananias, who so long disgraced our city some months since. At the close of that disgraceful meeting (for it deserves no better name) conducted by him and the Sodomite Elder—a meeting long to be remembered in the annals of our city, for the excesses, the brutality, and the outrages on decency and morality, by which it was characterized—he called upon his deluded followers to come forward and cast their jewelry, their finger and ear rings, their breast pins, etc., into what he termed the Lord's treasury. The poor deluded, but no doubt sincere mortals, not knowing what they were about, did as they were bidden, and undoubtedly thought that in so doing, they were of a surety doing God a service.* But mark the self denial of this wolf in sheep's clothing. When he left the city, he carried with him in money and presents of the most extravagant kind, given him by his poor, deluded followers, the sum of nearly five hundred dollars! nearly as much as one half of the clergymen in Utica get for a whole year's service.—It is now pretty well understood by the community, that this impostor's labors in behalf of perishing souls is a matter of mere speculation—a speculation, in the first place, on the part of the churches which employ him to swell their numbers, and in the second place, on the part of that "man of sin," to fill his purse. The latter no doubt has succeded to his heart's content. The former, it is notorious, have made rather a "bad spec" of it!

It is said that the mass of the churches that have employed, are now taking rather an unprofitable nap, from which it will take years to awaken them. This we know to be particularly the case in this city—for not one of the churches which participated in that excitement, have near as large congregations as they had previous to it. And some of them are, as is well known, fast hastening to a dissolution.

* Some of the deluded ones probably intend to advance their own reputation for fashion, finery and wealth, while thus serving the Lord; for it is a fact that a few of them, possessing no jewelry to cast into this man's Lord's treasury, and unwilling to have it appear as if they had no jewels, went to the jeweller's and purchased jewelry, to the amount of five or ten dollars each, to put into the contribution! How much of judicious charity there was in giving jewelry (which must sell, second handed, at a sacrifice) instead of the cash, let the public judge—as God will judge how much religion there was in this costly display of jewelry they never wore—and how much hypocrisy in the effort to make the priest and his people believe they were giving up their long worn and highly valued personal decorations, instead of purchased baubles! A. B. G.

But enough. When we see so many of our friends and connexions, whom we esteem and love, yielding to this worse than Mormon delusion, "we are struck with self-concern at the infirmities of our nature; and we anxiously pray God, that he would never suffer the damp, cheerless gloom of superstition to extinguish that ray of understanding, which is the candle of the Lord in man." THE PRUNER.

REPROOF FOR A NEIGHBOR.

"Deacon," said Mr. R., "your preacher really done well! He used up Mr. S., and I was pleased to see him set forth his sins so powerfully and truly. And the best of all was, Mr. S. was present to listen himself to his own iniquities—and I hope he will profit by what he has heard."—The Deacon briefly replied, "that their preacher was faithful in the discharge of his duties."

This sage reply seemed to turn the mind of R. to other topics, which engaged his attention until he parted with the Deacon. Presently, however, after his arrival at home, the Deacon received a call from the said Mr. S. "Well, Deacon," said he, "I have been abundantly paid for attending your meeting to-day—a smart man that—he speaks with power. By the way, Deacon, did you notice what a keen rebuke he gave Mr. R.! I never saw a more faithful portrait of any man's character, than he drew for him! The poor fellow winced at his reproof. I tell you, Deacon, he heard a lesson to-day he will not soon forget." Now here were two men so near akin in wickedness, that both mistook the coat suited for their own wearing, as belonging to a neighbor. What a striking case of benevolence, this! Each was willing to do far better by his neighbor, than he wished to be done unto. A change of cases makes a vast difference! Reader, if thine eye glances over these marks of a "Pruner," we entreat thee to be more selfish, and much oblige your friend APELLES.

LETTERS OF REVS. MESSRS. MANLEY AND HOYT.

Gainesville, September 2, 1839.

Mr. GROSH:—In a late number of your paper, I am very gravely charged with falsehood and deception, by the publication of certain letters, and remarks thereon, by Rev. W. E. Manley. Now for the satisfaction of all whom it may concern, I beg permission, through the same organ, to speak for myself.

1. Mr. Manley is mistaken when he says, "and gave notice that you were going to preach to the Universalists." I said, I will preach for the Universalists; as the following certificate will show:

Mr. Hoyt made an appointment to preach for the Universalists, and wished me to inform Mr. Manley, and request him to publish the appointment in his congregation, and to be present on the occasion. I accordingly did.

ORSON GILLETT.

2. Mr. Manley is wide of the truth when he says, "you observed that you had indeed given notice that you were going to preach to the Universalists, but that it was not with the intention of preaching to them particularly, and that why you happened to give the notice in that way, you know not." The form of speech by me used, for which Mr. Manley has substituted the above, is as follows: "Perhaps there is an impression upon the minds of some, that I am going to preach against the Universalists. That there is such an impression, or to what extent it obtains, I do not know. I made the appointment to preach for the Universalists, it is true. It is not my design, however, to preach for them exclusively, but for the benefit of all present."

The above is precisely the form of speech as nearly as we can recollect, used by Mr. Hoyt in his introduction to a sermon preached at Gainesville, in presence of Mr. Manley. We were present on the occasion, and remember very distinctly what Mr. Hoyt said, and also the apparent delight with which Mr. Manley performed the concluding exercises of the meeting.

3. Mr. Manley says—"At the abolition discussion at Warsaw," etc.—as per letters published. In reply to which I offer the following certificate.

We were present at the abolition discussion at Warsaw. Heard Manley and Hoyt discuss a certain resolution which came before the meeting. Mr. Manley made a speech. Mr. Hoyt answered. Mr. Manley complained. Mr. Hoyt then arose and said, "he hoped the speaker would not consider him as meaning to be personal in his remarks." And we are of the opinion that all that Hr. Hoyt meant to convey by his apology was, that he designed no unkindness to the speaker, though he condemned certain principles involved in his speech.

Now I can not conceive that the facts in the case "involve" me "in direct contradiction," and that "how" I shall "extricate" myself, yet "remains to be seen," I very much doubt. I now submit to the judgment of your candid readers, whether I am guilty. Whether the facts exhibited and established, by the testimony of unimpeachable witnesses, do not demonstrate my innocence. Now, I do conceive it a very serious matter to be charged with deception and falsehood. But to be charged with crime is no evidence of guilt. Otherwise the best men that ever graced our world were guilty of crime.—Possessing, however, in my heart a consciousness of innocence, I was, and still remain, quite unconcerned.

4. Mr. Manley, remarking on my letter, says, "He has virtually admitted his character to be not only as bad as I have represented it, but altogether worse." I ask where!—In what part of my letter? Hear Mr. Manley again: "My charges, he says, belong to a class of things which he has long since learned to treat with perfect indifference." It is false! I have no where said so. Again; "He has been so long guilty that my charges and admonitions do not produce any new or forcible impressions!" How forced and unnatural! May we not say, how malicious!—Again; "He has learned to treat such things." What things? Examine the original letter and see.

And first, The first paragraph of Mr. Manley's letter commences with, "I have a few things to submit to your consideration," and proceeds to notice the "place" I "occupy," the "responsibilities" of my "station," the necessity of "preachers" "giving heed to their ways," and expresses a "fear" that I "have not been as deeply impressed with these facts as" I "should be." To which I reply: I would be truly gratified that a friend should attempt to "stir up my mind by way of remembrance." Though I can by no means give Mr. Manley credit for new or more forcible impressions. Now I claim to have been as deeply "impressed with those facts" before I saw Mr. Manley's letter, as I have been since.

Secondly—The second paragraph of Mr. Manley's letter commences with, "When you came to this place," and proceeds to inform me of my "favorable" reception, and also of his own inferences and thoughts. In reply to which, I say, in relation to the information, and some thoughts and inferences of your own, contained in your second paragraph, I have just to say, it and they belong to a class of things which I have long since learned to treat with perfect indifference.—Now I ask, what are the things which I treat with perfect indifference? Mr. Manley says, they are "my charges." Ridiculous! How can they be, when his second paragraph contains no charges against me? Thirdly—The third paragraph of Mr. Manley's letter commences with, "You are hereby called upon," and contains his charges against me. And to them I reply—in a part of your statements in your third paragraph, you have spoken the truth, and in a part of them, permit me to say, not that you have lied, or even told a falsehood, but that you are mistaken.

Now I ask, where is the "virtual admission" and "accumulated testimony from his own pen, that his character is what I have represented it to be," as Mr. Manley so basely affirms? Certainly, not in your letter to Mr. Manley! Exclaims the honest reader.

Now I submit to the consideration of all whom it may concern, whether the "few plain rebukes" which Mr. Manley will naturally feel when reading this communication, will not "tend to check him in his deceptive career"—and also, whether the man who could, so basely, and to so base a purpose, pervert the meaning of an author's words, must not have been, not only "a long time guilty," and "exceedingly far gone in transgression," but a "hardened sinner."

Feeling a consciousness of having presented you and your readers, with a true statement of facts in the case, and having no desire to injure Mr. Manley, I forbear any further remarks, other than to say, "If Haman is to be hanged on his own gallows"—if in the judgment of your readers Mr. Manley is guilty of palpable falsehood, and base misrepresentation, with intent to deceive, and has therefore lied, I can not help it.

ILLUSTRATIVE ANECDOTE NO. V.

"I see, deacon, your Presbyterian brethren are seeking, and are desirous of effecting the salvation of as many of their fellow beings as they can." "O yes," said the deacon, "we are all things to all men that we may save some?" "But, deacon, do you suppose it a holy desire to save some?" "O yes, for God desires it, for he has no pleasure in the death of any." "Then, deacon, is it not a holy desire to desire the salvation of all, if God has no pleasure in the death of any?" "Certainly it is," said he; "God desires that all should turn from sin." "Then, deacon, how can it be so very wicked to believe that all will be finally saved? You admit it to be a holy desire, and have not any reason to believe that holy desires—the desires of the righteous will be answered?" "But we are not to believe all will be saved," said the deacon. "Why, can a desire be holy without being based upon divine truth? I ask." "I do not wish a controversy," said the deacon, and the matter closed.

This rule should be observed in all conversation. That men should not talk to please themselves, but those that hear them. This would make them consider, whether what they speak be worth hearing; whether there be either wit or sense in what they are about to say; and whether it be adapted to the time when, the place where, and the person to whom it is spoken. —Tatler.

"Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptised, shall be saved; but he that believeth not, shall be damned."—Mark xvi: 15, 16.

CONCLUDED.

III. What is the damnation? Let it here be carefully observed, that the term damned, being a harsh term, is the only expression about the text, which gives any countenance to the common notions of this subject.—Yet, is it not entire assumption to declare that the term damned, means endless misery? What does damn mean? Campbell in his note on the passage, Horne, (vol. 1, p. 446,) and Cappe, tell us that it simply means condemn—and surely condemn does not stand in place of endless misery. A man may be condemned for crime, but it is not the condemnation, it is the statute book which determines the amount of his punishment.

An important question arises—What does the creature disbelieve in order to incur damnation? Surely, the Gospel! The object of the Gospel is to reconcile the world to God, for it is by it that Christ is to save his people from their sins. Matt. i: 21. The Gospel aims, then, to save the unbeliever—does his unbelief change that object? Certainly not, for the unbelief of man can not change the truth. Whatever God has declared, will always remain true, in spite of the belief or the unbelief of man. True, man, by unbelief, may shut himself out from the joy which is experienced by the prospect of future bliss—but this is all, and it constitutes condemnation or damnation. But the plan which God has adopted in regard to the future condition of his children, will be executed, even though the whole world should disbelieve it. What says John? "He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son: and this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." 1 John v: 10, 11. How can the veracity of an individual be impeached? By simply doubting his statements. So the unbeliever virtually makes God a liar, by disbelieving that eternal life has been given him. But if it were not true that eternal life has been given him, he could not impeach the veracity of God by his unbelief. The eternal life was given previous to the exercise of either belief or unbelief in regard to it, and was not any the less true or untrue on account of the belief or unbelief of the persons to whom it was presented—it existed independent of these. Unbelief simply affects the unbeliever by closing his mind to the joys which flow from a knowledge that eternal life has been given him. If, then, universal holiness be not true, the unbeliever can not make God a liar by unbelief; for, according to common notions, no unbeliever has eternal life given him, and if no eternal life has been given him, surely there can be no crime in disbelieving the existence of that which has never been promised.

Let us test this subject farther. The creed-book declares that a certain number of the human family were elected to salvation, and a certain number given over to destruction, from the foundation of the world. Let us try this with the text. If the elect believe that the Gospel embraces their salvation, they believe the truth.—But if the reprobate is called upon to believe that his salvation is embraced by the Gospel, when his destruction is determined, is he not called to believe a falsehood? Certainly—for, if he believes that he shall be saved, when his doom is sealed, he believes a falsehood. On the contrary, if he should disbelieve the Gospel and believe in his perdition, then he would believe the truth. How then can it be said to the reprobate, "he that believeth not shall be damned?" For the reprobate would believe an absolute untruth, if he believed that God had given him eternal life. Consequently, if the Restitution be not true, the text has no application to the unbeliever—for the Gospel must embrace the salvation of the unbeliever, before his unbelief can virtually make God a liar—if it does not embrace his salvation, then he is correct in disbelieving it. But, if the Gospel does actually embrace his salvation, and there is sufficient testimony of that fact, the unbeliever commits wrong by neglecting said testimony.

If, then, the final salvation of every unbeliever is certain, in what consists damnation? An illustration will answer. Suppose that two sons of a parent are captured by Indians and carried into the endless praries of the far West. The parent starts a messenger, who manages to communicate with the sons, and informs them that their parent is raising a force to liberate them. One son believes the message—but does his belief create the message? No! it is the message which creates his belief? What is the result of his belief? Why, until the time of liberation, he joyfully hopes for the arrival of his parent—this is salvation from fear. The other son disbelieves the message—but does his unbelief destroy the intention of the parent? By no means! What then is the consequence of his unbelief? Why, he has none of the hopes which the other son enjoys, while he may constantly anticipate destruction by the savages—This, to him, is damnation from unbelief. Well, the period arrives, and the parent liberates them—the hopes of the one are fulfilled, and the unbelief of the other is lost in fact.

So with the Gospel. It is presented to man in the message that God will finally deliver man from sin and death. He that disbelieves this message, is afraid—he does not know whether annihilation or endless misery will be his lot—these fears are damnation. What says the Saviour? "He that believeth on him is not condemned, but he that believeth not, is condemned already." John iii: 18. "He that believeth on the Son, hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth in him." Verse 36. Observe, that the damnation, condemnation or wrath, abideth on the sinner in the present tense, and has no allusion to a future world.

Let it be remembered, however, that the consequences of unbelief do not separate us from the love of God. Oh, no! The love of God extends to his children, even when in unbelief. This is the reason why Jesus was sent among men. They were in error and sin—he sent the Redeemer to save them from these evils, and lead them to God and virtue. Had they been righteous and happy, there would not have been any need of a Saviour. It was not the belief or the goodness of the world, which prompted God to send the Saviour—it was their wretched condition, which called forth his affection, for he loved us, even while dead in trespasses and in sins. The unbelief of man separates him not from the love of God, for, like that beneficent Power whose light is the glory of the universe, he seeks to remove their unbelief and make them happy.

Such, then, are the consequences which have followed belief and unbelief in all ages of the Christian church, as many passages might be adduced to prove. But an important question now arises—to whom do the salvation and damnation of the text, refer? I answer, the text refers strictly to the apostolic age, and to no other; for proof of which, the context is confidently cited.—"And these signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents with safety; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover" Verses 17, 18. These signs were as expressly to follow those who believed, as condemnation was to follow the unbelievers. Admit that the passage applies to the present period of time, and where is there a true believer? Is there a person in the present age, calling himself a believer, who can cast out demons, speak with new tongues, and drink aquafortis without injury? Certainly not! If, then, the passage applies to this age, not a single true believer can be found—consequently all will be damned. But confine the passage to the apostolic age, and this difficulty at once vanishes.

The text was spoken by Christ to the apostles, and was drawn out by their proneness to disbelieve the resurrection—for, in Matthew, chap. 28, we are informed, that immediately before the ascension of Jesus, as he met the disciples by appointment at a mountain in Galilee, even then some of them doubted. Hence Christ spake to them, "He that believeth and is baptised" (the baptism of the Holy Ghost) "shall be saved"—that is, those of your number, and during your age—"he that believeth not [of your number and during your age] shall be damned."

Unbelief which is exercised from want of testimony, can not be culpable—but the unbelief mentioned in the text, is culpable. The Jews believed that Christ performed miracles—this was so palpable that they could not deny it. But they suffered their prejudices so to overcome them, that they refused to accredit the fact, which those miracles proved—viz. that Christ was the promised Messiah—hence, they said that he performed miracles by the power of a demon. For this blind resistance of the truth, they were condemned—and their condemnation was manifested at the destruction of their nation, and is seen to this very day, in the condition of the Jewish people. The apostles and primitive Christians, by believing, were saved from the errors of the Jewish people, and from the overthrow of their institutions; for in the wars between the Jews and Romans, we have no intimation that a single Christian was lost. As an evidence that they were true believers, the signs mentioned were to be exhibited by them.

Why were the signs exhibited by believers then, and not by believers now? The answer is obvious.—Christianity could not be proved as coming from God, except by some extraordinary method. That method was, to enable Christ and his immediate followers to perform works which no human being, in and of himself, could possibly execute—for, if no such works had been performed, Christianity would scarcely have been better proved than the Koran. But the miracles which were accomplished, together with the character of Christ and the purity of his system, prove that the Gospel is a revelation from God to men. Did the primitive Christians exhibit these signs? They did!

1. "In my name shall they cast out devils." To cast out devils or demons, was an expression, denoting the cure of epilepsy and insanity. The Jews supposed that epileptic and insane persons were afflicted by evil spirits or demons—and the language of Christ is adapted to that notion. When the seventy returned from preaching the Gospel, they said to the Saviour, "Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name." Luke x: 17. While in Acts, chapters xv and xix, we are informed that Paul healed many such unfortunate creatures—so that the sign was fully seen.

2. "They shall speak with new tongues." Most gloriously was this sign exhibited on the day of Pentecost. On that occasion, there were assembled, Parthians Medes, Elamites, dwellers in Mesopotamia and in Judea, and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt and in the parts of Lybia about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews and Proselytes, Cretes and Arabians." Acts 2d. Yet the apostles spoke to all these strangers in their several languages, so that they were completely understood, although they had no previous opportunities of education, never had spoken such languages until the Pentecostal day. So astounding was this fact to the hearers, that "they were all amazed and marvelled, saying one to another, behold, are not all these which speak Galileans? and how hear we every man in our own tongue, wherein we were born?" Now, their speaking these languages, was emphatically speaking with new tongues, for the knowledge of those languages was received, not by gradual acquirement, but instantaneously by the power of God. And so powerful was the miracle, that 3,000 were added to the church in one day.

3. "They shall take up serpents." This sign was eminently shown by Paul while on his last voyage to Rome. In the 28th chap. of Acts, we are informed that he was shipwrecked, and escaped to the island of Melita, or, as it is now called, Malta. After he had landed, we find the following record of him:—"When Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks, and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat, and fastened on his hand. And when the barbarians saw the venomous beast hang on his hand, they said among themselves, no doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath kept the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live. And he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm.—Howbeit, when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly: but after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said that he was a god." Verses 3-7. From this account, it appears that the viper which clung to the hand of Paul, was very venomous, and that whoever was bitten by it, died. Still Paul was preserved! Remarkable evidence that he was specially preserved by Deity, as the great apostle to the Gentiles!

4. "If they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them." Although we have no instance on record, in which the apostles were subjected to the influence of poison, yet, the promise was, that they should be preserved from it, if in danger—which, we have reason to believe, as the other signs were fully exhibited, and yet they were saved.

5. "They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." There are numerous instances of the fulfilment of this sign; so many, that it will not be necessary for me to quote on the subject.

These signs, which followed believers during the apostolic age, ceased at the end of that age. They ceased, because it was not necessary that they should continue, for the miracles which were then performed, were sufficient to seal Christianity as the work of God—while the abundant heathen and Christian testimony which attests the performance of those miracles, is sufficiently powerful to withstand every investigation. They sealed a system of the most glorious character—one which delineates the character of the Deity, presents the Saviour in the most exalted scenes of devotion for the benefit of man, points out the morning star of immortality amid the clouds of death, and holds up that religion, whose practice is virtue and benevolence.

The gift of these signs, then, determine the true application of the text, as certainly as the pillars of light in the temple of the East are indications of the rising sun. These signs were as truly to follow the believer, as condemnation was to follow the unbeliever. Here, then, we take our stand. Let those who apply the passage to the present age, either convince gainsayers by exhibiting the signs mentioned, or let them confess that it belongs wholly to the age of the apostles—one side or the other must be taken, for there is no longer room for mistake about this matter. If it is tenaciously affirmed still, that the passage proves endless misery, and is applicable to the present age, let the certain conclusion be admitted, that there are no true believers now, since no person can show these signs; or let it be admitted that the passage has been strangely misapplied and most unaccountably misunderstood.

Such are the views, then, which we present of this matter, leaving it for you to decide who is right and who is wrong. But before dismissing the subject, there is an important idea growing out of it, which should never be forgotten—it is this: faith founded on testimony, or unbelief from want of testimony, is in no ways culpable or wrong. Hence, it will be seen that persecution for difference of opinion, is wholly contrary to the Scriptures and the philosophy of the human mind; for, not all the fire in the universe can produce rational belief without testimony. We have no right to complain, then, that people embrace the various isms of the day—if we suppose that they are misled by error and have mistaken the nature of testimony, it is our duty to present them, in Christian charity, the testimony which has convinced us, to see if it will not also convince them, and lead them to believe in the Restitution of all things. The great wrong about belief, is—refusing to practice those things which that system enjoins, of whose truth we are convinced. There are those who believe in Christianity, and yet, who daily trample its laws beneath their feet, by reason of great wickedness. Such are culpably at fault, and they will find that the righteous Judge of all the earth, does not hold them guiltless.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Just received, and for sale at this Office, a second lot of "The Rose of Sharon, a religious Souvenir for 1840, edited by Miss Sarah C. Edgarton." It is splendidly bound in gilt muslin, with gilt edges, ornamented with four engravings, and wholly filled with original matter, (with the exception of a great portion of an article entitled "Fortune," by L. C. Browne, which is old matter ground over, as may be seen by consulting the Magazine and Advocate, Vol. iv, page 128!!) much of it from the pen of the Editor. Excepting two articles by the writer of this, and one or two small trifles by others, I do not hesitate to say that the matter contained in this work is superior to that contained in any work of the kind I have read for a long time. The articles by Miss Edgarton, which form a large share of the work, are generally superior to her former efforts. As the Publisher has not ventured to print but 2000 copies, when 4000 will not supply the demand which will undoubtedly be made for this cheap and excellent annual, those who would procure a copy must apply early. Price, $2.00

Also, received and for sale as above, "Universalism illustrated and defended; being a system of doctrinal and practical divinity deduced from reason and revelation, by Otis A. Skinner, Pastor of the fifth Universalist society in Boston." Abel Tompkins is the publisher of both these works. This latter named is intended to be a complete manual of our views, for those who wish to understand our religion, and be guided in the performance of its duties. The chapters on the divine authority of the Bible, the Bible a complete system of divinity, on the unity of God, original sin, total depravity, and on the divine law, have been read with much interest and profit. The style is clear, close, chaste, rising at times to the beautiful—the reasoning is calm, comprehensive, and very candid, the doctrines and arguments combatted are generally given in the very language of those who hold them, and the author is very happy, indeed, in weaving in the numerous quotations from eminent writers, with which he has varied his own excellent ground work. I know not how more could have been so well written in so brief a space.

His views on the Lord's Supper, (read while "running over" the work to see its range,) are, that it was instituted after celebrating the Passover, that it is an ordinance of itself, expressly instituted by Christ, and rendered obligatory on his followers in all ages by his express command. I think this latter view is calculated to prevent its observance by all whose consciences do not so recognize it, if urged on them on that ground—at least many do abstain for that reason alone. As to his former named views, I deem them as erroneous as this latter, being fully persuaded that what is called the ordinance of the eucharist, was nothing more than a portion of the passover itself, and only applied to denote a future as well as a past event—the whole of which had its fulfilment and end in the dispensation of types and shadows.

It is to be regretted, since the book was designed to be "a system," that Br. Skinner did not add his views of the so-called ordinances of water baptism and feet washing, both of which are esteemed by many as obligatory on us as the eucharist, and the latter of which is commanded even more especially, and solemnly, and with reason therefor, than is the eucharist.

But, the book is a good one—a valuable, because interesting and profitable one—cheap in price, and we hope it will soon be in the hands of all who would know what Universalists do believe respecting the various items that are generally found in a system of doctrinal and practical divinity.

It contains twenty-seven chapters on as many different subjects of faith or practice, and is a duodecimo book of 356 pages, beautifully printed in a large type, on fine paper, handsomely bound in muslin—all for only one dollar per copy. A. B. G.

Suffice it to say, that the delivery of this address gave great pleasure to all who heard it, and that its perusal has increased our admiration of the author for his bold, comprehensive views, and liberality. We warmly commend it to a reading and thinking public. For sale at this office—price 19 cents, retail.

REV. MESSRS. MANLEY AND HOYT.

Mr. Hoyt's defence against the charges of Br. Manley was received in September. But my absence during the whole of that month, prevented my paying any attention to it, consequently it was delayed until now, when we hasten to give it place as early as possible.—Our readers, by an examination of Br. Manley's letters and the copy of Mr. Hoyt's which he also published at that time, will readily see that he might mistake (if mistaken he was) Mr. H.'s meaning, without wilfully and maliciously doing so. Indeed, many of the readers of Mr. Hoyt's letter to Mr. Manley, (including myself,) understood Mr. Hoyt as did Mr. Manley, and that, certainly, without any design so to understand him! We again refer the readers to the whole correspondence.

POETRY.

[From the "Rose of Sharon."]

HYMN OF THE WALDENSES.

BY MISS S. C EDGARTON.

Come to the wooded mountain!
Come to the ruined tower!
Come to the wildwood fountain!
Come to the lonely bower!
Wooded mountain,
Ruined tower,
Wildwood fountain,
Lonely bower—
Out from builded temples driven,
Here we praise the God of heaven.

God of the Christian, hear us!
Spirit of love divine,
Thou with that love be near us,
Here in our sylvan shrine!
Father, bear us
Love divine!
Be thou near us
In our shrine!
Here we scorn the flame and sword,
Mighty in thy conquering Word!

THE DOOM OF BABYLON.

BY EV. A. C. THOMAS.

Wo, wo, to thee, Babylon! Wo to Chaldea!
The red hand of war is preparing thy shroud!
The blood of the slaughtered still smokes in Judea,
And the grief of thy bondmen, in suffering bowed,
For vengeance appealeth, and crieth aloud.

The triumph o'er Salem, the spoil of our nation,
Hath cursed thee with pride and consuming renown!
From the throne of his glory, in just indignation,
In tempest-winged blackness our God will come down,
And thy light will be quenched in his withering frown.

Long, long have we wept by thy wide rolling waters,
Enslaved and forlorn, and enshrouded in gloom;
But redemption approacheth! the harps of our daughters
Are strung to exult that the pall of the tomb
Is woven to cover proud Babylon's doom!

Yea, thou which art known as of kingdoms the glory,
The excellent beauty—famed city of gold!
Destruction's swift besom in wrath will sweep o'er thee,
As over Gomorrah and Sodom of old
The thunders of vengeance indignantly rolled!

Still shout in thy triumph! thy doom has been written,
The day of thy downfall thou canst not prolong!
The plague-spot is on thee—thy princes are smitten—
And leprosy marketh thy revelling throng,
As wildly they joy in the feast and the song.

In halls now bedecked with the glare of thy splendor,
The Satyr shall dance, and the wild beast shall prowl;
The dragon shall hiss o'er thy desolate grandeur,
And the cormorant shriek at the wolf's startling howl,
And the bittern respond to the hoot of the owl!

Thy doom hath been uttered! the wrath-tempest lowereth,
Thy gates and thy battlements nought can avail;
Each cedar of Lebanon joyfully towereth
To join in our pæan, because of thy wail,
In the clash of the arms that against thee prevail!

And thou, haughty Lucifer! son of the morning!
How fallen from heaven, how fallen art thou!
The nations that feared thee, thy sceptre are scorning,
O where is thy might and magnificence now?
The laurels have withered that bloomed on thy brow!

And Scheol is moved at thy coming to meet thee,
The dead are stirred up from the places beneath,
And the slain of thy sword are uprising to greet thee
With bitter reproach and the taunting breath,
From the dark charnel house of the gulf of death!

Throned monarch of multitudes! slave of ambition!
The dust of the sepulchre veileth thy pride!
Once feared and obeyed—now the theme of derision!
The warrior who conquered is boldly defied
By the vanquished who lie by the vanquisher's side.

Destroyer of kingdoms! long greatly victorious,
Now peer to the slaughtered and prey to the worm!
Unstrung are thy sinews, and, mutely inglorious,
Thou humblest thyself to commingle thy form
With victims crushed down in thy maddening storm!

Shout, daughter of Zion! The heathen oppressor
No longer thy joy and rejoicing shall mar;
And Salem of rest shall be long the possessor,
For he who our people contemn and abhor
Is broken in pieces, and perished in war!

AUTUMN.

The first severe frost had come and the miraculous change had passed upon the leaves which is known only in America. The blood-red sugar-maple, with a leaf more delicate and brighter than a Circassian lip, stood here and there in the forest, like the Sultan's standard in a host—the solitary and far-seen aristocrat of the wilderness; the birch, with its spirit-like and amber leaves, ghosts of the departed Summer, turned out along the edges of the woods, like a lining of the palest gold; the broad sycamore and the fan-like catalpa flaunted their saffron foliage in the sun spotted with gold, like the wings of a lady-bird; the kingly oak, with its summit shaken bare, still hid its majestic trunk in a drapery of sumptuous dies, like a stricken monarch, gathering his robes of state about him, to die royally in his purple; the tall poplar, with its minaret of silver leaves, stood blanched, like a coward, in the dying forest, burdening every breeze with its complainings; the hickory, paled through its enduring green; the bright berries of the mountain-ash, flushed with a more sanguine glory in the unobstructed sun; the gaudy tulip tree, sybarite of vegetation, stripped of its golden cups, still drank the intoxicating light of noon-day in leaves, than which the lip of an Indian shell was never more delicately tinted; the still deeper died vines of the lavish wilderness, perishing with the noble things whose Summer they had shared, outshone them in their decline, as woman, in death, is heavenlier than the being on whom in life she leaned; and alone and unsympathising in this universal decay, outlaws from nature, stood the fir and the hemlock, their frowning and sombre heads darker and less lovely than ever, in contrast with the death-struck glory of their companions.

The dull colors of English autumnal foliage give you no conception of this marvellous phenomenon. The change is gradual; in America it is the work of a night—of a single frost!

Oh! to have seen the sun set on hills bright in the still green and lingering Summer, and to wake in the morning to a spectacle like this!

It is as if a myriad of rainbows were laced through the tree-tops—as if the sunset of a Summer—gold, purple and crimson—had been fused in the alembick of the west, and poured back in a new deluge of light and color over the wilderness. It is as if every leaf in those countless trees had been painted to outflush the tulip—as if, by some electric miracle, the dyes of the earth's heart had struck upwards, and her crystals and ores, her sapphires, hyacinths and rubies, had let forth their imprisoned colors, to mount through the roots of the forest, and, like the angels that, in olden time, entered the bodies of the dying, reanimate the perishing leaves, and revel an hour in their bravery.—N. P. Willis.

Cautiousness.—Taking a man into a corner, and talking so loud that all the room can hear you. Or, sneaking down a dark alley to avoid meeting a creditor. Or, telling a man to take care, after you have run against him and knocked him over.

DEATHS.

In Tully, September 25th, Miss HANNAH HUTCHINSON, aged 72 years, after an illness of some two or three months. She went down into the arms of death firm in the faith of universal salvation, in which she had, for the last twenty years, been a firm believer. And may this glorious and excellent faith sustain the mourning relatives in their affliction. On the 27th her funeral was attended, and a discourse appropriate to the occasion delivered by Elder Streeter, (Baptist.) H. CHAPIN.

In Litleville, Livingston co., on the 17th, of September, Mrs. AUGUSTA C. CADY, aged 23 years and 4 months, formerly of Pompey, N. Y. The deceased was every thing that rendered woman amiable, lovely and useful. Her habits of industry, her deeds of kindness, affability, gentleness and Christian deportment, endeared her to a large circle of friends and neighbors. She made no profession of religion, yet she was not destitute of its possession. She was early taught to believe in the doctrine of future endless misery, and it failed to give her needed comfort and support. She at last however examined more thoroughly the divine record, and became satisfied of the truth of the doctrine that all men will finally be purified and made happy. This doctrine sustained her in her last hours, and enabled her to say confidingly, "I have no fears to die. I am willing to go when it is my Father's will." She has thus gone to her long home, and she felt that she was indeed going home to her loving Father. She has left two small children, a confiding husband, a father and mother, and numerous other relatives and friends, to mourn their loss. Peace be to her, everlastingly, and consolation to her surviving relatives. Her funeral was attended in the Presbyterian meeting house at Littleville, on the 18th, by the writer.

O. R.

In Danube, September 28th, of scarlet fever, ANDREW, infant son of John and Rebecca Staring. Funeral attended on the 30th, at the meeting house in Newville. Sermon by the writer. J. D. HICKS.

In Newville, October 8th, of inflammation on the lungs, HUDSON, eldest son of Dr. Abram and Matilda Snyder, aged 11 years, 10 months, and 21 days. The funeral services were attended on the 10th, in the meeting house in Newville, and an appropriate, pathetic and interesting discourse was delivered to a large and attentive congregation of sympathising friends and relatives, by Br. H. B. Soule, of Oxford, who providentially happened to be in the place. He was assisted in the services by the writer of this article, and Elder Covil, of the Baptist denomination, who thereby earned for himself much respect and esteem for the Christian spirit manifested by him on the occasion!

Thus has our much beloved brother and sister been by death deprived of a promising and interesting son, to whom they were strongly attached; and they very sensibly feel and lament their loss. But the patience, the resignation and the fortitude with which the little sufferer endured his last illness, and his fearlessness of entering that spirit land, and his assurance of resting in the arms of him that brought to light the doctrine of life and immortality, give them great consolation, and they mourn not as those without hope.

J. D. HICKS.

In Salina, N. Y., October 6th, Mrs. ALMENA GILLCHRES, wife of Mr. Ira A. Gillchres, aged 45 years. Mrs. Gillchres had long been a sincere and consistent believer in the Gospel of impartial grace—a practical Universalist. She died in the triumphs of faith, looking forward in glorious anticipation to the glad era when the vast family of man will, in the "fulness of times, be gathered together as one in Christ" Jesus our Lord. Mrs. G. was respected and esteemed by all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance—by all of every name and denomination. None who knew her could refuse for a moment in owning her as a sincere and devoted Christian. Her funeral was attended on the 7th inst., at the Presbyterian house, and a discourse delivered in the midst of a large concourse of sympathising friends. May the consolations of the Gospel in its fulness be imparted to the afflicted partner of the deceased. May he not mourn as those who mourn without hope. N. BROWN.

LOVE TO GOD AND MAN....NO. IV.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

We profess to believe that there is life and immortality for a redeemed world beyond the grave—that God has willed and purposed the ultimate salvation of every sinful and fallen creature, and that Christ, who was sent to do the will of his Father, will finally destroy him that hath the power of death, bring back the self-exiled from their wanderings, and effect a complete and a universal triumph over every enemy of man, and every foe of his most perfect and unbounded felicity. We profess to look upon the whole intelligent creation as our brethren, and as destined along with ourselves, to an existence and a state of happiness which shall run parallel with eternity. Then how perfectly reasonable it is, that our affectionate desires should encircle the universe. Let others act as they may with regard to this matter, the Universalist has no excuse for withholding his love from a single child of earth. If he be lifted up in pride and haughtiness—if he exalt himself above any portion of his fellow-men, so as to have no communion with them, he is guilty of gross inconsistency—there is not a corresponding likeness between his profession and practice, but he is acting in direct opposition to the avowed principles of his faith, and practicing that which he condemns in theory. And how much reproach he will thus bring upon the cause he professes to love, and how hinder others from arriving at a knowledge of the truth, by this unholy short-coming of the glory of his own religion!

Many of those individuals who surround us, may be sunk to the very lowest depths of vice and sensuality—they may have beggared themselves and their families by reason of their intemperance, and have degraded themselves below a level with the "brutes that perish;" still, this is no good reason why we should not cherish friendliness of feeling toward them. I know we are apt to shun the loathsome and degraded drunkard, as though he were a viper in our path; and instead of trying to win him back to virtue's ways by the voice of kindness, cast him out from our presence, and manifest no other feelings towards him, than those of indignation and scorn. This is wrong; and especially in one cherishing the high and holy faith of the Universalist. We should not look upon the degraded being as we here find him, but as he will be when his robes shall have been washed white in the blood of the Lamb, and as he will appear in his "career of improvement after a lapse of millions of ages."

Believing, as we do, that the most hard and obdurate heart will ultimately be softened and subdued by the energies of God's holy spirit, and that the vilest wretch who walks the earth, will be disrobed of his corruptible garments, and clothed with those of light and incorruption, and be placed in a situation, where he shall be continually increasing in divine wisdom and knowledge throughout an eternity of duration—believing this, how is it possible for us to withhold our affectionate desires from even the vilest of the vile! We can not, and be consistent. To live up to the teachings of our holy religion, we must love every intelligent child of God—not one must be passed by as undeserving a place in our affections, even though he may be enveloped in sin as with a garment. And the sincere Universalist will love all. To him the second commandment is perfectly reasonable. He looks upon every human being as a child of God, and as destined, along with himself, to an eternal world of glory. And his affectionate desires extend to all—they can not be confined within the narrow bounds of a sect or party, but they encircle the vast universe of humanity!

Let us, then, be consistent. Let us make our practice accord with our faith. If we do this, we shall see a flood of glory breaking in upon the surrounding darkness. We shall see the cause of truth prevailing over error and unbelief, and hundreds and thousands that are now ranked with our opposers, rallying around the standard of free and universal salvation. We shall witness a revival of pure and undefiled religion, and a forsaking of the darkness and slavery of sin, for the glorious light and liberty of the children of God! The march of Gospel principles will be onward with increased rapidity—the glory and beauty of our faith will be revealed to the world—rivers of tears will be dried up—many disconsolate sighs hushed, and peace and joy be made to roll down our streets like a mighty flood, and rejoicing and praise fill every heart and employ every tongue!

Concerning the different modes in which this love should be displayed, I need say but little.—If an individual really and sincerely loves his fellow-men, he will be active. The needy and the suffering will be searched out—their wants supplied, and their woes alleviated. The sick will be ministered unto with a ready and willing hand—the dying cheered with the words of kindness and heavenly consolation, and caused to fall asleep in death with a song of triumph on their lips! Of such an individual it may be said in the language of the pious Job—He is eyes to the blind—feet to the lame, and a father to the poor. When the ear hears him, then it blesses him; and when the eye sees him, it gives witness to him; because he delivers the poor that cries, and the fatherless, and him that hath none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish comes upon him, and he causes the widow's heart to sing for joy!

But love to our neighbor may not only be displayed in visiting the sick, supplying the hungry with food, the thirsty with drink, the naked with raiment, and in proffering the rich consolations of the Gospel to the dying; it may not only be displayed by "rejoicing with those who do rejoice, and weeping with those who weep;" but also in sincere endeavors to promote the best and dearest interests of man, as a moral and intelligent being. Man is a creature formed in the image of his God; he is in possession of powers and faculties which ally him to a higher order of beings, and declare him to have been created for a high and holy destination. But noble as man is by creation—exalted as are the powers and faculties of which he is in possession, still we see him degraded—degraded too by his own ignorance or folly. We behold him ignorant of the character of the great and good Being who created him, and who is declared to be the unfailing Friend and Father of all—ignorant of the true "end and aim" of all his righteous dispensations, and of the most glorious and heart-cheering, and soul-rejoicing truths of divine revelation!

Now, love to our neighbor may be displayed in an exalted manner, by judicious and well-directed efforts to extend a knowledge of the true nature and character of God abroad among mankind—to bring out the error-enslaved from their dark prison house, and introduce them into that perfect state of freedom, enjoyed by those who have embraced, in its fulness of love, the Gospel of Christ. Oh! then let us go to those who are rushing on in the hard and thorny way of the transgressor—ignorant of God's righteous government and laws, and tell them that they are but treasuring up for themselves wrath, tribulation and anguish, and that there is no peace for the child save in the service of its Father. Let us endeavor, by all the ways and means in our power, to accelerate the march of Gospel principles, and to render more rapid the advancement of truth, and the progress of our Redeemer's cause!

We have a great work to perform. The mountain of a world's prejudice lies in our path, impeding our onward course. Faith in the abstract will never remove it. It is our practice, and our practice alone, that will crumble it to the dust.—We profess a benevolence that is universal—and that encircles the universe. This love must be manifested in every possible way, and we must be active and energetic in its manifestation. Mankind expect much from the Universalist, and they have a right to expect it. We profess a higher and holier faith than others, and the world has a right to look for a corresponding practice. When this is beheld, we shall see the mountain of prejudice removing from our path, truth rapidly prevailing over error, light over darkness, and the faith of a world's salvation, over that which limits the boundless grace and love of the Redeemer!

INGRATITUDE.

BY J. M. ELWOOD.

Nothing will sooner arouse the indignant feelings of the human heart than a display of ingratitude. Though the mind, stamped with the energy of virtue and the inflexibility of justice, will mourn over the calamities of the unfortunate, and deplore the depravity of the human race, yet it must execrate the turpitude of the ingrate soul. Mankind have ever exhibited a spirit of envious malignity that would rob the worthy of their reputation—that would tarnish the dear-bought diadem that ornaments the votary of honor; sully its brightest gems—then mock the wearer by pointing to his shaded crown as the emblem of his worth—that would magnify the most trifling aberration into the most heinous offence, and debase to a level with its own ignoble self, those whom deeds of "noble daring have stationed as beacons along the track of Time." This cursed spirit of ingratitude and detraction is engendered and fostered by jealousy, local prejudice, or personal interest; and in its operations it combines almost every evil quality, and prosecutes its schemes with the most determined perversity.

The clanking fetter bound the frame, and the grief-musing thought that posterity would deem the sentence just, rankled in the bosom of America's Discoverer—the world's benefactor; and not content with this indignity, as if determined that his reputation should scarcely survive his bodily dissolution—the world, base, ingrate, and capricious, have denied him the honor of associating his name with the land of his creation. With a most impious neglect or intolerable stupidity, they have disregarded his claims, and conferred the honor due to his sagacity upon one, as little entitled to it as "Peter the Hermit," or "Don Quixote," the knight of windmill memory.

As an example of national ingratitude—the martial leader, who scaled the Alpine glaciers, and who first taught Roman strength to qualify its confidence, can never be forgotten. He died by a suicidal hand, exiled from the land that had witnessed and recorded his vow of eternal and implacable hostility to the Roman name! Instances of this kind are by no means rare; and should the impartial eye glance at the catalogue of our country's greatness, it would rest upon deep, foul, shameful traces of ingratitude—traces which the twilight of ages can not obliterate.

We mention one other species of ingratitude—of all the most revolting and most deeply tinctured with depravity of soul. It is filial ingratitude! There is nothing so unpardonable in its motives, so debasing in its tendency, so peace-destroying in its influence, or that exhibits such surpassing turpitude, as this. We can indeed conceive that friends may sometimes prove faithless to each other, or treacherous to their trust. Secular policy or interest may prompt it. But that the child around whom maternal affection has twined in the intensity of its solicitude, whom a mother's sleepless care has guarded, when infancy exposed to dangers, or nursed when disease has touched the spring of health, should prove ungrateful, seems to set reason at defiance, and almost compel us to acquiesce in the sentiment that teaches the inborn depravity of man. It is a crime which can have no possible excuse or palliation—it is inspired by no motives of revenge—it recognizes no self-advantage or advancement—it fosters the blackest passions and most damning propensities of the heart, and feeds and revels in the vileness that creates it. In short, it is a crime of such unparalleled enormity, that we shall be justified in wresting the words of the poet from their original application, and saying that it is—

'Religion's most abhorred! Perdition's most Forlorn! God's most abandoned! Hell's most damned!"

ESSAYS ON WAR....NO. VI.

BY REV. CHARLES SPEAR.

"Hark! the cry of death is ringing
Wildly from the reeking plain—
Guilty glory, too, is flinging
Proudly forth her vaulting strain.
Thousands on the fields are lying,
Slaughtered in the ruthless strife—
Wildly mingled, dead and dying,
Show the waste of human life!"

Having shown some of the most frequent causes of war, we now proceed to some of the results. Here, innumerable facts press upon our attention. History every where presents them, for history itself is little else than a record of the crimes, blood and carnage, which have made our earth one vast slaughter house.

1. The expenses of war.—Some years since, a statement was made in the London Weekly Review, of the wars of England, and the expences. Of 127 years, terminating in 1815, England spent 65 in war, and 62 in peace! In the war of 1688, she spent 36 millions. In the war of Spanish succession, 62 and a half millions. In the Spanish war of 1739, 54 millions. In the seven years' war of 1756, 112 millions. In the American war of 1775, 136 millions. The French revolutionary war, 464 millions. In the war with Bonaparte, 1159 millions. Total, borrowed in seven wars, 834 millions; raised by taxes, 1189 millions; forming a total expenditure of 2023 millions!" Look at one more estimate: "The expenses of a single war-ship in actual service are more than one thousand dollars a day, and there are in Christendom between two and three thousand such ships. England lavished upon Lord Wellington, for only six years' services, nearly $5,000,000. In twenty years, she expended more than a million dollars a day for war alone. The wars of Christendom, during only twenty-two years, from 1793, cost barely for their support, beside many times more in incidental losses, nearly fifteen thousand millions of dollars. Six or eight times as much as all the coin in the world!!" Now in all this, we take not into the account, the vast amount of useful labor that the millions of men engaged in war might have performed; nor of the waste of property actually destroyed by war itself. The picture is indeed a dark one, but we are to take a broader view of this subject than merely to look at it in the light of dollars and cents, though this is gloomy enough, when we reflect that enough has been spent in war to Christianize the globe, and to bind the whole earth together by canals and rail roads.

2. The loss of life.—Here the picture is horrid beyond description. At Borodino there perished in one day 80,000. In the siege of Mexico, more than 100,000 in battle, and more than 50,000 from the effects of putrefying carcasses. We shudder at the thought of Alexander's sacrificing three millions of lives; but his successors occasioned the destruction of twenty millions, the Saracens, sixty millions, and the Crusaders alone, forty millions of nominal Christians!! Some have calculated that Bonaparte was the cause of the death of nearly six millions of our race, reckoning the loss of his own soldiers, and the numbers slain by them! Dick, a very popular writer, calculates that as many have been killed in war, as would fill eighteen worlds like this! How horrid! These have been mangled, massacred, and cut to pieces by those who were made partakers of the same common nature. Language is insufficient to express the emotions of the mind, when we seriously contemplate the horrible scene. And how melancholy is it to reflect, that in the present age, which boasts of its improvements in science, in civilization, and in religion, neither reason, nor benevolence, nor humanity, nor Christianity, has yet availed to arrest the progress of destroying armies, and to set a mark of ignominy on "the people who delight in war!"

3. Moral influence of war.—The view we are now to take, shows war in the most horrid light in which it can be viewed—for what is the waste of wealth, and the loss of life, when compared with moral principle. Better all the wealth on earth should be sunk, and every being destroyed, than to have a single moral principle in God's universe violated. Principle is of far more value than life. Jesus preferred to sacrifice himself rather than to sacrifice the principles he came to establish. We place too great a value upon our lives, and too little on moral principle. We seem to think that life must be preserved at all hazards. Now this view of the value of life would not be so bad, if we would place the same value upon the life of our neighbor that we do upon our own. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." But do we? No. If he injure us, we kill him. Can we take life in any case, and yet love our neighbor as we do ourselves?

War extirpates every principle of compassion, humanity and justice; it blunts the feelings and hardens the heart; it invents instruments of torture, and perpetrates, without a blush, cruelties revolting to every principle of virtue and benevolence. "War introduces and propagates opinions and practices as much against heaven as against earth; it lays our natures and manners as waste as our gardens and our habitations; and we can as easily preserve the beauty of the one as the integrity of the other, under the cursed jurisdiction of drums and trumpets."* "War does more harm to the morals of men, than even to their property and persons."† "It is a temporary repeal of all the principles of virtue."‡ "There is not a virtue of Gospel goodness, but has its death-blow from war.' § "The profession of a soldier almost always unfits men for the business of regular occupations."‖ I have presented these brief quotations, because they come from men who have undoubtedly given the subject a very close investigation.

But there is one view seldom taken of this subject, and that is, the immoral influence of war upon the soldiers themselves. Some may think the smallness of their number should be a sufficient reason for this apathy and indifference.—But their number far exceeds what many suppose. The standing army of Russia may be estimated at 700,000; some place it at a million. The standing army of France, varies from 350 to 400,000. Great Britain has under arms, 100,000 in times of peace; 300.000 in time of war. The standing armies of all the European states may be reckoned at 4,578,430.* Will any one say that the moral and religious interests of so vast a body of men, is a concern too small to occupy the notice, and to elicit the benevolence of the philanthropist? Let us not then turn from the soldier, corrupted as he is by immoralities, and stained by crime; for he is still a human being; let us feel for him, and act for him, and pray for him, as for a brother.

War not only corrupts individuals, but corrupts nations. But on this topic we have only time to glance. A work published at the close of the American Revolution, shows that whatever else we have gained, we certainly lost in point of morality. And I verily believe that we are suffering this day, under the immoral influences of that contest. Of the sincerity of those who engaged in it, of course we say nothing. "Benevolence to our fellow-men," says the above work, "was perhaps never less cultivated in any country than it seems to be of late among us; hard-hearted indifference to the distress of the poor, the widow, and the orphan, have risen up and seized her throne." Speaking of infidelity, the report says, "America at last received the infection. The last war sowed this seed plentifully. Large quantities were imported in the British fleets and armies. Officers in some of our fleets were found, valuing themselves on having read Chubb, and being able to prove his book unanswerable." Thus we might go on and exhibit facts, showing the corrupting influences of war, both as it respects individuals and nations. But we forbear. The present number is sufficiently extended, and in our next we will look at war and the Bible.

THE DUTY OF FREE INQUIRY.

The free agency and accountability of man, as a creature of progressive powers, with a limited period to the exercise of these faculties, render an early spirit of investigation and inquiry, indispensable to every one who considers himself capable of receiving additional advances in knowledge, or desires to have a reason for his views and opinions. It has been often urged, especially by the old school theologians, (and divines of the present day catch the echo with eagerness,) that although a spirit of free inquiry may be laudable in young persons, yet it ought to be circumscribed within due bounds, regulated by moderation, and a great deference to long established truths, and dogmas rendered venerable by long reception with the great, the learned, and the good. This fear, or cautiousness, not to inquire too far, has always been one of the strongholds of error; an impregnable fortress, behind which dark doings and sayings may be hid, and even sanctified. There is a saying gone abroad in the world, that men may inquire too far for their own safety; that there are some things which it would be presumptuous to look into; and this is enforced by the solemn tale of a number of Israelites being struck dead, by attempting to look into the ark, when it returned home from captivity—(see 1 Sam. 6th chap. and 19th verse—) a severe, but just punishment for their temerity, but a high beacon of warning to future ages, not to wish to pry with unhallowed eyes into mysteries with which they have no concern but to believe. The caution is then farther urged, by the frequent cases which have occurred, of young persons becoming unsettled in faith all their lives, or who have been led to disbelieve every thing, and at length settle down to dark atheism. From these observations, it is claimed "that our peace of mind and general well being, require us sometimes to forbear all examination, and remain contented with the notions which have always been in our minds, without well knowing by what process they came there." These sayings, gravely uttered, and that too by our seniors, to whom we have looked for instruction, have affected many minds with the apprehension that guilt may be contracted by wandering out of the circle of time-honored opinions, and opening into new fields of inquiry. When we see a man who has shaken off this fear, we are too often accustomed to look on him as on a reckless youth, who has voluntarily left the peace and comforts of his parental roof, in exchange for the fatigues of travel, in exploring some barren waste.

This is an obstacle which must be overcome; for it is in vain to expect to obtain truth, when we are afraid to inquire for it. All the truth now abroad in the world, is the result of free inquiry, and all that will yet appear, will, it is fair to argue, be obtained by the same process. Fearless inquiry may end in error, but timid, cautious, servile investigations will never be rewarded by truth. There are no secrets in the moral or religious world, which we need fear to divulge, or labyrinths into which we may fear to penetrate; there are no limits beyond which a diligent and impartial being may fear to wander, or carry his researches. The spirit and desire for inquiry is seated in the deep recesses of the mind, and the legitimacy of a free exercise is evinced by the adaptation of objects and things, to the gratification of those desires, and administer pleasure and satisfaction.

Guilt is in this matter out of the question.—We have used those faculties which God has given us, for high and noble purposes; and however erroneous the conclusions we have arrived at, or disastrous the consequences to which we have been conducted; if we were actuated by a sincere, conscientious, and honest desire to find the truth, we are absolved from all blame; if we are anxious not knowingly to adopt error, there can be no upbraidings of conscience, no sense of guilt, but a cheering consciousness of using faculties in a lawful manner, with which we are by nature endowed, and the exercise of which administers happiness.

Let it however be known, and impressed on all minds, young and old, that guilt may be contracted by blind perseverance in present opinions; guilt may be contracted by neglecting the means of seeing and correcting error. And we are highly blamable and guilty, for the non-performance of one of the highest duties imposed on a responsible being.

The rays of truth and light are analogous; we open our eyes to admit the rays of light; if we shut them we see not; in like manner, if we close the eyes of the mind by timidity, superstition, or preconceived prejudices, the rays of divine truth will never enter, the seats of desolation will never be illuminated; and our condition, our fate, will be that of the unprofitable servant, who hid his talent, contracted guilt, and received punishment.

If our opinions are wrong, they need rectifying, and can not be unsettled too soon; if right, inquiry, by making us better acquainted with their tendencies and foundations, will beget in us an increasing regard for them. When we are afraid to examine our views, doubt of their accuracy, and incapability to stand a severe scrutiny is always apparent. Our opinions are formed like our friendships; we adhere to them because we believe them friends, but an accidental circumstance disclosed to our view, defects which astonish us, but which have been plain as noon-day to every one who has not, like us, been blinded by partiality, or previous attachment.

There has been a host of insinuations, and dark inuendoes whispered against a state of doubt, as of all others the most to be dreaded, as cheerless and unhappy—the result of too much inquiry—which haunts the unhappy free thinker like a ghost all his future days: and like a quick sand on the ocean, it has its beacon erected to warn future sailors of the evil. But who objects to doubt on trivial subjects? Why then should it be blamed in matters of essential importance?—When after unbiased examination of a subject of vital interest, considerations for and against, are found to be equal, can any state of mind be more proper than that of doubt? It is not only right, but there is no hesitation in saying, not to doubt would be a fragrant breach of duty, and render our culpability proportionably greater, according to the importance of the subject. All inquiries ought to be carried on without prejudice, or any attachment to preconceived views; it needs no labored argument to prove, that if a man examine a subject with his views enlisted in its favor, or against it, his investigation will be conducted with timidity, and he is as likely to come out wrong, as right; not to mention the pride caused by an overweening attachment to a wrong cause, being hurt by investigation. Unless therefore we can free ourselves from all partiality, or passion, inquiry may have the effect to strengthen prejudice, while we console ourselves with a false hope, that the unction of truth has fallen on our heads.

Let, then, free unbounded inquiry be indulged in; let it be inculcated on all, especially the young, that their duty demands, that their high future destiny demands, that a use of talents and faculties given them to improve demands the cultivation of an unrestricted spirit of inquiry; for they are warranted in believing, on a view of the noble destinies of man, that there exists a congeniality and corespondence between the human mind, and the essence of truth, which no relations or conventions of society can make void, which time or circumstances can never dissolve, but which will shine brighter and brighter to the perfect day. Recollections of what has been achieved, and in view of the obstacles overcome, and the inroads already made in the old dominion of error, notwithstanding the countless prejudices, and barriers opposed by priests, and endowed seminaries of learning, warrant us to say, great is truth, and it must prevail. TRANSITIVE MATTERS.

Moving! moving! moving! all things are moving and changing. The earth and all that is upon it, both animate and inanimate, is ever changing, ever varying. Man, the lord of this changing world, is changeable too. Mutable, restless and aspiring, he is ever moving up and down in his little sphere, ever changing, seeking ease, with no mind to rest. Men move from the east to the west in pursuit of fortune, and for the same object others move from the west to the east. All classes of men have at times the moving mania, and among the rest, the clerical seem almost constantly under its influence. We seldom take up the weekly paper without noticing the removal of some one of our clergymen. Perhaps it is best that it should be so, yet we know that the consequences are often apparently injurious. Nevertheless, in all our moves, it is presumable that no injury is intended; but to improve our own condition, or the condition of others, or both, is the ruling motive. Various are the causes of our frequent removals; and each mover knows best the motive that prompts him: and the community are often surprised, and sometimes disposed to condemn our movements because they know not the circumstances of the case.

In regard to my own recent removal, though I do not conceive it necessary to trouble the reader with an explanation of the inducements, yet it may not be improper to inform him of some things that were not inducements to leave the place of my former labors, that the blame if there be any, may not fall where it ought not. I do not leave Salisbury because the friends in that place and in its vicinity were not kind and liberal, for they were as much so as I ever expect or wish to find any people. Were it not for the rough roads and rugged hills which interpose between the societies of Salisbury, Eatonsville, Middleville and Russia, I know of no location for a preacher more desirable. For one I am certainly under obligations of much gratitude to the members generally of those societies, for the prompt fulfilment of their engagements, and for their generosity to myself and family; for which may Heaven reward and prosper them. The dissolving of my connection with them is attended with more heart felt regret than was anticipated, when first determined on; I hope, however, none of them are disposed to blame me for leaving them, and I hope they will soon be supplied with some faithful one to administer to them the word of life. AN UNCHARITABLE SPIRIT.

There are some people inhabiting this terrestial sphere, who take pleasure and seem to glory, in injuring the feelings of their best—their warmest friends. Their object is not to retaliate for wrong done—but to create pain in the breast of the innocent without grounds; for were there grounds, their detestable object would be entirely defeated. At every remark made by their friend, however well intended, they will and are determined to take offence—i. e. apparently. I would not say, by any means, that they meant to be really angry; no, no, far from this; for they perhaps possess too much of the milk of human kindness, such as it is. Now, Mr. Editor, this is a plain written article—but plain as it is, it is as true as it is plain; and if it has its desired effect, it will cause some to "blush and hang their haughty heads to own themselves members of the human family." There can be no apology whatever, for people to disregard all their moral and social obligations, by playing with the feelings and affections of those who are friends—who endeavor to do as well as imperfect beings can.—People should bear in mind that sharp edged tools were never made to play with—they must be used carefully. What can induce people to inflict wounds upon the feelings of the unoffending—and that, too, because they are so—is beyond my comprehension. But that such is the fact, many can testify. It matters not what their object is, so long as we know it to be bad. It is enough for us to know, that it is our duty as Christians—as beings acting in a social capacity, to refrain from such words and actions as are calculated to injure the feelings of any person, especially of those who are our friends. It is derogatory to the Christian character, and should be discountenanced by all who wish to live respected and die in peace. JEAN.

ANECDOTE.

The following will illustrate the oft repeated declarations that bad men are pleased with Universalist preaching, and that the doctrine of endless misery will reform the worst of sinners. I preached a short time ago in New Egypt, N. J., when two Methodists were present—the one a respectable old farmer, the other a younger man, rather notorious for his immorality. The latter, whom, for the sake of convenience, I shall call Jesse Lightfinger, was a basket-maker by trade, and pilfered the materials for carrying on his business from the woods of his neighbors. After meeting, this Methodist basket-maker was boisterous in his denunciations against the doctrine he had heard preached, declaring it to be a dangerous and damnable doctrine, destructive both of the peace and morals of the community. The old gentleman, of whom I have spoken, and a brother in the faith with Jesse, was inquired of—whether he entertained the same opinion as his noisy neighbor, concerning the sermon. "Why, no"—said he, "I received some very good advice, which I hope I shall profit by; but, as for that Jesse Lightfinger, I do not know what to think of him. I really wish some new doctrine could be discovered that will keep him from stealing my basket stuff."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER TWELVE.

PSALMS—This book is a collection of poetical compositions, of a devotional nature, composed by different persons, but chiefly by David; they were designed for the temple service, and were sung by the Levites. Some sung the words of the Psalm, while others accompanied them with instruments of music of various kinds. These Psalms were probably collected and arranged as we now have them by Ezra.

Selah—This word, which frequently occurs in these Psalms, probably denoted a pause in the music, or the change of one company of performers for another.

Psalm li: 5. "Behold I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me."

This is only a proverbial expression to denote a grievous offender. It was used by the rulers of the Jews to the man who had been born blind. John ix: 34. Had David been born with any evil dispositions, it would have been an extenuation of his crimes; whereas this is evidently mentioned as an aggravation of them. That the nature of man was changed after the fall, is very far from being probable—nay, it is not true, as might easily be shown. If the natural disposition of Adam had been better than that of his descendants, why did he not resist temptation more effectually than he did! Who of his posterity could have shown greater weakness than both he and his wife!

Psalm lxxxii: 6. "I have said ye are gods, and all of you are children of the Most High."

Magistrates might be called gods on account of their power. Thus Moses is called a god with respect to Pharaoh. Exodus iv: 16; and vii: 1. This passage in Psalms is quoted by our Saviour in answer to the Jews; who censured him for calling himself the Son of God. See John x: 35.

THE POPULAR THEOLOGY.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

O how cruel, how selfish a system is partialism! How entirely dissonnant to every finer feeling of the heart. It casts the blackest stigma on the character of the infinite Jehovah, and scandalizes the very name of benevolence. It strikes at the root of all human merit—it poisons the sweet well-springs of love and affection, and arrogates to a peculiar few all the favors of Heaven.

I suppose, gentle reader, it is accounted very bold and unlady-like, for one to question the authority of a preacher's word; but, really, when the gospel is actually trodden under foot of men, when universal goodness is robed in the hideous mask of an evil demon, and every fine and noble sentiment of the human bosom outraged by the merciless dogma, it seems as if the very stones would cry out. Do any of our friends ever query, of what use partialism can be to any person? It can not make men better, for it only operates by fear; and though the thief may forbear to pilfer, because he fears detection, yet his will is the same, and in the sight of God he is a thief still. The murderer may tremble while waiting in his gloomy covert for his unconscious victim, and, through terror of human and divine vengeance, may let fall the gleaming steel, and allow his prey to pass unhurt, but his heart is the same black mass of malice, revenge, and all the unholy passions that degrade humanity. Of what use, then, is the preaching of partialism? I can tell you, gentle reader, of one use it has, if perchance you believe that message, whose annunciation made vocal with seraphic melody, the storied hills of Judea, while midnight held her silent watch in the sky; —if you have been made free by this lifegiving message, and then got into a cold "backsliding" state, and hardly know whether you thank God or not, for his great condescension to man in the revelation of his love, just go and hear a limitarian lecture upon the innate depravity of the human heart—the dark and fearful destiny that awaits a great portion of our race; hear him contradict himself, and disannul reason, while he makes the volume of inspiration a complete jargon; and I do believe it will awaken your drowsy, sluggish spirits to bless and to praise Him, who has not left you to grope your way in the shadow of superstition and bigotry. I fear there are too many among us, who sit quietly down to the love-feast of the Gospel, and banquet upon the heavenly viands of Divine truth, and taste the rich wine of the New Jerusalem, without thinking of the multitudes that are perishing for the lack of bread—that bread which came down from heaven and giveth life to the world. It ought not thus to be. Shall the ministers of a limited salvation exert every faculty to induce mankind to drink of the bitter waters that bring despair and death to the mourning spirit; and shall we who receive from the exhaustless fountain of unlimited grace, the cup of joy and rich consolation, be content to enjoy it alone? O no! Let the heralds of Zion go forth upon the walls of the city, and proclaim peace—peace, and salvation from, not in, sin. Let them proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of salvation of our God; let them preach liberty to the captive, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound, until the mourners shall no longer sit by Babel's stream, but take their harps from the willows, and sing with joyful voices—the anthems of eternal love! Do the followers of a partial creed enjoy peace? Does their belief buoy them up above the trials and sorrows incident to this life? Alas! let the sad dejection of their countenances, the tears, the moans of agony that rend their spirits in view of the future, answer. It is impossible for even the most selfish soul to be satisfied with its own salvation, while the nearest and dearest friends of its love are exposed to the danger of eternal wo.—Verily, they have no rest day or night, who worship the beast, or have the mark of his image.

MIS-SPENT TIME.

How much of our unhappiness arises from a consciousness of having spent our days in vain, and without accomplishing any great or worthy object! How much does this consciousness add to the fretting discontent of daily life! How much, also, does it add to the repulsiveness of a sick-bed! How poignant and soul-harrowing does it, likewise, make the reflections of a death-bed! Is there, indeed, any one who hath not heard the voice of offended conscience, in seasons of sickness and solitude, reproaching him for the waste of precious time? If any of the readers of this paper have attained to this degree of perfection, (or insensibility,) they need read no farther: To them we know not what to say. We speak to those only who are conscious of the very different feelings, with which they spend time and reflect upon it after it is spent. We speak to those only in whose ears conscience makes itself heard—to whom she ever appears, as an unwelcome visitor, in hours of stillness and reflection. We speak to those only who, from experience, are ready to join in such an apostrophe as this: —"Oh conscience, what a cheat thou art! How thou allowest thyself to be laid asleep by present sensations of delight, and then risest upon us in secret in all thy gloomy strength!—Thou art cowardly, for thou takest us alone and in darkness.—Thou art treacherous, for thou forsakest thy post to the enemy.—Thou art weak, for thou standest us in no stead in our necessity. Would that thou wouldst either take us or let us alone; either give us up to enjoyment, and trouble us not with thine after-thoughts; or else take us to thyself, and make us what thou art ever harping upon us to become."

To those who have experienced the unhappiness and the reproaches which we have above alluded to, we wish we could speak, so that they might escape all such unhappiness, and all such remorseful retrospects of mis-spent time in future. We wish we could hear such a voice for ourselves. But sudden changes, for better or for worse, are not in accordance with our present constitution; and, therefore, in wending our way to this goal where we shall be free from the 'compunctious visitings' of conscience, we must be satisfied if we are conscious of progress—steady, unremitting, onward progress.

To aid the steps of fellow-travellers in this upward, heaven-ward, path of self-amelioration, we submit to their considerations, in some silent, serious hour—

'When all the world's shut out,' a few suggestions:—

1. As the very foundation of our progress, without which our exertions are aimless and unsteady, we must have distinct views of those objects which, according to our several circumstances, are most worthy of regard and pursuit. Without deeply-impressed, readily-recurring, and distinct views upon this subject, how can we judiciously apportion our time; or how determine whether it has been disposed of to the best advantage! Whoever has not yet decided upon the objects most worthy of pursuit, ought to do so forthwith, if he desire to make a profitable and satisfactory disposal of his time, and avoid the unwelcome whisperings of conscience; for, without having made such a decision, he can make no progress towards these ends. And those of us who may have made a choice among the various objects of human pursuit, would do well frequently to review the results of our thoughts when engaged in making a selection, and modify them as increasing wisdom or altered circumstances may require. If these few remarks, which our limits forbid any enlargement of, do not satisfactorily demonstrate the importance of this fundamental choice, perhaps it might aid this demonstration to imagine in what a foolish, ruinous, and unsatisfying manner, a man would dispose of his money, who had no definite ideas of what objects would be most useful or necessary to obtain in exchange for it. Pause and reflect a little within yourselves, and we think you will perceive the truth of this, our first proposition, as clearly as if we had occupied a column or two in illustration of it. We trust many will convince themselves of this truth, as it appears to us a fundamental one.

2. In order to avoid mis-spending time and the consequences thereof, we must make daily, weekly, or other periodical reviews of our conduct. Wherein we have offended this day or this week, or wherein we have come short of duty, it must be our endeavor and resolve to do so no more.—We must, again, leave the expansion and application of this thought to the reflection of the reader, else we shall transcend the limits of a short article.

3. We must have such a deep and convincing impression of the importance of the objects we have decided upon as most worthy of pursuit, as shall give energy and earnestness to all our plans and proceedings. It will not aid us, to give a merely passive assent to the unquestionable worth of this or that object; we might as well have made no choice of aims. If we would improve in wisely disposing of our time, we must give to our choice the acquiescence of the whole soul. We must be devoted, be earnest, be energetic, else we have not yet even entered upon the path of improvement.

4. We must acquire the habit—not an easy one without surpassing devotedness of the whole soul—of making every hour, every employment, every society, contribute to the promotion of our purpose of spending our future time to the best—the very best advantage. Part of our time is spent in being alone or in private; part in general society, and part in the domestic circle. There is great room for improvement in the manner in which time is usually spent in the two latter of these divisions. In general society how trifling the conversation, how silly the amusements, how profit-less the chit-chat, how culpable the gossip and the scandal! To avoid being partakers in such consumption of time, we must, by premeditation and forecast, prepare and qualify ourselves to give to the social hours and intercourse, a more intellectual, interesting, and improving turn. Without some resolute exertion we can not rise above the deplorable customs of general society. Shall we not make it and receive a rich reward?

Similar remarks might be made in reference to the usual listless and profitless way in which the hours are spent in most families, and as to the necessity of our employing these more rationally. But, this and several other topics connected with the improvement of time, which now crowd upon us in unexpected abundance, we think it better to postpone for another short article, as we join Br. Grosh in his dislike to long ones. A. S.

LETTER TO A BROTHER.

Dear Brother:

It was with emotions of pleasure and delightful satisfaction, which I should utterly fail of describing, even were I to make the attempt, that I received your truly acceptable letter. Solomon with all his wisdom, never made a remark containing more truth, than when he said—"As cool waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country." Your letter contained "good news;" for it gave me the cheering information, that the fogs of superstition, bigotry, and prejudice, are being fast swept away from your mind, by the enlivening beams of the bright "Sun of Righeousness"—that another child of immortality is about entering into that "kingdom of heaven" which consists not in meat and drink, but in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

You say, "I have thrown away many of my former prejudices, and although I still have some doubts relative to the truth of Universalism. I am determined to examine faithfully the evidences in its favor, and use my best endeavors to ascertain what is truth." Brother, I rejoice exceedingly—yea, with "joy unspeakable and full of glory"—that the rays of light and truth divine, are already illuminating your mind and understanding; that you are determined no longer to be awed by bigotry, or swayed by prejudice, but have nobly resolved to shake off the galling chains of superstition, and walk forth from error's "prison house," free and unfettered. May the spirit of truth and wisdom unerring, guide you into the paths of piety and true holiness—may you embrace in its fulness, that truth which "maketh free indeed," and henceforth walk in wisdom's ways, which "are ways of pleasantness, and all" of whose "paths are peace." May you be successful in discovering that "pearl of great price," which when possessed, you would not barter for the wealth of the Indies; and experience in its fulness and excellency, that joy and consolation which the world can not give or take away. I rejoice to hail you as a brother in the "Abrahamic faith"—as a believer in the glorious, yea, transcendently glorious doctrine of the "Restitution of all things, which has been spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began;" and I pray God of his abundant goodness and grace, to fill you with all joy and rejoicing in the Holy Ghost, and enable you to experience in reality that "peace which passeth knowledge."

You mentioned the recent death by drowning, of two children from the family of Mr. R——; and then ask a very natural, as well as highly important question: "What," say you, "can enable those parents to bear up under the severity of their bereavement, if they honestly and sincerely believe, that those children are now wailing in unmitigated and unending wo; the companions and sport of demons and fiends?" I would to God, brother, that every believer in the doctrine of endless misery, would seriously ask themselves this question! Especially would I ask parents whether they expect to enjoy in their fulness the glories of the heavenly paradise, with the certain knowledge that their beloved children are doomed to wail eternally in hell! Let fanatics and bigoted pharisees say what they please—let them prate on about being "so swallowed up in the love of God," that they can look with composure upon the endless agony of their own offspring—it is my fervent and unceasing prayer, that when the time shall arrive, that beholds our destinies for eternity unalterably fixed, wherever my friends and kindred are placed, there may I also go. I ask not for heaven—I wish not for the joys of immortal felicity—if granted only upon the severe condition of acquiescing in an eternal separation from my family and friends! And I feel confident, brother, that I hazard nothing by the assertion, and that I shall speak in perfect unison with your own feelings, when I declare, that the certain knowledge of the endless misery of any portion of our race, would clothe the inhabitants of glory, in the sable habiliments of mourning, cause heaven's broad arches to resound with the voice of wailing and lamentation, and change the once verdant fields of paradise, into a desert and barren waste!

There is no doubt but that an individual may feel a certain degree of happiness, from the reflection that his own eternal bliss is secured; but it is cruel and bitter mockery to talk of complete and unalloyed felicity in heaven, while our parents, our kindred and friends, are separated from us by an impassible gulf. Even in this imperfect state, we can not look upon the sufferings of our friends without feelings of the deepest commiseration and sympathy; neither have we an enemy in the world, whom, were it in our power, we would not deliver from a state of misery and suffering. How much more acute, then, will these feelings be, when we have cast off these clogs of mortality, and become "like the angels of God, being the children of the resurrection!"

Brother, go zealously onward in your search after truth. Search diligently the sacred Scriptures, in which you will find much that is "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction and instruction in righteousness," and neglect not to seek wisdom from above, remembering the admonition of the apostle—"If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God; who giveth liberally to all men, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." And finally, may we, and a ransomed world, unite our voices with the angelic choir, and while age on age shall be wafted into eternity, shout in strains of ecstacy and triumph, "Worthy the Lamb; the Lord God ominpotent reigneth!" Amen and Amen. Luke.

PROVERBS XVII: 14.

"The beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water; therefore leave off contention before it be meddled with."

When the demon of discord has once entered into society, it would seem as though every individual immediately agrees to disagree, and all the flood-gates of mischief are at once set open. One person will say, "I have been most shamefully abused, and I will not be satisfied till my enemy asks my forgiveness; until he implores my pardon upon his knees." If you go to the other party, you will find their language like this: "What! I ask forgiveness? I who have been so much insulted? Not I. I was shamefully abused in the first place, or I should not have said what I did. It would be impossible for me to explain how much I have borne in silence, but I will bear it no longer; the world shall know it."

Then there are others who have nothing to do but to add fuel to the fire of contention, to gather all the information they can from one party to arouse the indignation of the other, or it may be, carry news both ways to gratify their propensity for tattling. But it should be recollected that "he that passeth by and meddleth with strife that belongeth not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears." The Psalmist says, "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity;" but this can not be done where one person assumes more authority than is believed to be his due, or where one wishes to drive others to do as he says against their wills. And it is with shame I confess that woman is sometimes the aggressor, in civil broils and neighborhood quarrels. O, tell it not in Gath, nor publish it in Askelon, that woman has done this! But the pages of history are open before us, where we learn that woman has not always been the angel of mercy to direct man to the portals of bliss. Let Cleopatra and Elizabeth answer this. But we need not go so far back to find those who possess the will, if not the power, to do as much mischief as they. I am rejoiced to say that there are not many of this class in the world. But let each one pause and consider, is it I? And if it is you, consider whether your neighbors have not a self to take care of as well as you? But perhaps you have combativeness, firmness, and self-esteem, without benevolence: if so, I warn you to beware how you expose these propensities, for they can not be esteemed by your associates; and recollect this, that though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished. Juliet.

CONFERENCE MEETINGS.

A few years ago, some wild and singular statements concerning Conference meetings, or concerts of praise, as they are variously termed, caused considerable controversy respecting their propriety and utility. I was among those who opposed them—not in themselves, but as they were then represented by their warmest friends. Since then, I have enjoyed a few opportunities of seeing and hearing for myself; and whatever those may have been that were the cause of the controversy, those I have seen were orderly, decorous and profitable, as well as deeply interesting—so much so, that I am persuaded they are not only worthy of being held at all our extraordinary meetings, as dedications, ordinations, Associations and Conventions, but that in all cases where it is practicable, they should be instituted as stated meetings by our societies. They are so instituted and held by many of our societies at the East, and are found to be not only interesting and profitable to believers in God's impartial, efficient grace, but also to those of other denominations who attend them. Several ministering brethren in whose judgment I place great confidence, assured me that they were among the most active and powerful causes of our rapid increase and prosperity in that region. One clerical brother in particular, the coolness of whose clear head is never overcome by the warmth of a most excellent heart, said that more of our opposers had been converted to the faith, and led to connect themselves with his society, through impressions received at the weekly conference meeting, than had been converted by his preaching.—And, I verily believe it, after having been present at one of his Conference meetings; and that too, without feeling the least degree of disparaging feeling for his superior talents as a preacher.

Such being my conviction of their importance and utility as a means for spiritual growth and improvement, I feel deeply anxious to see them introduced every where—not only at the meetings of our Associations and Conventions, as is now sometimes done, but statedly as society meetings. And this can be done, and well done, even without the aid of a preacher, if our lay brethren will only arouse themselves to the exercise of the talents which they undoubtedly do possess. At first, in all probability, they will feel somewhat embarrassed—for so does every preacher when he first begins to speak in public—but a little careful preparation, followed by a deliberate firmness in practice, will give composure—ease—and, at last, delightful fluency and warmth. For instance—let three, four or more brethren who feel the importance of instituting means for the growth in grace of our societies, meet together, arrange the regular plan of the exercises, divide to each one his portion thereof, engage a sufficient number to take part, and lead the congregation in singing, and then appoint the meeting. There can be no doubt of success—even should trifling failures occur a few times, even they will impart a determination to guard against them, and provide against their recurrence. Any man, by a little previous reflection and practice, can speak ten or fifteen minutes on a subject with which his own experience has made him acquainted—which is interesting to him. He can talk that long on any subject connected with his business and pursuits—why not on a subject like the love and goodness of God—the joys of religion—the importance and pleasures of social worship, or of human duty, and of the consolations of the Christian hope in every season, trial and affliction of earth?

The prayers to be offered, seem the most embarrassing part to laymen unaccustomed to express the feelings of their souls publicly, and vocally. Why it is so, I know not. But even here, where there are none that can be found willing to break through the diffidence that chains their thoughts and emotions in silence, this portion of the services can be performed for a time by the aid of Br. Rayner's excellent Manual. I say, for a time, for I doubt not that extempore prayers, full of the thoughts and feelings inspired by the occasion, will be preferred to any form, especially in such meetings, and that this preference will soon lead to the freedom of feeling necessary to the performance of such prayers.

The singing, in some cases, will be the point of difficulty. Let the hymns be such as are generally known without the book, and yet are contained in our hymn books, so that those who do not know the hymn by memory, may use the book in singing it. And the tunes should also be familiar. Perhaps those common airs, as "Bonnie Doon," "Auld Lang Syne," "Bonnie Boat," etc., now generally adopted in publications of sacred music, will be found most generally known and easily sung. To these Old Hundred, Mear, Lenox, and other well known sacred airs of olden time, may be added. At first, the promiscuous singing of a congregation—for it loses half its life and power unless performed by the entire assembly—will be irregular—the various modes of performing the same air may cause an occasional slight jar—but these will soon disappear, and the voices blend, unite, and keep time with each other in the musical expression of those common emotions of holy joy, peace, delight and rapture which pervade the hearts of the whole assembly.

If the number of persons who are to engage in addressing the audience is too small to fill out the time to be occupied beside that taken up in singing and prayer, the meeting may be closed, as well as commenced, by reading an appropriate chapter of the Bible, and commenting upon it. Indeed, the perusal of a chapter, with suitable comments, will suggest to the minds of those present, many appropriate subjects on which to address the audience, and thus, probably, induce some to speak who had not been calculated on so to do, and in this way prolong the exercises, and increase the joy and interest of the Conference. For, be it remembered, that however orderly the meeting may and should be, the less coldness, constraint and formality there is in its proceedings, the more easy, free and familiar it can be made, the greater will be the pleasure and interest arising from it, and the more powerful will be its influence on the affections of those present.

I might add more—much more of advice, direction, and argument in regard to such meetings, but it is unnecessary. Every reader, from what has already been said, must know what such meetings are, and can imagine their beneficial effects, and conceive modes of conducting them, and means for getting them up and rendering them most interesting and profitable in the course of heart-felt devotion and Christian improvement. It remains, therefore, for those who can thus appreciate the importance of these meetings, to start them, by securing the co-operation of brethren and sisters of a like faith and spirit. May they do thus, be successful in their efforts and blessed in their deed. A. B. G.

REPENTANCE, vs. JUST PUNISHMENT.

There is an opinion entertained in the world, that a sinner, however ignominious his conduct, however black his crimes, and however obnoxious to justice, if he repents and is sorry, is exonerated from the punishment which was justly due him for iniquity. Hence it is, that an individual who may have run the pirate's horrid and bloody career, and at last been taken and brought before the judge, if he says that he is sorry and repents between the time of his condemnation and the execution of the sentence, is straightway transformed into a saint, delivered from the toils of just punishment, and told that he will certainly reach heaven. I have long looked upon this doctrine as immoral in its tendency; for, if an individual can be made to believe, that by repenting a few days before he dies, he can escape all the consequences of his vices, it must, if he has imbibed habits of sin, lull him to sleep and continue him in the practice of iniquity. In this opinion I am confirmed by the following fact, extracted from the life of Frederic the Great of Prussia, vol. 1, p. 321, contained in Harper's Family Library.

"But the most dreadful part of Frederic's military system, was the extreme severity of discipline and of punishment to which, as has been already mentioned, the soldier was obliged to submit. This was carried to so great a length, and desertion was so difficult, that attempts at suicide among the soldiers, in order to rid themselves of their misery, were not unfrequent. Doctor Zimmerman relates, that an officer at Potsdam informed him, that during ten years, the number of cases of suicide committed in the little town of Potsdam was above three hundred. It also not unfrequently happened, that a soldier murdered a child, and then came and gave himself up to justice. This mode of getting rid of their lives was adopted by some of them instead of suicide, for this reason;—they thought that if they committed suicide, they should be subject to eternal punishment; whereas the murdered infant was sure to go to heaven, and they themselves had time to repent of their crime, and to make their peace with the Almighty."

Such was the effect upon them of the notion that mere repentance a short time before death, would clear them from just punishment. And I doubt not that it has had similar evil effects upon others. G. W. M.

SABBATH DAY REFLECTIONS.

Another day of rest, of intellectual feasting, of serious retrospection, of self-examination, and fervent, grateful prayer to Him whom I am permitted to call "Father," has appeared, bearing upon its sunny smiles tokens of peace and love to the pure in heart, and of reproof to those who have neglected the duties of the past. I am sensible that if I wish to enjoy its smiles, I must heed these tokens. They gather around me like the first morning sunbeams, discovering the bright and the beautiful, or showing me the dangers I have been saved from though I passed them unheeded. They pass to the inward eye, the moral vision, as the words of a gentle monitor come to the natural ear; some instructive—reminding me of the blessings which have been, and are still, mine, and displaying how much I owe to my Maker. Thoughts of the past dwell upon the memory, not like the fleeting shadows of a dream, but like the renovating power of truth, fresh and clear from the fountains of reality. Let me look at them fairly and seriously. What have I done to support and spread the Gospel of our blessed Redeemer? What to shake the foundation of superstition and bigotry, whose frenzy is spreading like wild-fire over the land? Have I taken that consistent, straight forward course of conduct, conformable with the requirements of Jesus, which will evince to the enemies of the truth, the practical utility of my faith, and confound them with the indubitable argument, that the doctrine of impartial goodness is not to be put down by clerical profanity, defamation and scandal, or obscene anecdotes? Have I maintained the triumphs of virtue amidst the sneers of the self-righteous? Have I comforted the afflicted, contributed what I could to relieve the needy, and forgiven my enemies? Have I prayed for those who despitefully use me and persecute me? If not, let this day remind me of the example of Him from whose resurrection it has taken its observance. He and his disciples were styled drunkards and wine bibbers by the proud and haughty—so are his followers of the present day. He was called an impostor and a deceiver—so are Universalists. He was accused of being leagued with devils—so are his disciples now, even by those who claim to be his imitators. Yet he reproved not in wrath; he murmured not at their revilings, but rendered good for evil, love for hatred, and blessings for cursings. Thus, O, God, enable me to "show my faith by my works," and govern my life in conformity with the Gospel of thy well beloved Son!

Surely, it is a blessed institution which allows us one day in seven for reflection and spiritual improvement. How many there are who profess to observe it strictly, but how few who enjoy its spiritual advantages! How then, should a Christian keep the Sabbath? Should he regard it as something to be worshipped—as a day which he is compelled to observe by rituals and pretended solemnities from motives of fear? Surely not. He who makes the Sabbath the most wearisome day in seven, does not know the value of it, nor does he keep it properly. He should reflect that it is a season of rest. Six days are allowed to man to attend to his secular concerns: During these his mind may be occupied in a measure by the cares of time. But there are other interests more deeply connected with his happiness. The mind wants time for undivided reflection. It must be separated from the anxiety consequent upon mingling in the changing scenes of earth. It must be permitted to soar from earth to heaven, and contemplate that rest which remaineth for the people of God. The Sabbath gives it this opportunity. It is, as it should be in the estimation of man, a day of rest. Let the mind, then, be divested of its care and agitation, and delight itself in the recollection of past mercies and promised blessings; of present duties and responsibilities; and let it bring up from the past the incense of a pure heart and a grateful spirit, and then the Sabbath will not be desecrated.

THE WASTE PLACES.

There are, at this time, a number of waste places in Zion in this region, which should be supplied, and speedily, with the preached word. If the members of the societies now destitute, could only be aroused to action—to united, judicious, zealous and persevering action in the cause of God's impartial grace, we might hope to see them supplied with pastors at no very distant date. It could not be done immediately; for all our preachers in this section are engaged—and those more distant, could not be procured easily and soon to leave their present locations, especially as the engagements of many of them will not allow it.—There are, however, many young men, who have commenced, or are waiting anxiously to commence, their labors in the vineyard of our Master, whose services might be engaged, and who with fostering care and kindness, would soon become workmen that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. But, alas! the scattered friends, the dormant and slumbering societies, make very little exertion to do their duty.—They do not offer sufficient encouragement to the young candidate for the ministry, to go into the warfare. Oh, why is this? Why is there so little energy and action among these believers in universal grace?

I would that I knew of some means by which to introduce a different order of feelings and affairs among many of our friends and societies in this portion of our State. I would that I could make them perceive, as clearly as I see and feel, the immense injury which their supineness, indifference and coldness are doing to the best of causes—how they are driving our preachers off to other regions to seek support and encouragement—how they paralyze the efforts of the faithful and zealous friends yet in our midst—how they would discourage many who would enter the ministry of reconciliation, and prevent them from entering—how they give occasion to the enemy to triumph and rejoice over our apparent decline, and to hope for our utter downfall—and how they drive the timid and fearful to stand aloof from our waning fortunes for fear of being involved in our disgraceful failure.

Reader—are you one of the believers in a waste place—a member or adherent of one of our dormant societies? If you are, I beseech you by every noble and dear motive, awake, arise, and endeavor to do something, however trifling may be your means and influence—begin doing something—and continue your efforts, until you secure the co-operation of your fellows, and bring them up in their strength to build up the waste places of our Zion! A. B. G.

OUR SECTION

Has lately lost, and is about to lose, four or five preachers—Br. McAdam by withdrawal, and Brs. M. B. Smith, T. J. Smith, and W. H. Griswold, by removal. Even before this loss there were some societies destitute of preaching that should have been supplied—of course, the destitution is now greater than ever. What is to be done? Some of our societies, it is believed, do not offer sufficient encouragement to retain the preachers they have—still less, to encourage others to come among them. And this perpetual changing of preachers, combined with the absurd economy of doing with as little amount of preaching in each place as possible, is ruining both societies and preachers, and giving to our cause in this region a retrograde motion. What can be done to remove these evils?

Our preachers, also, may be to blame. To lessen their hours of study, they scatter their preaching labors—and to eke out their scanty salary, so as to enable them to live decently and honestly, they devote a portion of the time that should be spent in visiting their people, to digging, or ploughing, or other pursuits. This may be well as exercise, but it is bad as regular employment.—The soldier of Christ should not be thus entangled with pursuits foreign to his profession. And the people pay dear for that service which is thus half performed for their half price—and the preacher instead of improving in his profession, is learning a new employment.—What can be done to remedy these evils? A. B. G.

THE VOICE TO THE MARRIED.

Our Editorial brethren must know, by this time, that we are disposed to be generous, in allowing them to copy freely from our columns, even what cost us considerable money to procure—as communications on special subjects, prize tales, prize essays, and prize poems. We have hitherto allowed them to copy freely such portions as they pleased of the Voice to Youth, Causes of Infidelity Removed, and Voice to the Married—and have no disposition yet wholly to forbid it—but, really, there are some who seem so pleased with the latter named work as to copy it entire, as fast as it appears in our columns. When we inform them that we pay a considerable sum (more than two dollars per column) for these articles, and depend wholly for our remuneration for this outlay, on their sale in the book-form, we think they will perceive the impropriety of thus unreservedly using our property, and will cease doing so in future. Any thing in the shape of ordinary communications—any thing, in short, that we do not intend publishing in book-form to remunerate ourselves for a great outlay in procuring it—even a moderate slice, often repeated, out of a series of labored articles that have cost us much money—our brethren are heartily welcome to, from time to time—let them "cut and come again," and we will never complain, or even feel a complaint—but we beg of them not to carry off every entire loaf, as soon as it comes out of our oven! Are we understood?

ESSAYS ON WAR.

"Better all the wealth on earth should be sunk, and every being destroyed than to have a single moral principle in God's universe violated."

The above extract from Br. Spear's Essays in the present paper, contains a sentiment which I do not understand, or disagree with. It is not often that I comment on the remarks of correspondents who may differ from me in opinion, because I prefer that readers should judge for themselves, rather than have any controversy—especially on minor or unimportant subjects. But the above sentiment seems to me so totally wrong, that I wish, in a friendly way to point out its error.

A single sin, however small, is a violation of a moral principle. Is it better that God should destroy all the beings he has made, than that one sin be committed?—But Br. Spear may say he meant the moral principle to be violated by man. Well, is it really better that a man should suffer all beings to be destroyed than to commit the least, most venial violation of a moral principle? Would not the permission of so great a destruction, which this man could have prevented, be really a greater evil than the purloining of an apple from a full orchard? I know that such a supposition is improbable, but the case in hand permits it, as the language is general and not limited to any particular case, and I therefore take the strongest case to see if I have rightly understood Br. Spear. A. B. G.

DEDICATION IN SCIPIO.

On June 12th, in the morning, the new meeting house lately erected in Scipio, Cayuga county, was dedicated to the worship of the only living and true God. Sermon by Br. H. Boughton, pastor of the society. Well did he remark in his excellent sermon, that he was proud of what the friends of the restitution had done in Scipio. They have come up to the work nobly. They have built a neat brick house, 33 by 46 feet, containing forty-eight slips. Cost, $2,900. They have sold of the stock, $3,000, and have five slips remaining. So that their house is, in fact, paid for, and the society will have no difficulty with debt. This is most excellent, and we wish that every society would do likewise. The society in Scipio, with a house of their own, and a worthy, talented young man to preach to them, have only to attend church regularly and practice their doctrine, in order to gain a good name and have many additions to their numbers.

A Conference was held at the time of the dedication. In the afternoon, Brs. Qneal and Montgomery preached; on Thursday morning, Br. N. Brown, and in the afternoon, Brs. Delong and Whitcomb. The congregations were large, intelligent and attentive. Every thing was done in peace and harmony. And we trust that seed were sown, which will produce abundant fruit.

BOOK BORROWERS.

Reader, are you one? If so, have you a book belonging to me, that I have not seen for a month or more? Please look over your books—search well—lay out all the borrowed books on hand that should be returned, and start around returning them to their proper owners—in which case I will get mine. I have done so to-day, and have not only returned what I borrowed, but miss many books I must have loaned out, and now want. A. B. G.

WINTER EVENINGS

Are near at hand, and next to good religious and literary periodicals, good books should be provided for reading in the family circle—class books for the Sunday school and the Bible class, where such means of improvement can be established, and reading books suited to the capacities, and calculated to interest as well as instruct every member of the family circle. We hope that Universalists in particular, will be careful to provide these pleasing means of mental and moral improvement, so far as in their power; for on their adoption and use depends greatly the advancement of our cause, and the destruction alike of superstition and skepticism, of ignorance and vice in the rising generation.

Universalist Society Libraries have been often recommended, but too seldom established. Now is a good time to enter on that work in our country societies. Earth has yielded abundantly of her stores to the farmers; will they not devote a small portion to the cultivation of their hearts and understandings—the fairest farms God has given them? Come, brethren and sisters, be grateful to God. A. B. G.

REMOVALS.

Br. L. L. Sadler, of Geneva, late itinerant in the "Far West," has received and accepted an invitation to settle in the city of Bangor, Me.—away "Down East." We are sorry to lose him, and hoped he would ramble from us no more.

Br. A. A. Folsom, Editor of the Gospel Witness, has agreed to remove from Hingham, and settle as pastor of the society in Cabotville, (town of Springfield,) Mass. The Gospel Witness is to be discontinued in consequence. A. B. G.

BR. E. M. WOOLLEY,

Of Lebanon, Madison county, in consequence of chronic sore throat, has been obliged to suspend preaching.—This is a sad calamity for him, for his whole soul was in the good work—and for the societies with which he labored, for he was an excellent pastor—and for our cause in this section, for Br. Woolley was one of our most zealous, judicious, and eloquent preachers, and is universally beloved as a man. May God soon restore him to health, if consistent with his goodness, and meanwhile give to our societies in Hamilton and Lebanon a pastor able to fill Br. W.'s place. A. B. G.

AN EARNEST CALL.

We want money. The present is a time when we can not borrow. Will not every honest, and just, and generous subscriber who is indebted to us, immediately pay us or the nearest agent at least a part of what is due us? Let him borrow the small sum, if he has it not, for we are in immediate want of it.

Every agent who has a remittable sum in his hands for us, will please forward it immediately. A dollar (as well as a friend) in need, is one indeed. ☞ Be careful to send such bank bills as are current in this State.

G. AND H.

Br. N. Brown is informed, that the money has been duly credited that was paid at the Convention and Associations. We are not in the habit of entering payments on our list of remittances, unless received by letter or specially requested.

☞ The names of all who are indebted for more than the present volume will be stricken from our list at the close of this year—unless we have some assurance of their responsibility—and their accounts put in an immediate train for collection.

POETRY.

LINGER NOT LONG.

BY A LADY.

Linger not long!—Home is not home without thee
Its dearest tokens only make me mourn;
Oh! let its memory, like a chain about thee,
Gently compel and hasten thy return.
Linger not long.

Linger not long!—Though crowds should woo thy staying,
Bethink thee—can the mirth of friends, though dear,
Compensate for the grief thy long delaying
Costs the poor heart that sighs to have thee here?—
Linger not long.

Linger not long!—How shall I watch thy coming,
As evening's shadows stretch o'er moor and fell,
When the wild bee hath ceas'd her weary humming,
And silence hangs on all things like a spell.—
Linger not long.

How shall I watch for thee when fear grows stronger,
As night grows dark and darker on the hill—
How shall I weep, when I can watch no longer—
Ah! art thou absent—art thou absent still?—
Linger not long.

Yet I should grieve not though the eye that seeth me
Gazeth through tears that make its splendor dull;
For oh! I sometimes fear, when thou art with me,
My cup of happiness is all too full!—
Linger not long.

Haste—haste thee home unto the mountain dwelling!
Haste as a bird unto its peaceful nest!
Haste as a skiff, when tempests wild are swelling,
Flies to the haven of secured rest!
Linger not long.

SEA WEEDS.

We have floated o'er the billow,
The billows wild and free;
The ocean-foam our birth place was,
Our home the dashing sea.
We've wandered over many a league,
Seen many a foreign shore,
And danced in madness to the tune
Of ocean's wildest roar.

We've watched the glittering sunbeams
Light up the deep sea caves;
We've seen the precious jewels
That lie beneath the waves;
We've met the little Nautilus,
As she floated from afar,
And wreathed our fairy branches round
To deck her pearly car.

And we can tell what glorious things
Lie hidden in the sands,
That girdle round the sea-beat coast
Of many distant lands.
And we have heard the music deep,
The airy, thrilling spell,
That's breath'd from out the rosy lips
Of the deep Indian shell.

We teach the wide world's wanderers,
As fearlessly we glide,
To trust, where'er the wind may blow,
Or whither drifts the tide;
That they, like us, may still be tost
Upon the sparkling foam,
Yet feel the wave of time at last
Will bear them to their home.

[From the Lady's Book.]

AN ENIGMA.

I am an invisible, irresistible, unreasonable, thing.—Though nobody can see me, every body feels my power. I have done some good in my day, and a plenty of mischief. I believe there is not a son, or a daughter of Adam, to whom I have not been a trouble and a comfort. I am a source of perpetual delight to children, and of annoyance to their mammas. Sometimes I believe they wish me in the bottom of the ocean—though if I should go there, they would be the first to fish me up again. They get out of patience with me twenty times a day, but they like me, for all that.

I take the little child by the hand, and lead him through the green woods and over the hills and plains, in search of earth's beautiful things. Then I bring him to the crowded city, and bid him gaze at its many wonders.—When he is grown up, I send him out on the wide ocean, bid him explore distant lands, and visit every kindred and nation under the whole heaven.

His parents entreat him not to go, but my voice is more powerful than theirs—I say "go!" and he goes.

Now I suppose you think it is very wrong in me to interfere with the young man's filial duty, and disturb the sweet spells of home—but it's my nature.

When I get the youth off into foreign lands, I run him into all sorts of fool-hardy adventures and awkward predicaments. I'm excellent at getting people into difficulty, but I never help them out; that's not my vocation.

If the young man happens to be well read in the classics, if his imagination has been warmed with the history and the poetry of the olden times, then I have him completely in my power—he is my willing captive. There is nothing which at my bidding he will not do and dare, to obtain a sight of the relics of antiquity, and the places made famous in the glorious days of old. Ha! how I drive him about! He must encounter perils by sea, and perils by land—he must be choked by the sands of the desert, and suffocated by the simoom, and scorched by the tropical sun, and devoured by wild beasts, and robbed by wilder men; must starve, freeze, and encounter all manner of privations, only because I say so!

My favorite station is near the fountain of knowledge. Here I stand and call to every passer-by, to stop and taste the waters. If they approach near enough, I lay my soft, powerful hand upon them, and draw them, unresisting, to the well. Whoever tastes these waters, is sure to thirst again. The fountain is exhaustless, and the thirst which I create is equally so; none who once come, ever go away. So, as you may well suppose, I have by this time collected a vast multitude round it.—There is one thing rather singular about this water; the first draught intoxicates—but "drink deep," and you will be quite sobered.

I am the constant companion and counsellor of men of science, ever urging them forward in the path of discovery. Sir Humphrey Davy, was one of my especial favorites. But I worked him rather too hard, poor fellow! Once, when I was driving him through one of nature's hidden paths, a path never trodden by human foot before, he sunk down exhausted. I thought at first I had killed him; but he revived after a while, and I drove him on as fast as ever. The world may thank me for the treasures which he brought to light.

The great Herschel was another of my particular friends. Many a long night, have I held his telescope for him, while he counted the stars. I was never tired, but he was sometimes; and then he would shut his weary eyes, and say he could look no longer; but I kept teasing him to try again. Aye, the "milky-way" would have been nothing but a "milk-way" to this hour, if I had not urged him on. I told him one night, after he had watched the planets a good while, that he had better look into that bright path in the heavens, and see what he could make of it. He looked a long time, but said he could see nothing new. "It may be," said he, "that its brightness is owing to a multitude of clustering stars, but if so, my glass refuses to show them."

"Then make one that will," said I. He fell to work; and I promise you I didn't let him have much rest, till he had constructed a glass of prodigious power. O, with what ecstacy he took his first look through it!—What wonders burst upon him! Myriads of worlds, which no human eye had ever seen, now rolled before him. The "milky-way" was paved with suns!

I suppose you will say it was malicious, but in the midst of his ecstacy, I stooped down and whispered in his ear, "Ah! if you could only see a little farther!"—I should have tormented him with the same suggestion if he had constructed a glass of ten times the power.—I suppose it's cruel—but that's my way.

I am found in the parlor, the kitchen, and nursery.—I tell the little boy to break his drum, and see what makes the noise. I bid the servant put her ear to the key-hole of the parlor door, while I set the lady to "watch her neighbor over the way."

The museums, picture galleries, caravans, theatres, processions, and all sorts of public shows, depend on me for success. When Lafayette entered the city, not a soul would have stirred to meet him, if I had not urged it.

When our red brethren paid our city a visit, the inhabitants turned out "en masse" to witness their war-dance. It was I who sent them.

In short, I am always moving among high and low, in great matters and in small. They sometimes call me idle; but I am sure nobody is more busy. Sometimes I am called impertinent—this too I take to be a slander, for it is my vocation to pry into other people's affairs.

If, after this long description, you are in doubt as to my name, you will find it written in legible characters, on your own bright face. S. J.

DEATHS.

In Salina, October 7th, Mr. JAMES CLARK, aged 73 years. Mr. Clark was a Universalist in life, and there was no good reason for denying that he remained one to his dying hour. It appears, however, that some of his Partialist brethren have hinted that he entertained some fear as to a reliance on the impartial grace of God in sustaining him in the hour of death. But it appears from other testimony, from a more liberal source, that his faith did sustain him even "unto death," and that no renunciation took place. This is the testimony of other relatives. His funeral was attended on the 8th ult., at the Methodist meeting house. Prayer by the writer. Sermon by Elder Blair, (Baptist) of Syracuse.—The Elder's discourse, we consider was ill adapted to comfort the mourners' hearts. It was uncharitable, and contained not a few misrepresentations of Universalism.—We sincerely pitied the mourners, and felt shocked at the ignorance and harshness which characterized the whole sermon. We believe that the wounds of affliction were probed afresh, and instead of the oil and the wine of consolation being poured into the lacerated bosoms of the sorrowing mourners, the "wormwood and gall" were administered! May the consolations of the Gospel in its fulness be administered to those that have been called to mourn at this afflictive dispensation of divine Providence. N. BROWN.

In Mottsville, N. Y., August 6th, of consumption, Miss HARRIET TOWILAGER, daughter of Mr. Everts Towilager, aged nearly 16 years. Miss T. was an amiable young lady. It is believed that she died in the cheering faith of the "restitution." It was her dying request that a preacher of the Gospel in its fulness should attend her funeral. Her funeral was attended on the 7th, at the Universalist meeting house in Mottsville, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the relatives and a numerous concourse of sympathising friends, by the writer. N. BROWN.

In Antwerp, August 5th, of consumption, Mrs. MARGARET, wife of Mr. Orsamus Smith, aged 32 years, leaving an afflicted husband and 3 small children to feel and lament their loss. Her funeral was attended on the 7th, and the unfailing goodness of God declared to the mourning. A. WOOD.

In Waddington, St. Lawrence county, September 16th, of dropsy on the heart, Mrs. CYNTHIA, wife of James Culberson, and daughter of Thomas and Martha Wicks, of Antwerp. An afflicted husband is left to mourn his early loss of an amiable companion. A. W.

In Rossie, St. Lawrence county, September 22d, of a cancer in the eye, THADDEUS D. PARK, aged 47 years.—Brother Park endured his protracted and painful illness with unexampled patience, supported by faith in God as the Saviour of all men. The writer attended his funeral on the 24th, and endeavored to communicate consoling instructions to the afflicted widow, three orphan daughters, and other relatives and sympathising attendants. A. DIVINE PRESCIENCE.

BY D. F. YOUNG.

A vast diversity of opinions seems to obtain in the religious world, in relation to that attribute of God which enables him to view with precision every event, past, present and to come. Nor is this assertion invalidated by the circumstance, that all agree in ascribing to him infinite wisdom and understanding; for though cordially uniting on this point, few agree in regard to the consequences which may be traced to this admission, or the conclusions to which a consideration of the omniscience of God would most naturally lead.—This question seems to embrace the grand point in dispute; for while some cherish the opinion that God knew from all eternity the ultimate destiny of every creature upon whom he should bestow an existence, and that the respective numbers of the saved and lost were so definite and certain that they could "neither be increased nor diminished;" others entertain the supposition that though God foreknows all things, and knew "the end from the beginning"—that though he knew from before the foundation of the world, that a certain portion of his offspring would be endlessly miserable, yet he knew at the same time they might, by the right use of the "agency" he gave them, avoid that unhappy destiny, and secure to themselves an eternity of bliss.

Now the difference of the two systems is obvious, and though we believe them both untenable, we are disposed to yield the preference to the latter, as it appears less repugnant to the principles of reason and justice, and less revolting to the better feelings of the heart, and the higher and holier aspirations of the soul, and since it pretends to suspend the hopes of salvation upon the observance of certain specified conditions, and the peculiarities of certain rites and ceremonies; whereas the former hangs like a blighting incubus upon the hopes and desires of an unhappy portion of God's creatures. It tells them, that though they were Pauls in morality, angels in purity, and saints in piety, yet the black signet of endless perdition was enstamped upon their foreheads, and the portals of heaven were forever barred against their admission to the joys of its courts; while another portion has the unqualified assurance that though Neros in vice and debauchery—Caligulas in cruelty and revenge, and demons in malignity and rage, yet the messengers of high Heaven were hovering around them, and anxiously waiting till the icy hand of death should sever the tender chords of existence, and waft their spirits home to God, to sing the sweet anthems of his praise in the realms of bliss forevermore!

But whether these views of the destiny of man, and the character they necessarily ascribe to the great Author of his being, be consonant to the dictates of truth and reason, it will be the object of this article to inquire. We conceive that such representations not only rob God of his power, wisdom, and goodness, but invest him is a character of tyranny, cruelty and revenge, and, in the one case, reduce the operations of his omniscience into the more fanciful creations of the imagination. We believe there is design in every exercise of the Divine attributes; and as design and foreknowledge must most perfectly agree, so we think it will be accomplished—since it is certain that nothing would be designed which it was foreknown would not take place; and if there is design in every act of Deity, and he is immutable and omnipotent, whatever is foreknown will come to pass—nor can an event be foreknown when there is a possibility of its not taking place.

To deny the position that God never acts without a purpose, is to argue that man acts entirely independent of his Creator; it makes him the passive creature of circumstances and the sport of lawless chance; it impeaches the wisdom and power of God, charges him with having introduced upon the stormy sea of life, a multitude of intelligent beings without a compass to point out the way, or a helm to guide them over its fearful surges to the haven of security and repose! Can we believe him infinitely wise and powerful? Can we believe him the great Originator of all things, and view the nice adaptation of means to ends in the physical world, and yet believe he created a universe of intelligences without having in view a certain object, or designing them to perform a certain part in the vast and inconceivable plans of his government? Does he, from the throne of his glory, survey all things, past, present, and to come, and would he not interpose his almighty arm to arrest the wild disorder and confusion that obtains in the moral world, had he not foreseen and provided for it from the beginning, and did it not constitute one link in the vast chain of events so ordered and arranged from all eternity, as best to accomplish his mighty and incomprehensible scheme?

Should it be objected that this makes God the author of evil, it is answered, that though he may be the author of what we, in a limited sense, term evil, yet could we see the connection, bearing and relation, of each individual dispensation of divine Providence, we think, that even what we at present term moral evil, would not be urged as an objection against the wisdom and goodness of him who permits its existence. We are not without respectable orthodox company in this opinion.—Bishop Butler, in his Analogy, has the following pertinent remarks: "Upon the supposition that God exercises a moral government over the world, analogy does most strongly lead us to conclude that this moral government must be a scheme of constitution beyond our comprehension. And a thousand particular analogies shew us that parts of such a scheme, from the relation to other parts may conduce to accomplish ends which we should have thought they had no tendency to accomplish; nay, ends which, before experience, we would have thought such parts contradictory to. ——Could we comprehend the whole, we should find the permission of the disorders objected against, to be consistent with justice and goodness, and even to be instances of them."

That the abstract contemplation of a single action or event in the providence of God, may, indeed, lead us to regard it as evil, I am not disposed to deny; but the limited nature of these faculties that necessarily constitute the medium of our apprehension, which renders it impossible to perceive the connection and relation it has to other actions and events, and the varied effects of which it may be the cause, is a sufficient reason why we should not presume to pronounce any event incompatible with the attributes of God. But should it still be regarded as improbable and unreasonable that God should be the author of what even we, in a limited sense, term evil, a moment's attention will show that we are not destitute of Scripture proof in relation to the position.

Few that have read the interesting history of Joseph and his brethren, need be told of the wickedness displayed by the latter in the hatred they cherished towards their innocent brother; and who, abstractly considering their eagerness to imbrue their hands in his blood, will hesitate to pronounce them guilty of the most henious crime? And yet it is said by Joseph himself, that though they thought to do evil against him, "God meant (i. e., designed, not 'overruled') it unto good."

Again; God in the plenitude of his wisdom, foreknew and provided for the necessity of that event, which, with unerring precision, he saw would, in process of time, cost the life of his only begotten Son; and, accordingly, we find the prophets of the Most High, foretelling with infallible certainty the death and suffering of a world's Saviour. Nor was he himself silent on the subject, for he presignified to his disciples at Galilee, that he "must suffer many things—be betrayed into the hands of wicked men, and that they 'should kill him." Now it will not be denied that the circumstances which were thus foretold, were foreknown and designed to be accomplished; for had it not been decreed in the councils of Heaven that these things should come to pass, with what degree of confidence could Christ and the prophets foretell them?—and what degree of credence was to be attached to their prophecies, since the probability of their fulfilment and non-fulfilment would have been equally strong? If, then, it was decreed or designed that Christ should be "persecuted," "mocked" and "slain," as it was foretold he should, we ask, how all this could have been done, or what credit must have been attached to the prophetic writings, had there been none to "persecute," none to "mock," and none to "kill" him? And yet what crime in the dark catalogue of human transgressions, in point of magnitude, is to be compared to the crucifixion of our Lord and Saviour by the hands of a wicked and idolatrous nation! But when the whole is contemplated—when the relation, bearing, and object, is discovered, the great and benevolent plan of the redemption of a degraded world from the bondage of sin and error, stands out in bold relief, and the momentary feelings of horror inspired by an abstract contemplation of the means, are resolved into admiration of the Being who gave his only begotten Son a sacrifice for all mankind.

We introduce these circumstances to show that God may be the holy and innocent cause of what we, in a limited sense, term moral evil, and to show the folly of attributing absolute evil to any event of his providence—since what we regard as the most flagrant crimes, may be—nay, have been, productive of the greatest possible good.

The disposition of individuals to deny that God acts with design in every dispensation of his Divine economy, seems to spring from the unavoidable conclusion which must thence follow—that if any of his creatures are finally and irrevocably lost, he must have designed them for that purpose; for should it be granted, there is no other alternative save the absurd hypothesis that man is capable of thwarting these designs; and though we do not blame them for maintaining the most profound silence in regard to the subject, we do blame them for cherishing sentiments which involve such glaring absurdities—investing God in the character of a tyrant, or circumscribing the extent of power, wisdom and goodness, in attributing to him the creation of a universe of intelligent creatures without even the shadow of design or purpose, but under a full sense that to a portion, existence would prove an eternal curse—possessing the power but unwilling to save them from their unhappy fate.

But, we think, the position that God never acts without design, can not be successfully controverted or reasonably denied; and if it be granted, we say it is absolutely necessary to advocate the above absurdities, to sustain the doctrine of future endless misery; for we can not see the propriety of supposing that God did not design what he knows will come to pass. But if it be still contended that every event which transpires was not designed by the Creator, we think it will be found, on a little reflection, that this circumstance makes very little difference so far as the certainty of their transpiring is concerned, and that it does not invalidate the force of the argument which would thence follow against his wisdom and goodness, were the doctrine of endless wo true. If it be a truth that God knows all things which ever have and ever will transpire—if it be a truth that "known unto him are all his works from the beginning of the world"—it follows, that when the mighty energies of Omnipotence were about to call into being, from its primeval state of chaotic derangement, the earth upon which we live, before the vital current of life had begun to flow through the arteries of the human frame, and while yet darkness reigned upon the face of the deep, God, by the infinity of his wisdom, knew the final and immortal destiny of every intelligent being, who should ever be permitted to range the vast surface of the globe, which his wisdom and benevolence directed him to call from nonentity into existence.

And now let us inquire how and why this was foreknown. Is it a fiction of the imagination, to be realized or not according to the will of the creature—making it altogether a thing of chance? We think this will not be affirmed; for to say that man was created for happiness or misery, according to the use made of the faculties given him by his Creator, and to make him act wholly independent of God, is saying in effect, that though his destiny was written in flaming letters upon the tablet of the Eternal Mind, yet puny and finite as he is, he is capable of thwarting the purposes, and defeating the plans of Infinity, and so, as before remarked, it resolves the operations of Omniscience into the fanciful illusions of imagination. But if an event is foreknown, why is it so? We answer, because it is something which actually exists in the mind of infinite Wisdom, and which must in process of time actually transpire, and can only be foreknown when it is known that it will transpire; for to suppose otherwise, is, as we have seen, to make it the mere unrealized creation of fancy. Reader, if God knew from all eternity that you would, at some period in your life, peruse this article—if it was foreknown that you would at this moment encounter this argument—it was a circumstance which must absolutely transpire, else adieu to the omniscience of Deity forever! For had it not taken place, he would have known something which never had, or would have existence, but in imagination—which is not foreknowledge.

The argument commonly made use of by objectors in relation to this point, seems to be, that though God absolutely foreknows whatever comes to pass, yet his foreknowledge does not influence the actions of men; for though he knows that certain actions will be accomplished by certain individuals, he at the same time knows they have the power, and might do different if they felt disposed. Whatever bearing this objection may be supposed to have against the views we have taken of this subject, we think a little attention will serve to convince us that it is more specious than conclusive. It has been seen that foreknowledge of an event can only be certain, when it is known that it will take place; and hence we conclude, if design accompanies every act of God, that all which is foreknown must have been designed, since it is the only principle upon which future events can be known with certainty. But to affirm that they still might not transpire, pre-supposes the possibility that they will not, and we would ask, whether upon this principle, infinite Wisdom itself, could be absolutely certain of their taking place? We think not, for though the chances of their taking place as God knows they will, were as a million to one, there would still be a possibility of their failing, and in that case, where would be his omniscience? But the objection bears upon its very front a palpable contradiction, since it is no less than declaring, that a circumstance absolutely would transpire, which which possibly might not; or that a man might know a thing to be true, when he knew there was a possibility of its being false. The very reason that leads God to know that an event will transpire, must likewise lead him to know that it is impossible for it not to transpire, and it is absurd to say that he knows the same event both will, and will not, transpire. He must know either one or the other, if he be omniscient; and it is very plain to me that he can not absolutely know, so long as there is a possibility only that it may or may not take place. Foreknowledge, as defined by Dr. Webster, is, "a knowledge of things before they happen." Now, since a thing can not be a thing before it exists, it follows that there can be no foreknowledge of any event or action unless it actually does exist in the Eternal Mind, and is so linked in the vast chain of his moral government that the flight of time will most assuredly bring it about; but to affirm that an event may transpire different from what God knows it will, is making it a mere imaginary picture—depending upon the will of the creature for its realization, and consequently reduces the foreknowledge of God into mere guesswork.

We know it has been urged as an objection against the theory we have advanced, that it does not recognize the "free moral agency" of man, and consequently, denies his culpability; but we know likewise that it is the want of attention, alone, which induces any individual to be satisfied with such captious frivolity. The least reflection would satisfy him that it was not at all necessary to deprive man of his liberty of will, that the will and design of God might be accomplished. Man never acts till influenced by certain objects or motives, and God, being infinitely wise and powerful, can easily so arrange the eternal objects and circumstances with which man is connected, as to excite in him a certain volition, which volition shall lead to those very actions his Divine prescience told him would transpire. And to assert, that upon this principle man is a mere "machine," and acts from necessity, is no less than saying that that man is absolutely necessitated to murder, who is influenced to do so by the reward offered him to commit the flagrant crime. Does not the master secure the labor of the servant, without compulsion, by observing the condition of the stipulation between them? Does not the client secure the services of his counsel by placing motives before him which will induce him to undertake, without being compelled, a defence of his case? Does not the orator persuade the multitude into his own peculiar views, by setting truth before them in its native majesty, without their being absolutely compelled to believe? In fine, does not the happiness and well being of society, in a great measure, depend upon the influence one individual has over another? We think this will not be denied. Yet the very principle we are contending for, is here acted upon, while the doctrine of "necessity" is discarded; and we can not see the consistency of denying that God may, in the same manner, so operate upon moral agents, as to bring about the very events he designed should be accomplished, without making them mere "machines."

If it can be understood why the brethren of Joseph were punished for the evil they thought to do unto him, when God himself designed the accomplishment of good, Gen. xlii: 21; l: 20—if it can be understood why God sent numerous plagues upon the land of Egypt, and engulfed Pharaoh and his host in the Red sea, when he himself had hardened his heart not to permit the children of Israel to depart, Ex. iv: 21; x: 20; xi: 10—we think there will be little difficulty to perceive the justice of punishment, even if the doctrine we have contended for in this article be true; that God acts not without design—that he will accomplish his pleasure, bring to pass what he hath spoken, and do what he hath purposed. Isa. xlvi: 10, 11; lv: 10, 11. It is only necessary to discard the dark theory of endless misery, and the most perfect harmony becomes obvious in the Divine attributes. The absurd hypothesis that God acts without a purpose, or that his purpose may be thwarted, need not be advocated; for though he permits the existence of what we term evil, we have seen it overruled, and productive of the greatest good, while an infinite and eternal evil can never be—no, never.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

PROVERBS.—These proverbs were composed by Solomon, and are selected or compiled from his works. Solomon is said to have composed no less than 3000 proverbs.—See 1 Kings iv: 32. The book of Proverbs is a selection from these by Hezekiah, (see chap. xxv,) and Agur, Isaiah and Ezra, probably, assisted.

Proverbs xxvi: 4, 5—Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou also be like unto him.

Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit.

This seems like a contradiction, yet we can state cases where both these proverbs would apply. If I were in conversation with a foolish man, and was to talk gravely with him, he might imagine himself wise; but if I was to converse with him in his own foolish language, when there were a number of spectators around, they would consider me as great a fool as him.

Some critics, however, are of the opinion that the 5th verse should have been rendered, Answer not a fool according to his folly, etc.

ECCLESIASTES.—This book is evidently the composition of Solomon, and must have been written at the close of his life. It is the result of his own observation and experience. It shows that Solomon had a thorough knowledge of human nature, and also that human nature then, was the same that it is now. The object of the work is to shew the vanity of the ordinary pursuits of mankind, and in what the true enjoyment of life consists. It abounds with wisdom and profitable instruction. And it ought to be carefully, attentively, and frequently read by all classes of people, especially the young of both sexes.

Eccles. xi: 3—And if the tree fall toward the South or toward the North, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be.

This passage is very frequently misquoted by Limitarians, and a use made of it by them which is altogether unwarrantable. The manner in which it is commonly quoted, is as follows—"As a tree falls, so it must lie. And as death leaves us, so judgment will find us." The last clause of this pretended quotation, is a complete forgery; there being nothing in the Bible on which to found it. The first clause is a misquotation of the passage under consideration. By examining this passage with its connexion, we shall find that Solomon had not the most distant allusion to death or any of its consequences. His meaning is, that, As the rain when fallen, can not be gathered up again, and when a tree falls it is not easily removed, so when a thing is once done, it can not be undone.

THE SONG OF SOLOMON, OR CANTICLES.—This book was written by Solomon, on occasion of his marriage with the daughter of the king of Egypt. It is the most difficult, but happily the least important of all the books in the Jewish canon.—There is nothing relating to religion in it; and all the attempts that have been made to give it a spiritual meaning, have only served to throw ridicule on those who have attempted it. There is nothing to recommend it to a place in the canon, but its being the work of Solomon.

PARTIALIST VIGILANCE.

It is truly astonishing to behold the multiplicity of plans that are put into operation, by Partialist parents, to prevent their children from "searching the Scriptures, to see whether these things are so." While their children are of an age which subjects them to the parental control, the strictest watch is kept upon all their actions. During the Sabbath they are not permitted to go beyond the father's sight; all healthful exercise is strictly and decidedly prohibited, and no reading allowed, excepting the Bible, "Pilgrim's Progress," and the "Assembly's Catechism."

But when the child has arrived at that period in life when it begins to manifest a disposition to think, read and believe for itself, the parent adopts a new system, and in place of stern authority and strict commands, which have failed to bring the result he so ardently desired, he commences a system of coercion. In fact, he will adopt almost any course—he will experiment upon almost any measures, if by any means he can induce his child to adopt his creed, and advocate his religion.

I have at this moment, in my mind's eye, a case in point. A young man of my acquaintance, was the son of one who, "after the straitest sect of our religion, lived a" Calvinist. When that period in life had arrived, which brought the young man from the quietude of the parental mansion, and made him an actor in the busy and bustling scenes of life, every means were tried, every argument used, and every art practised, to induce him to declare himself in favor of the popular religion. As a last resource, when all other means had failed of producing the desired effect, worldly policy was put in requisition. He was told that it was a disgrace for a young man to be a Universalist, and that if he declared himself one, he would not be respected by community, nor succeed in business. But the son had obtained a taste of the waters of life and salvation—he had begun to feast upon "the bread of God which came down from heaven, and giveth life to the world"—he had embraced that truth which maketh "free indeed"—and all the inducements that worldly policy and worldly honors could place before him, were insufficient to cause him to play the hypocrite and "deny his faith." He nobly determined to be true to his conscience and his God, let the consequences be what they might. He determined to advocate, boldly and fearlessly, that system of religion which he believed originated with the Author of his existence, and which has "been spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began"—even though it cost him the sacrifice of every worldly blessing, and deprived him of the home and the friends of his youth.

Would that every young man thus situated, could be induced to choose the same "good part," and enjoy the approbation of his conscience, and the gracious smiles of approving Heaven.

UNIVERSALIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY

PROCEEDINGS OF SESSION FOR 1839.

The Universalist Historical Society met, according to adjournment, in Portland, Me., on Thursday morning, September 19th, 1839, the President in the Chair.

On motion, the Secretary read the minutes of the proceedings of the last year, which were approved.

Voted, To proceed to the election of officers for the ensuing year; whereupon the Rev. THOMAS WHITTEMORE, late President, begged leave to decline a re-election.

The following persons were duly elected.

Rev. STEPHEN R. SMITH, President.
Rev. HOSEA BALLOU, 2d, Vice President.
Rev. THOMAS J. SAWYER, Secretary.
LEWIS SEYMOUR, Esq., Treasurer.

Corresponding Secretaries.—Revs. Charles C. Burr, Maine; Lucius R. Page, Mass.; W. S. Balch, Rhode Island; F. Hitchcock, Conn.; M. Ballou, New-Hampshire; W. Skinner, Vermont; G. W. Montgomery, W. Whittaker, New-York; J. H. Gihon, New-Jersey; S. W. Fuller, T. S. Bartholomew, Pennsylvania; I. D. Williamson, Maryland; E. H. Chapin, Virginia; Dr. G. C. Marchant, North Carolina; Rev. Allen Fuller, South Carolina; Allen Green, Esq., Georgia; Rev. W. Atkins, Alabama; Wm. E. Camp, Esq., Louisiana; Revs. John E. Holmes, Illinois; Jonathan Kidwell, Indiana; John A. Gurley, Ohio; Nathaniel Stacy, Mich.; Joseph Ward, Lower Canada; Oliver Smith, New Brunswick; Amos Seamans, Nova Scotia; Revs. David Thom, J. R. Beard, England; Wm. Scott, Esq., Scotland.

On motion, the Secretary was called upon, and read the following

ANNUAL REPORT.

Another year has passed, and the Secretary avails himself of this opportunity for laying before the Universalist Historical Society, a statement of its present condition and prospects. He has yet to lament that no more of the Society's members, and even of its Corresponding Secretaries exhibit any considerable interest in its affairs and prosperity; but still he acknowledges with gratitude the zeal with which some have engaged in the furtherance of its objects, and the increasing attention which is manifested in its prosperity. Some considerable progress, he is happy to say, has been made since the last session, and the prospect before us is gradually becoming more and more cheering.

Of the condition of the cause of Universalism in this country, nothing need be here said. To the Universalist Register for 1840, which has been prepared with great care, and is worthy the attention of every Universalist, the Secretary refers for all the information which it is in his power to furnish. From this it appears that there are now about eight hundred societies of Universalists in the United States, and fifteen in the neighboring British Provinces. We have above four hundred and fifty preachers, and own, wholly or in part, about the same number of meeting houses. There are in the U. S. one United States Convention, twelve State Conventions, and fifty-five Associations. There are seventeen periodicals in the country, devoted to the interests and promulgation of our common faith. Of these, the greater part are published weekly, and at a moderate estimate, it is believed that more than twenty thousand copies of these alone, are circulated. The others published semi-monthly, monthly, and one, once in two months, enjoy a respectable support, and exert a wide spread influence.

During the past year, there has been a very considerable increase, in the number both of preachers and societies; but we are called upon to deplore the loss by death, of several very valuable brethren in the ministry, among whom may be mentioned the Rev. Solomon Bingham, of Noyan, Lower Canada, Corresponding Secretary of this Society, for that Province; Rev. N. Wadsworth, Editor of the Berean, published at Louisville, Ky.; Rev. I. Hayward, Burlington Flats, N. Y.; Rev. H. Chafee, Stratford, Ct., Revs. S. A. Sneathen, Brunswick, and Joseph P. Harris, New Portland, Me.; and more recently, the Rev. Thomas F. King, of Charlestown, Mass. But while we lament the bereavement which our Zion has suffered in the loss of these laborers in the vineyard of our Lord, it is a matter that calls for our gratitude, that they were enabled to die in the faith, and have left so good a testimony behind them.

Our foreign correspondence has been kept up during the past year, though it has added little to the amount of information previously communicated. The cause of Universal Salvation in England, is more prosperous at the present time than at any former period. The zeal talents and perseverance of our valued Corresponding Secretary, the Rev. David Thom, of Liverpool, are giving an impulse to the good work, which is felt throughout the United Kingdom, while the recent conversion of the well known Mrs Sherwood to the faith, can not but be regarded as a favorable omen of future prosperity and success there. A society has been established during the past year in Edinburg, under the charge of a clergyman formerly of the Baptist denomination; and rumor speaks of one established or in porgress in London, under the care of a converted Methodist minister.

Since the last session, Rev. Mr Balch, of Providence, has prepared, and published in one of our periodicals several articles relating to the early history of Universalism in New-England; confining his observations thus far chiefly to that early minister of the reconciliation, Caleb Rich. And I am happy in being able to say that the author intends to devote still further attention to similar objects. If our clergymen generally could be persuaded to spend some of their leisure hours in prosecuting inquiries relating to the past history of our faith and its advocates, and if those now somewhat advanced in life would favor us with notices of their labors, difficulties and success, and also of their contemporaries and predecessors, who have already finished their ministry, it would contribute materially to the interest and success of this Society.

In June last the Secretary prepared and had printed a catalogue of the books, periodicals and pamphlets, then in the Society's Library. These were forwarded to most of the members of the Society, it is believed, and to many others in different parts of the country, known to be interested in our general cause, and it is hoped that it may excite an increased attention to the principal objects which we have in view. Some good fruits have, indeed, already been produced by that measure; for since that period, several donations have been made to our Library. We would acknowledge our obligations in particular to Rev. S. R. Smith, Rev. H. Ballou, 2d, B. B. Mussey and A. Tompkins, and in general to several other individuals who have made valuable additions to our collection of books.

At the last meeting of the Society, a sum of money was raised and placed in the hands of the Treasurer, and a Committee was appointed to purchase rare and foreign works relating to the doctrine of Universal Salvation.—That Committee has attended to the duty imposed upon them, as far as opportunities would permit, and has purchased several important works, a list of which, with the prices annexed, will be hereafter given.

Upon the whole, we have reason to congratulate ourselves upon the success which has attended our feeble and imperfect efforts, for the furtherance of the Society's interest, and the attainment of its objects, and we are persuaded that increased exertions will not pass unrewarded. All of which is respectfully submitted.

On motion, the Report was accepted, and the Secretary instructed to publish such parts of it as he should deem expedient.

In accordance with a resolution adopted at the last session, it was ordered that a collection be taken up in the congregation after the public services of this afternoon, for the purpose of purchasing rare and foreign books for the Library of the Society.

On motion of Dr. Clowes, it was

Resolved, That the authors and publishers of works written against the principles of Universalism, be respectfully requested through our periodicals, to present copies of their respective works to the Library of this Society.

Friday morning.—Met according to adjournment, and united in prayer with Br. Shrigley.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That it be recommended to the Universalist clergymen, and lay brethren generally, throughout the United States, to make diligent search, not only in book stores but private families, for rare books on Universalism, and books opposed to that doctrine, and to obtain them if possible for the Society's Library.

On motion, the committee, consisting of L. R. Paige, A. C. Thomas and T. J. Sawyer, appointed at the session of 1838, for purchasing books, etc., be continued.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the thanks of this Society be tendered to the Rev T. Whittemore, who has held the office of President for the last three years, for the very satisfactory manner in which he has discharged the duties of his office.

After uniting in prayer with Br. E. H. Chapin, the Society adjourned to meet in Auburn, N. Y., on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in September, 1840.

REPORTS OF STATE CONVENTIONS TO THE UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

New-Hampshire Statistics for 1839.

But little alteration from the last general report. In consequence of the removal of several useful preachers from the State, as perhaps from other causes, but little has been done, the past year, in enlarging the visible bounds of our cause. But, if societies and churches have not multiplied as fast as heretofore, we have reason to hope that many believers have been added, and that the true Gospel spirit is at work in the minds and hearts of the people; promising a rich harvest when it shall be the will of the Master of the vineyard to send us faithful laborers to assist in gathering it in. Till then, we must be content to make the best of our present feeble means. It is to be regretted that full returns have not been received from the various Associations, and for a detail of the condition of our cause, reference must be had, for the present, to the report formerly given.

MOSES BALLOU.

The Massachusetts Convention of Universalists, to the General Convention of Universalists in the United States.

ANNUAL REPORT.

By the divine blessing, the cause of Universalism has made great progress during the past year. This progress consists of an increase of numbers, and of Christian virtue. According to the information I have obtained, we have gained in Essex county, 1 meeting house; one church, and seven preachers. One house has been remoddled. In Gloucester our friends are erecting an elegant building for a school, to be called, "The Murray Liberal Institute." Rev. Thomas W. Nichols and Miss H. A. Hoyt are to take the charge of this school. A semi-mothly paper, called the Sabbath School Contributor, has been commenced in Lynn, by Br. E. N. Harris, under very favorable circumstances. In Middlesex county, we have gained two houses, one church, and one preacher. In Waltham a weekly paper, called "The Christian Freeman," has been commenced by Br. S. Cobb. Its prospects are said to be good. In this county one house has been remoddled, at an expense of about $3000. In Suffolk county we have gained one house, one preacher and one society. In this county one house has been rebuilt. In Norfolk county there has been a gain of one house. In Plymouth county there has been a gain of three preachers; in Worcester, of one house, four preachers, two churches; in Berkshire of two preachers and one Association; in Bristol one preacher, and in Barnstable of two preachers. From Hampden one preacher has removed whose place has not been filled. A great proportion of this gain of preachers has been by removals into the State. In addition to the foregoing, there are two or three houses in progress; and several societies, that have been inactive, have aroused from their indifference, and come forth to life. Six societies have been formed in this State.

This increase, great as it is, we do not regard as the surest evidence of our prosperity. We think there has never been a period when our people were so generally and deeply engaged in the subject of religion, as at the present. Much attention is paid to the cause of Sabbath schools, and to the formation of Bible classes.—There is also an increasing interest manifested in relation to the Lord's Supper. To many of our churches, large accessions have been made. Thus it will be seen, that we are gaining, not only in numbers, but in Christian worth. Our societies are almost universally in a flourishing condition, and our preachers heartily and zealously engaged in the work of their Master.

The only unpleasant event I have to record is, the death of our much beloved and faithful brother, Thomas F. King, who departed this life on the 13th inst., aged 42 years. Br. King was highly esteemed wherever he was known. The firmness of his faith; the purity of his life; the kindness and affection of his heart, and his popular talents as a speaker, rendered him one of our best and most successful preachers. In his death, therefore, our denomination has experienced a great loss. By all our ministers, as well as people, his death will be deeply lamented. No man had a more noble, generous and faithful heart, than Br. King; and we all loved him as a brother. But a wise and holy God has seen fit to cut him down in the midst of his days and usefulness, and we must bow in submission. May his death be sanctified to our spiritual good.

In this State, we have 1 Convention, 5 Associations, 127 societies, about 40 churches, 8 institutes, 102 preachers, 83 meeting houses, and 6 periodicals. Per order,

OTIS A. SKINNER.

Rhode Island.

The condition of Universalism remains much the same as at our last meeting. Some alterations have occurred, but none to the detriment of our common cause. The seeds which were scattered in weakness have taken root and give promise of future good.

Br. Benj. H. Davis has removed from the State to Mass., and the society in Cumberland, with which he labored, is at present destitute of preaching.

Br. Joshua K. Ingalls has commenced the work of the ministry.

A new meeting house will be completed in a few weeks in the village of Woonsocket, after which stated preaching will be established there. The house will be elegant and commodious. It is the gift of individuals to the society. The rent of the pews will be appropriated to the support of preaching. The village is large and growing, and the prospect of our cause there is very bright.

The society in Providence continues prosperous, so much so, that a second is talked of in that city. There are brethren, believers in the salvation of all men, scattered all over the State, but as yet preaching is not engaged regularly except in the places above named, and in Smithfield and Warren; though occasional meetings are held in Pawtucket, Cranston, Warwick, Gloucester, Bristol, and some other towns. In some villages, Sunday schools and Bible classes have been formed where there is no preaching, and in others Conference meetings are regularly held once or twice a week.

Two societies have been organized since our last report—one in Cumberland, the other in Warwick, which makes four in the State. This number appears small to such as forget the dimensions of our State, and know not the circumstances which have hitherto impeded the progress of the good work. But when we consider what was and what is now our condition, we have great reason to take courage and go forward. And when we remember that R. I. was the first province under heaven to declare and establish free toleration, and mark the good which has resulted to that State, our country, and the world, we have every reason to hope that the land of Roger Williams will not be slow to receive the full light of truth and love, the perfect day of salvation and glory.

WM. S. BALCH.

Connecticut.

To the United States Convention of Universalists, the Connecticut Convention of Universalists sendeth Christian salutations: "Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord."

Brethren:—It is with mingled emotions of joy and of sorrow, that we address you this annual epistle; of joy, for the generally increasing prosperity of our Zion;—of sorrow, for the moral desolation of some portions of our Lord's heritage, and for the removal, by death, of a Br. in the ministry—Rev. Hollis Chaffee, of Stafford—whose Christian deportment and labor of love had rendered him worthy our respect and fraternal affection.

It will be seen from the statement which follows, compared with our former reports, that the cause of truth is nearly at a stand in some places, where it has heretofore been prosperous; while its course, in others, is more or less rapidly onward. Generally, however, we believe it is advancing; and, if its progress is slow, it is, perhaps, the more sure.

Our report now, as heretofore, is doubtless very deficient; and so it must continue to be, until societies are more particular with their records, and more prompt in responding to the calls of our Associations, for statistical information. Or, perhaps, the evil complained of may be measurably obviated, by an effort on the part of our clergy, to obtain from the Clerks of societies, and from leading members where there are no organized societies, such information, when they are respectively visiting and preaching in the different places where the doctrine of the Restitution is publicly maintained. At present, however, we must submit to the inconvenience arising from existing circumstances, and will fain hope that our report, though imperfect, will prove to be "better than none."

REPORT.

Connecticut Convention of Universalists, organized May 9th, 1832; reorganized, October 12th, 1836.

Hartford county Association, (originally the Connecticut Association,) organized May 7, 1834.

Hartford County.

Hartford.—Society and church flourishing; has no Pastor, at present, but constant preaching. Br. C. H. Fay has supplied the desk, since Br. A. Moore's removal to Massachusetts.

Berlin.—Society and church enfeebled by loss of members, some by death, and some by removal to other places; has no Pastor, but enjoys occasional services on Sunday, and week evening lectures.

Southington.—No formal accession to the society reported, although the cause of truth is evidently gaining ground; preaching occasionally.

Burlington.—Society inactive; no preacher, and seldom preaching.

Canton.—Society not reported.

Granby.—Society has relaxed its exertions for some time; has preaching but seldom; there is hope that it will ere long arise, and put on the beautiful garments of Zion.

West Windsor.—Society revived, about making arrangements to sustain the public ministration of the word on each alternate Sabbath; has the use of a meeting-house.

East Windsor.—Society small; efforts much relaxed; preaching occasionally.

Glastenbury.—Society in a languishing condition; meetings suspended.

In Weathersfield, Manchester, Suffield and Hartland, there are numbers of believers in the "common salvation," who, as there are no organized societies in their respective places of residence, give their support to those in adjacent towns, and provide only for occasional lectures in their own neighborhoods.

Litchfield County.

Colebrook and Winchester.—In these towns there is a respectable number of believers; meetings for public worship are holden at both places on each alternate Sabbath, and at Winchester there is a meeting house purchased of the Methodists; Br. Chamberlain, who resides at Colebrook, is the preacher; we believe there are no societies organized; cause prosperous.

Barkhamsted.—Society "did run well for a season; what did hinder it" in its onward course, we can not say; only occasional meetings at present, are enjoyed.

Wolcottville.—Society revived; has a meeting house and preaching one-fourth part of the time; an effort will probably be made ere long, to sustain the meetings one-half of the time.

In several other towns in this county, there are many worthy brethren, who either give their support to the societies already mentioned, or secure occasional preaching in their own places of residence; and some are waiting to "see the salvation of the Lord."

Southern Association, organized May, 1836.

Fairfield County.

Newtown.—Society prosperous; preaching one-half of the time; Br. F. Hitchcock, Pastor; a commodious house for public worship is nearly ready for dedication.

Stratford.—Society and church in excellent condition; preaching one half of the time, under the pastoral care of Br. Hitchcock.

Westport.—A small but good society with excellent prospects; has a commodious house of public worship, completed and dedicated this season;—preaching one-fourth of the time.

Danbury.—Society and church respectable for numbers, and in good condition; preaching the whole time, under the pastoral charge of Br. Z. Cook.

Monroe.—Society nearly or quite extinct.

Stamford.—Society zealous and increasing; preaching one-fourth of the time, by Br. S. J. Hillyer, of North Salem, N. Y. An effort is making to sustain preaching on each alternate Sabbath.

Stamford Village.—No society organized as yet, but there probably will be soon; brethren are united in supporting preaching one-fourth of the time. Darien and New-Canaan are each similarly situated, except in the latter place there is only occasional preaching.

New-Haven County.

New-Haven.—Society is in an enfeebled state, owing to the removal of a large number of its members to other places; no preaching, but lay meetings are holden at private houses every Sunday.

Cheshire.—Society declining; preaching only occasionally.

Middlesex County.

Middletown.—Society consisting of 124 male members, organized September 13, 1833; $7000 have been subscribed for the erection of a place of worship in the heart of the city, and the house, 72 by 50 feet, is nearly completed; an institute and Sabbath school have been established in connection with the society; a church will be organized at the dedication; preaching every Sunday: Br. L. S. Everett, Pastor.

Killingworth.—Society inactive; no preaching.

Quinnebaug Association, organized November, 1833.

New-London County.

New-London.—Society inactive; no preaching.

Norwich.—Society and church prosperous; meeting house being small and inconvenient, measures are being taken to erect a new and commodious place of worship; preaching the whole time. Br. Henry Lyon, Pastor.

Tolland County.

Stafford.—Society in good condition; preaching one-half of the time; Br. Waldo Lyon has lately succeeded in the pastoral charge—Br. H. Chaffee deceased.

Union.—Society small but persevering; preaching occasionally.

Bolton.—Society small, though increasing in numbers, but "strong in faith, giving glory to God;" preaching by different ministers one-half of the time.

Windham County.

Woodstock.—Society looking up; preaching one-half of the time.

Lebanon.—At this place there is a society of Christians; its preacher, Dr. Robinson—is an avowed believer in the doctrine of the "Restitution of all things;" he preaches occasionally to the Universalist society in Bolton, and his services are engaged some part of the time by our brethren in Tolland.

Within the last two or three years, the number of clergymen in our borders has considerably diminished, by removals to other States; so that we have at present but ten, including Brs. S. Glover and H. Brown, whose advanced ages do not admit of their preaching. Br. Brown, however, does yet preach occasionally. Br. Hillyer, also, preaches a part of the time in this State. We cherish the hope that this part of the moral vineyard will yet "whiten unto the harvest," and that the laborers will not long be "few." By order of the Convention. W. S. Stickney, Standing Clerk.

New-York.

To the ministers and delegates comprising the United States General Convention of Universalists, convened at Portland, Me., September 16th, 1839.

The delegation from the State of New-York beg leave to report to your council the following statement, relative to the condition of the affairs of the denomination in said State.

We have not much to communicate in addition to reports presented at previous sittings of the Convention. In the main, the interests and prospects of the denomination are very similar to what they were last season.—Some changes have taken place since you last met in council—some prosperous and others adverse. On the whole, we can but think that the cause is in general progressing gradually onward. Within the last year seven new meeting houses have been completed and dedicated to the service of God and the advancement of our holy faith, in the following places—Sharon, Scipio, Cortland, Hartford, Newark, New-York, and Tylersville.

Thirteen new societies have been formed in the following places, viz.—Litchfield, New-Berlin, Binghampton, Colesville, Homer, Hanover, Alder Creek, Sacondaga, Bolton, Halfmoon and Stillwater, Hume, Erieville, and New-York city.

We have not in possession statistical information concerning the number of churches, Sunday schools and Bible classes now existing in the State, or that have been formed and instituted the past year. Suffice it to say, that the number is rapidly increasing.

The Clinton Liberal Institute is progressing more than at any former period, and seems to promise the fulfilment of the sanguine expectations of its friends.—Rev. T. Clowes, LL. D., is Principal, aided by two talented and well qualified gentlemen teachers—and Miss L. M. Barker, Principal of the female department, aided by two female Assistants.

The Universalist Union, and the Magazine and Gospel Advocate are still published, doing much good in the promotion of liberal Christianity throughout the State and elsewhere. Their subscription lists have declined the past year. Various causes have contributed to this result. The attempt to reduce the list to subscribers who pay in advance, has undoubtedly tended to diminish the circulation of the Union.

The organized condition of the denomination of the order in the State is as follows:

There is one Convention—fifteen Associations—two hundred and eight Societies—one hundred and sixteen preachers, and over a hundred meeting houses. We thus report an increase in all save the number of preachers. Many of them have removed east and west, and others have not yet filled their places.

We farther beg leave to report, that nominally the increase of the denomination has been in time part, very rapid, reminding one of the promise predicted by the prophet, "a whole nation shall be born to God in a day." But observation and experience have proved that the religion possessed has been more of the theoretical and negative character, than the experimental and practical; a kind of counterpart to the fanatical sectarian operations that have characterized other denominations. The consequence is, that when the causes that have awakened interest and apparent zeal have ceased to stimulate, there has not been in many instances sufficient spiritual life remaining to sustain and uphold the cause. More of the esssence—the spirituality—the vitality of our holy faith needs to be diffused, to keep alive feeling and interest, when external influences have failed.

We are of opinion that means and measures for the improvement of the denomination at large, in regard to the cultivation of the religious and moral feelings, and the elevation of the order in practical piety and true Christian godliness, ought to be adopted. All of which we submit for your devout consideration.

South Carolina.

To the General Convention of Universalists in the United States, assembled in Council.

Brethren:—The Delegation of the South Carolina Convention of Universalists to your honorable body, would affectionately represent, that the cause of truth at the present time in this State, appears to manifest indications of increasing prosperity. The meetings of the order are generally better attended than formerly, and a greater degree of interest in the subject is exhibited by the people. Considerable accessions have been made to the church in Charleston, and some in othe places during the past year, and a church has recently been gathered in Abbeville District, and another in Laurens District; but much reserve seems still to prevail in regard to uniting in church relation. These items embrace all the information in possession of the delegation, which they deem important to communicate.

Very respectfully, Albert Case.

Charleston, S. C., 1839.

INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY.

An important reason why society in general is not in a more flourishing and happy condition, the truths of the Gospel more generally known and believed, and the social and religious enjoyments of mankind augmented, is that people do not sufficiently realize the responsibility which rests upon them, individually, not only to seek their own happiness, but the well-being of their fellowmen. Too often are we apt to consider all our obligations discharged, when we simply gratify our own selfish desires. Such, however, should not be our feelings, as important relations exist between us and our fellow creatures, which impose upon us corresponding duties towards them. As children of the same benevolent and merciful Parent, alike destined to a state of immortal and uninterrupted felicity, it most certainly becomes obligatory upon us, and should be no less a pleasure on our part, to participate in the joys and sorrows of those around us. Also, as members of the same community, our interests are involved in the accomplishment of certain purposes, and the security of certain objects. Each individual is therefore responsible for the performance of his or her share of the duties requisite to the insurance of any blessings, pertaining to the interests of society. It should ever be remembered that we are emphatically social beings, and as such, bound to seek the welfare of others. Individual selfishness should not interfere with our making great exertions for the happiness of those over whom our influence may extend; and indeed if we suitably reflect on the sources from which our present, highest happiness is derived, we shall discover that the character of our associates is far from being an unimportant one.

These considerations, together with many others unnoticed in this brief article, should induce all to exercise their utmost endeavors to extend the religion of Christ, and in thus doing, benefit the whole intellectual creation. Let Christians ever remember the high responsibility which they are under to seek the present happiness of their fellow-heirs to immortal glory.—Knowing their duty, may they cheerfully perform it, and their reward will be great. RICHES WITHOUT WINGS.

Messrs. Editors:

I am no critic, yet when I finish reading a book that is calculated to elevate the standard of morality and genuine piety, I want to have every body else read it too. Such is the character of "Riches Without Wings," by Mrs. Seba Smith; and I am satisfied that no family would be the poorer for purchasing and reading this little volume. SCRIPTURE HINTS.

BY REV. S. MILES.

When our Lord and Saviour was about to leave his disciples and followers, he was careful to inform them, that it was expedient for them that he should leave them; for, said he, "If I go not away, the comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you. And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment; of sin, because they believe not on me; of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more; of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged."—John xvi: 7–11.

Howbeit when he, the spirit of truth, is come he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak; and he will show you things to come."—Verse 13.

Now the truth of our Lord's testimony has been most faithfully verified; and yet the most, if not all our spiritual teachers have not understood what the "Spirit saith unto the churches. Rev. ii: 7, 11, 17, 29. Rev. iii; 6, 13, 22. Rev. iv: 1, 2.

The Holy Spirit came as was promised, and conversed with John, and he recorded what the Spirit said in a book, now called the Apocalypse. Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary on the New Testament, has given us a diversity of opinions upon the book of Revelations, and then says—"My readers will naturally expect that I shall either give a decided preference to some one of the opinions stated, or produce one of my own. I can do neither; nor can I pretend to explain the book; I do not understand it."

The Jews have ears and hear not; nor do they understand what the "Spirit saith unto the churches."

These things are hid from their eyes, and they do not and can not believe what they do not understand. St. Paul says, "There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification. Therefore, if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me." 1 Cor. xiv: 10, 11.

Why is it so? Why not understand the conversation and teachings of the spirit of truth? Is it not from the fact that there is a misunderstanding in regard to the time, and place, of the day of judgment? Our Lord says—"And the Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth."—Matt. xiii: 41, 42. The Revelator says—"And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought, and his angels; and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the devil and satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him."—Rev. xii: 7, 8, 9.

Now if this separation of the righteous and the wicked was, and is to take place in eternity, as those who profess to be orthodox will have it, then the righteous and the wicked are now in the kingdom of God in eternity; and not only so, they will remain there until the great day of judgment. If this be true, then the wicked are not now in the furnace of fire; neither will they be in the flames of hell, until "the Son of Man shall send forth his angels and gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity." Nor will they be cast out into outer darkness, where there is wailing and gnashing of teeth, until the final separation of the sheep and goats.

The wise and the foolish virgins were to remain in the kingdom until the Bridegroom came, and "while the Bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept." Matt. ii: 5. And well they might sleep in the kingdom of God. But the question is, could they have slept if they had been in a furnace or lake of fire? Now one thing is certain, and that is, that both the believers and unbelievers were asleep when Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans. See Rom. xiii: 11, 12. Rom. xi: 7, 8. And if judgment has not yet been laid to the line, and righteousness to the plummet, then the olive tree has not been pruned; and if not, then the Gentiles have not yet been grafted into the good olive tree spoken of Rom. 11th chapter. Our Saviour never taught that the kingdom of God should be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof, until it should first be taken from Jews. See Matt. viii: 11, 12. Matt. xxi: 43, 45. Luke xiii: 25–30. No—not a word is said about coming from the East, and from the West, and from the North, and from the South, and sitting down in the kingdom of God, with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; until the children of the kingdom are first cast out. If this has not yet been done, then the Gentiles have not yet received the kingdom of heaven in its purity.

CONFERENCE AT VERNON.

A Conference of the Central Association met in the village of Vernon, on the 23d of October. A council was organized—Br. E. W. Clark, chosen Moderator, and T. D. Cook, Clerk.

The subject of a Theological Library to be established within the limits of the Central Association, was introduced by Br. Grosh, and considered by the council—after which the following resolutions were introduced and carried:

1. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to correspond with different sections of this Association, on the subject of said Library, and report the practicability of its establishment at the next meeting of this body.—2. That said committee be appointed by the Moderator—who accordingly named Brs. Clowes, Grosh, Gage, Buttrick and Cook. 3. That the Clerk prepare the minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate.

E. W. Clark, Moderator.

T. D. Cook, Clerk.

REMARKS.

A Universalist Conference in the village of Vernon was an experiment. Our friends there organized themselves into a society sometime in September last, and under the charge of our worthy Br. G. W. Gage, have continued constantly since, to increase in numbers and zeal. And, notwithstanding the infancy of their society, they made every arrangement necessary to the occasion, and the consequence was, that we had a good meeting. The congregation the first day, was not large but respectable. It increased till the last meeting. And we humbly trust, and fervently pray that good may result from our meeting there.

Our ministering brethren, though specially invited to attend, concluded (O, what kind souls are they!) to give a few all the glory gained by preaching the word at this Conference—Brs. Clowes, Grosh and the writer shared it all. T. D. Cook.

NOTICE.

At the last session of the Central Association, the Standing Clerk (T. D. Cook) was constituted a committee to appoint Conferences within the boundaries of said Association. He will therefore receive requests for the same.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

To the Ministers, and Trustees of Universalist Societies, in the Central Association of Universalists.

Dear Brethren:—In accordance with the resolutions above recorded, we solicit early answers to the following questions.

1. What are the general impressions of our brethren and friends, so far as you can ascertain by careful inquiry, in regard to the establishment of a theological library, particularly intended for the use of ministers and candidates for the ministry of our denomination, but which shall also be free to the lay brethren of our order, under the same general regulations? That such a library would be eminently useful, we think few can doubt. That it might be made very large and valuable, by annual additions, donations, and purchases from some well devised subscription or fund, thus bringing into a general repository, works which, from their scarcity, or great cost, can not now be perused by but few if any individuals, we firmly believe—provided only, tha others can be made to feel and take an interest in its establishment and increase. Please therefore inform some one of us in writing, as soon as you can ascertain, what are the general views of our brethren in regard to it.—Do they deem it a very useful measure? Do they deem it practicable? On what plan do they deem it most advisable to commence its establishment, continuance, increase and regular government?

2. What number of volumes can be obtained in each place where you are acquainted, as donations, to begin with? also, what number, as loans?

3. What amount in money can be obtained in each place, to begin with? also, what amount annually, after the library has been commenced?

Please state the principal donors' names, the amount of money each will give at first, and what amount annually—and also the titles of the most valuable theological works that may be expected as donations or loans, to begin the library with.

We respectfully solicit your early and continued attention to these subjects of inquiry, as it is only by such means that we can report on the practicability of the object in view, at the adjourned Conference, whenever and wherever that may be held. Your detailed replies, therefore, will be anxiously expected, and gratefully received by your brethren in the Gospel.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1839.

A THOUGHT, A CLIMAX, AND AN ABSURDITY.

There are some curious notions floating through the brains of mankind now and then, which compel us to the conclusion that the power of thinking is not so much employed in promoting the interests of the world, as in tickling its own fancy with the wonderful credulity of nature's mammoth reformers. It is not necessary that "something new" should be stuck to, either as text or motto, in the operations of him who aspires to dictate in matters temporal or eternal. If a thought happens to stray from its accustomed channel; or if the open-mouthed and meaningless vociferations of the gaping multitude cause it to soar ambitiously upward for a moment, it returns again to the old experiment of satisfying the morally hungry upon the principle that an old loaf is better than no bread at all. And, singular as it is, it is nevertheless true, that, in morals, mankind with all their appetites for something uncommon, will take up with ridiculous staleness, and thank the contributor for allowing them to starve.

These things may be seen in the ease with which some men quiet conscience for that which they coolly condemn in others. In the good old days of the Crusaders, as we are told, when the disciples of Peter the Hermit forsook their homes and their firesides, and wandered into a far country that they might expel the infidels from the Holy Land, there were some who possessed just such a taste for the extremes of fanaticism. One day, those who had still some small share of judgment at their command, looked with astonishment upon the deluded Crusaders, and made them the objects of mockery, ridicule and laughter. "Such," says a writer quoted by James, "was ever their language one day; but the next—suddenly seized with the same desire as the rest—those who had been most forward to mock, abandoned every thing for a few crowns, and set out with those whom they had laughed at before." But the abettors of modern crusades have not been behind hand in these excellent qualities. They have not hesitated (as they certainly should not) to condemn the fanaticism of olden times, whether they viewed it in the relics, and absolutions, and pious frauds, and ecclesiastical denunciations of yore, or their more familiarly known counterpart of the present time. The pretensions and acts of the impostors and fanatics of ancient days, and of such as have been universally condemned, of a more modern date, come in for a share of their condemnation. But let a popular revivalist come around, and what they censure to-day, they will approve to-morrow. They will follow their new leader, and, though he be guilty of all the frauds, and denunciation, and blasphemies, and false pretences which they have condemned in others, feast upon the banquet of horror which he spreads out before them, and thank him that they have been so gloriously fed.

And then the arguments used to persuade a man to his duty! They seem to take for granted that man is such a kind of an unreasonable, unmanageable animal—such a frivolous compound of stubbornness and ill nature, that to learn him his duty, is to teach him to shun it, and to appeal to his better feelings and affections, is to harden his heart, unless they wind up their homily by harrowing up his soul with fear and horror. Reason may do to begin with—common sense may serve as a kind of feint, or prelude to after movements, but these do not go far enough, nor reach deep enough. They are some thing like the first flourishes of a novel writer; used to tell the reader that he has not reached the pith of the story yet. Kindness would be a pretty good mode of treatment for those who are already with them, because they know how to appreciate it, and because they might leave the good cause if they did not receive it. And it may be good, as a bait, to the incorrigible offender, just to enable one to get within striking distance; but when this is gained, the tables must be turned, or else he will imagine you are afraid to tell the whole truth, and you will be guilty of doing as you would wish to be done by. Good examples, too, are quite effective in their place. But good examples, like the purposes of God, vary according to circumstances. It is a good example, when in the presence of true believers, to wear a happy countenance, to speak of the joys of well doing, to praise the Lord for his wonderful goodness, and to love the brethren. But if sinners are by, it is a good example to wind up by extending the countenance a little, and dilating upon the hatred of God and the agonies of the damned.

I have seen a parent undertake to correct a child for a fault. He said nothing to that child about his love for it. And though he discoursed long to it, it was not to enlighten it with respect to the nature of its duty, for this he intended to do in a way which he conceived would not soon be forgotten—viz., by dark stories and heavy blows. I say he discoursed long, but he began by coaxing and bribing. These the child understood very well, but he knew from experience that his discipline would not end here, even though he manifested penitence and submission—so he pouted. The parent took another step in his code of moral treatment. He told about the bears that tore some naughty boys in pieces once, and how that all naughty boys ought to be afraid of bears and ghosts. Then he told about a certain unseen being, who, folks said, was wandering through the earth, seeking whom he might devour. And, as his imagination warmed with the beautiful scenes which he pictured, his brain glowed with lofty thoughts, and he told his hopeful yet trembling child, that he deserved to be "skinned alive." Growing more ardent still, he seemed to think it a pity that his child should escape his deserts, and so he verified the good old proverb of Solomon, "He that spareth his rod hateth his son," and left him trying in vain to remember what he had been thus severely chastised for.

Dear reader, have you ever heard the popular method of persuading grown up children to their duty? If you have not, you will hardly understand this article. But I have, and I have often thought while hearing, of that father's treatment of his child. I have heard the anti-slavery lecturer, when he showed that he was not satisfied with reason and common-sense persuasion, but must draw a picture of master and slave coming up to the judgment. Nor did he stop here. This was not frightful enough. It would not answer his tender conscience. He must have the dear, pious slave holder, as much as he professed to abhor him, escorted into heaven, and placed in some conspicuous place where he could look over the battlements of that habitation where none but the holy enter, and listen to the wailings of the one whom he had deprived of all knowledge of the way of salvation, far down in the depths of wo, and charging him with being the author of his damnation.—I never heard it stated how much happiness the scene would add to the lot of the holy man, and I presume the calculation has not yet been made. Certain am I, however, that such a course of argument is no honor to the cause of emancipation, and never will add a single honest convert to its ranks.

Temperance lecturers, too, have filled the haven of rest with grog-venders, in order that they might listen to the just charges of the unfortunate tiplers, whom they had sent down to the regions of despair. In other words, in order to excite the passions of an audience, after discoursing reasonably for a while upon the evils of intemperance, and the misery and ruin which follow in its train, and exhorting the tipler to leave his cups, and the merchant his traffic, instead of lending a hand to lead them gently and voluntarily along the path of wisdom, they must wind up the salutation by drawing a picture, as black, and as horrid, and as inconsistent as the imagination of man can invent. Verily there are some curious notions floating through the brains of mankind, if they suppose that such treatment will reform the sinner.

A. R. B.

TRUE BENEVOLENCE AND MORAL COURAGE.

How many a young man has been enticed, by pleasure's syren voice, into the convivial circle—into the haunt of dissipation—into the secret assignation for crime, or into the social party for revelry. First he is solicited to become a mere looker on—"to stand by and see the sport." Then motives of false shame are urged—appeals to his social of kindness and love of approbation are made, to induce him to "step into the circle—not to take an active part, perhaps; oh, no, but merely to avoid appearing proud or singular." So, lest he should seem to be "above the rest of the company," or "unsocial," or to give a silent rebuke to his companions, he holds the inebriating cup, and moistens his lips with the fiery draught—or he handles the instruments of gambling, and plays in jest—or he bandies words of double meaning with the dissolute and inly depraved, but outwardly smiling and beautiful—or he furthers with kindling eye, and glowing cheek, and merry laugh, the deeds of daring, and the doubtful sports of those who look to him for these encouragements. Soon his feelings of virtuous repulsion became blunted—the intoxicating fires, or the excitement of play, or the appeals to passion, or the interest awakened by sympathy with the deeds of others, inflame his passions—resolutions grow weaker for having been crushed and bruised under foot—the appeals to his love of approbation grow more earnest, and the passion itself increases as it is ministered unto, until he is drunk with the drunken—a gambler with the desperate—dissolute with the licentious, and as hardened and daring as his criminal companions.

And what led him to all this? Was it good nature—kindness of heart—benevolence? No; it was selfishness and cowardice—base, unmanly cowardice! He loved the approbation of others more than he did their good or his own. He desired to win for himself their good will, whether it was worth having or not, and whether he deserved it or not; and to win it, fairly or unfairly, he was faithless to his friends, his God and to himself. Was he complying with their entreaties, and silent in rebuke, for fear of wounding their feelings?—No—he regarded only his own feelings. He was afraid they would call him proud—above his company—puritanic—and he could not bear that; so, to save his feelings, and not theirs, he yielded and became a silent participator, a passive accomplice, a smiling encourager of their follies and vices.

Lacking courage to do right, not wisdom to know the right, he could not stop here, and sooner than have his own feelings wounded by being termed a coward, and a turn coat, he acted foolishly, and became a coward—a base, despicable and foolish coward. These were his motives—it can not be denied that such are precisely the motives of nine-tenths of all who suffer themselves to be seduced into vice and folly by their companions. Poor, silly fellows! they flatter themselves that they are really the "clever, good natured, kind hearted and whole souled fellows" that their seducers term them; when, in fact, their cleverness is folly—their good nature, sheer selfishness—their kindness of heart, base and treacherous cruelty, and their whole-souledness, nothing but white-livered, watery blooded cowardice. Could they but read their own hearts, and analyze fairly their own motives, from the very depths of their souls, they would loathe and detest their own folly and meanness. And, could they imagine, but for a moment, that the world read off their characters, like a handbill posted at the corner of the streets, they would shrink almost to nothingness, in very dread at the comments that would be made upon their cleverness, and whole-souledness!—So mean—so hypocritic—so base and cowardly is the weak minded man that can be seduced into wrong doing.

Oh, young men, hearken unto my warning voice—learn from the fate and experience of others, to shun the yawning pitfalls that beset the paths of life! Never yield up the suggestions of wisdom and of conscience, to the allurements of improper pursuits, or to the seducing voice of the social companion. Never yield up benevolence and fidelity, to a selfish love of pernicious applause, and a treacherous abandonment of duty to virtue and friendship. Never, oh, never become a fool, a coward, and a guilty wretch, for the sake of being called, a clever, good natured fellow. But when your friends would depart from propriety or virtue, gently admonish and faithfully rebuke them—if they would entice thee, "thou shalt say No;" and rely upon it their esteem for thee will be greater than any weak compliance can win—thy courage will be seen to arise from thy moral nature, and not only from the animal man—and thy conscience will whisper, "PEACE."

LINES TO A FRIEND.

Let Virtue be thy constant friend;
She'll give thee rest,
And from the ills of life defend,
And soothe thy breast,

When storms and tempests come in wrath
And cloud thy day,
Then Virtue's form will cheer thy path,
And light thy way.

When thou art call'd to try the gloom
Of death's cold wave,
Then Virtue's flowers shall brightly bloom
Around thy grave. COLA.

I'LL FEAR NOT DEATH.

BY WILLIAM J. SMITH.

I'll fear not death, 'tis but to call,
My wandering spirit home to God;
To free my soul from sinful thrall—
To ease me of affliction's load.

I'll fear it not, nor dread its power,
Since through its valley all must pass;
But welcome the approaching hour,
That ope's to life and happiness.

I'll fear it not, though it will call
Me far from earthly friends away,
For ah! deaths hand will lead them all
To portals of eternal day.

I'll fear not death, though it will cause,
My friends to mourn around my bed,
But calmly bow to nature's laws,
And yield my body to the dead.

Why should I fear death's iron hand,
Since it so soon shall pass away,
And leave my soul on Canaan's land,
To dwell with God eternally?

Horican, October, 1839.

A STRANGER AMONG STRANGERS.—There are few positions more awkward or ludicrous than those into which strangers are often thrown in their first attempts to make themselves understood in a strange tongue. We were so much amused yesterday by the recital of some odd events in the experience of a gentleman who has seen much of the variety of life in Europe and America, that we must take out a sketch of one or two incidents which happened soon after his arrival in London from the continent. He was not much acquainted with the English language, and found it difficult to make himself understood, and was often obliged to draw upon a friend for phrases in which to express some of the simpler wants and wishes.

On one occasion, he had written several letters to his friends on the continent, but not knowing the exact situation of the Post Office, applied to his friend for instructions how to proceed. He gave him the phrase, "I do not know where the Post Office is," and directed him to repeat it to some person after he had proceeded a certain distance, and he would be assisted in his search.

Anxious to avoid mistake, he started with his letters, constantly repeating to himself—"I do not know where the Post Office is,"—but so great was his zeal to be right, that before long he had dropped a stitch, or rather a knot in the web of his discourse which he still repeated with the utmost patience, until he fell in with a person to whom he thought he would impart the secret of his negative acquirements, in respect to the locality of the Post Office, and with much politeness accosted him:—

"I do know where the Post Office is!"

"Sir?"

"I do know where the Post Office is!"

The stranger stared a moment and blazed away: "the devl you do—what is't a to me? mind your business."

The first part of the reply was sputtered forth too hastily for the poor foreigner to retain the words but "mind your business," made a distinct impression; and he left the gentleman with many thanks, supposing he had obtained the name of the street where the Post Office was situated, and pursued his way, studying over his phrases with greater diligence than ever.

Presently he decided to make another attempt to obtain assistance, and accosted a well dressed, full fed personage, with his ruddy face half covered with a bandanna, thus: "I do know where the Post Office is—mind your business!"

This address called forth a volley of abuse, which perfectly astonished the interrogator, and he did not wait for further communication, but pursued his search further, and finally by good luck found the office.

The custom in France was for an individual depositing a letter to give it immediately into the hands of the post-master or his clerk, and our friend accordingly marched up for this purpose and delivered his letters, but the clerk, supposing he wished to pay the postage, received them with one hand and extended the other for the money. Taking this as a manifestation of a desire. jungere dextras, the warm hearted stranger seized the extended hand with a hearty good will, and gave it a regular pump-handle shake, which almost brought the clerk through the aperture for the delivery of letters.

The man of letters flew at once into a rage, and flung the letters into the street, supposing the unfortunate man intended to quiz him. It was not till the innocent offender found some one within who could speak French that he was able to pacify the clerk and obtain the final delivery of his letters.

This is but a single passage in the life of a stranger in England.—Balt. Com. Trans.

A GLEAM OF LIGHT.—I recently heard a sermon which, on the whole, pleased me much. I am not acquainted with the name of the preacher; nor is it important. He appears to be a man of talent; with a very pleasing and fluent delivery, and withal, possessed of feeling. He was discoursig on the moral government of God in the world, and the parental care which he exercised over those whom he designated as his children. His subject led him to speak of the inequality of human condition in this life—some were poor, and others rich, while all were alike worthy recipients of divine favor, as far, apparently, as strict moral rectitude or piety could render them so. He accounted for this by saying that their heavenly Father knew what was best for them, and suited his dispensations to their various wants and capacities. If some were poorer than others, it was because God saw that they were so constituted as not to be capable of enjoying more, without diminishing their happiness, if it did not produce positive injury. "I have often thought," said the speaker, "that the conduct of our heavenly Father, in this respect, was not unlike that of an earthly parent towards his offspring, who withholds from them that which he knows will destroy their happiness, out of the love which he bears them, although they may not be able to discover the excellency of the motive."

The Philadelphia Spirit of the Times makes a good squib—"A fellow who married a termagant who drove him to desperation, and finally to death, just before dying requested a friend to have the following brief yet pungent inscription upon his tomb:

"SLAIN BY A JAW-BONE!"

A poor fellow who owed money and was often sued, being rather out at the elbows, a friend gravely remarked, that he was surprised to see him dressed so shabbily, for he was credibly informed that he had a new suit almost every day.

In Norway, October 26th, 1839, Mr. DANIEL WEEDEN, in the 28th year of his age.

Br. Weeden early embraced "the faith once delivered to the saints." He cherished it as his only support in the hour of trial and adversity. And when he was brought down on the couch of disease, by the slow but sure progress of that fell destroyer, the consumption, his trust and his confidence were in God. Though racked by the most excruciating bodily pains in his last illness, his mind was at peace—his hope was like an "anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, entering into that within the veil," and while he expressed a deep solicitude for the welfare of his family, he manifested a perfect willingness to depart hence and be with Christ. He has left a wife, a child, and a large circle of relatives and friends, to mourn the loss of his society. But most of them fondly trust and believe that he has joined a holier throng—"the general assembly and church of the first born which are written in heaven."

Sensible that death was approaching, in due season he made all necessary arrangements for his funeral—left a request for the writer to deliver a discourse on the occasion, and taking an affectionate leave of his family and friends, he fell asleep in the arms of Jesus. Peace to his memory.

His funeral was attended in the Presbyterian meeting house in Norway, and the consolations of that Gospel which had cheered the deceased in life, and sustained him in death, were tendered to the mourners, (comprising the relatives and a multitude of neighbors) by T. D. COOK.

OCCASIONAL SERMON,

Delivered before the United States General Convention of Universalists at its session in Portland, Me., September 18, 1839.

BY REV. JOHN MOORE, OF LEBANON, N. H.

"There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed."
JOSHUA xiii: 1.

After Moses by the command of God, and the guidance of unerring wisdom, had led the children of Israel forth from Egyptian bondage, and conducted them through the wilderness—and at his death leaving them in the care of Joshua, who was appointed his successor, to complete the work of establishing them in the land of promise—and when Joshua had conducted the mighty host with all their substance safely over Jordan and by the destruction of "thirty and one kings," had taken possession of the land which their subjects had occupied—it might seem that they had fully accomplished the work assigned them, and were in the enjoyment of all that they had anticipated by the promise of God; and might therefore betake themselves to repose, in the quiet possession of liberty and peace.

But instead of having accomplished all the work, which, in the Divine economy, was enjoined upon them, and instead of having in possession all the blessings consequent thereon, it was said to Joshua, their leader and commander—"There remaineth yet much land to be possessed"—which was equivalent to being informed that there was yet much more to be done, as well as much more yet to be possessed and enjoyed.

It is my intention to use this short sentence of sacred history on this interesting occasion, as a motto, which may lead to some profitable remarks: in offering which for the consideration of my brethren, I hope to be excused even if great plainness of speech is indulged.

1. When due consideration is bestowed on the fact, that man, with all that relates to his nature and interests, as an intellectual, social, and religious being, is endowed with capacities for improvement, to an indefinite extent—the accommodated application of my motto, to all that relates to his progression in whatever can improve his condition, and increase his happiness, will not, I apprehend, appear improper.

Not a little of our present happiness arises from the reflection, that we have advanced from ignorance to knowledge—that we have made some progress in what contributes to the honor and happiness of our kind.

Not only is there pleasure in this reflection, and in the application and results of the knowledge which we may have acquired, but in making those advances, although they may have cost much severe labor and many sacrifices, yet, in this very labor there is pleasure; for it requires such exercise of our faculties as conduces to present enjoyment, and also affords the pleasure of anticipation.

When we take a truly philosophical view of humanity, we are assured that we are allied by the strongest ties of consanguinity to the whole family of man; that in many and important respects, the interests of all are so closely interwoven, that the happiness of the whole is our happiness, and their misery is our misery. From this broad and expansive view of human brotherhood, we come down to particular countries and associations—and thus narrow down our connexions, and in our minds make the circle of our reflections smaller and smaller, till our thoughts and desires are confined for a while, to our individual selves.

And as we become acquainted with our own nature and wants, with our liabilities, capacities, and dependencies, we may thereby read human nature, by which study we are led imperceptibly out of ourselves, and by following the train of thought which a knowledge of our own wants and desires suggests, we soon begin to extend the circle of our thoughts: and our desires with respect to the interests and happiness of mankind, continue to expand and warm the affections, and liberalize and elevate the mind, till the holy spirit of universal good-will and fraternal love take full possession of the soul—and ere we are aware of the fact, we are in thought and feeling, mixing and mingling in the joys and sorrows, and exulting in that fadeless glory which awaits the whole ransomed, sanctified, and immortalized family of man!

This, and this alone, can satisfy the capacious desires of the renewed mind, and cause it to breathe forth the prayer of faith, and holy confidence, in behalf of all men—which desire, reacting on the mind and feelings, induces all who are thus exercised, "to lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty."

Although great and important improvements have been made in the science of religion and morals, just in proportion as the pure doctrine of God our Saviour, as revealed in his works and in his word, has been correctly understood, and its ennobling and sanctifying principles have been carried out in practice—still, with much propriety may it be said, "There remaineth very much land to be possessed." And so it may ever be said with respect to moral and religious improvement; for

> "'Tis a broad land of wealth unknown,
> Where springs of life arise;
> Seeds of immortal bliss are sown,
> And boundless glory lies."

There can be no end to moral advancement and happiness, but as we may, by the influence of intellectual improvement, and by the light and guidance of the glorious Gospel of the blessed God, be led forth in green pastures by the side of still waters, and as we ascend the delightful heights of joy, or find our way along the calm and peaceful vale of sober thought and profitable reflection—and in the exercise of a living faith in the promises of God, enjoy the all-sustaining and ever-cheering influences of Gospel hope, we may feel assured, that there will ever remain a fulness of joy, and a richness of glory to invite us onward and upward in ever-enduring and ever-increasing happiness.

2. It will be expected that I shall confine my remarks at this time chiefly to the condition, wants and duty of the denomination of Christians spread over our widely extended and growing republic, which by its delegates is here assembled, for the purpose of exchanging mutual salutations of peace and joy, and of taking sweet counsel together on the great subject of religious improvement and human felicity.

And here permit me, my beloved brethren, to congratulate you, and through you our denomination at large, and all for whom Jesus tasted death—on the unparalleled prosperity of the glorious cause in which we are mutually engaged—a cause which meets the approbation of all benevolent minds—a cause which breathes nought but peace and good will to the whole creation of God, and which has for its object the salvation, from ignorance, sin and death, of the entire race of Adam.

This being understood, it is clearly seen that we have no party purposes to serve—our labors are not designed to build up a party whose prosperity and interests are opposed to the happiness of any portion of our kind—neither to build our own denomination up on the ruins of others; we would rather build on the broad and sure "foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone, in whom all the building fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord."

In all important enterprises, it is profitable occasionally to review the past, and by comparing that with our present condition, and this with the object we have in view, we may be able to perceive the position which we now occupy; also, shall we be enabled, by careful observation, to note the causes which have served to retard, or accelerate the enterprise; and by the aid of experience, may discover the requisite means, and their proper use, to carry forward the work;—which will stimulate us to a cheerful and discreet performance of the duty which grows out of our wants and the stations which we occupy.

And this is a proper time, this is a suitable occasion for such review, and such comparison, to the end, that we who are here assembled in the name of the denomination of Universalists in the United States, may solemnly pledge ourselves anew, that we will be faithful to the cause of him under whose broad banner of salvation we go forth in the strength of truth against error; of love against hatred; of good against evil; of the testimony of the prophets, Jesus, and the apostles, against the doctrines and commandments of men. And may we here renewedly consecrate our lives, our powers, our influence to the service and glory of God, to the interests and happiness of man.

Standing as we do, on the lofty eminence to which God, by the power of his truth and grace has brought us, with what inexpressible joy and gratitude do we review the past! Some of you, by your own recollections: others of us, by the light of history—or now and then by listening with intense interest to the wonders and struggles of those days, as the story is related to us by the trembling voice, and tearful eye of some venerable patriarch,* who has been permitted on earth to witness the luxuriant growth of that "least of all seeds," till it has become a great tree, spreading its branches as from the centre to the circumference, whose refreshing shade and life-giving fruit is being more eagerly and generally sought than at any former period—and which will afford enough, for all its roots are constantly watered by the river of God which is full of water.

When by comparison, the past history of our denomination is brought up to the present, we are constrained to say, "this is the Lord's doings, and it is marvellous in our eyes."

With this view of the subject we may sometimes feel as though we may now cease our warfare against error, and lay aside the weapons which under the Captain of our salvation, have been so successfully wielded "against spiritual wickedness in high places." But when we compare the present condition of the religious world, and even that of our own particular brotherhood, with what all well informed and benevolent minds desire, with what our race are capable of becoming by the proper exercise and right direction of all their faculties—and especially, when it is remembered that the grand object of the Gospel contemplates the happiness of all mankind, may we not say, that in almost all that relates to the honor and felicity of our race, their progress in refinement of manners, elevation of intellectual and moral character, growth in grace, and the knowledge of all those truths which convey pleasure and profit to the mind, and add dignity and worth to the character—"There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed!"

* These living histories of the past are rapidly falling in death. May their mantle fall on those who survive.

Our present condition, as a religious denomination, is, to say the least, highly encouraging.—And while we dwell on the fact, we are involuntarily led to exclaim—"hitherto the Lord hath helped us;"—and the past success which has marked our course in carrying forward the work of removing the ignorance and vices of the world, and the fact that there remaineth very much to be done, should stimulate us all with a commendable zeal and perseverance in a work which so fully accords with the pure and holy feelings of the Christian's heart, and for the accomplishment of which is pledged the veracity of Jehovah of Hosts.

When we converse with the fathers in our Israel, (but few of whom are now left,) they inform us that their most sanguine anticipations have been more than realized—that they have lived to see their posterity possess vastly more of "that land flowing with milk and honey," than they imagined would be their happy lot on earth; they tell us how the mighty sons of Anak, in the form of religious error, have been slain by the sword of the spirit—that the Goliahs of superstition and bigotry, who defied the truth of the living God, have fallen before the noiseless march of those who were clad in the simple habiliments of unadorned truth and love—till many of the traditions of the fathers, which confined the blessings of Gospel salvation to a few of our race, and many of the middle walls of partition, which kept separate those who should occupy one fold, because they belong to one shepherd, have been swept away by the diffusion of that truth which maketh free indeed.

3. It may not be useless, on this occasion, to inquire, what were the means in the use of which "the word of truth, the Gospel of our salvation," has so widely extended its mighty conquest over error and false religions, bringing in its train joy unspeakable and full of glory to the millions who believe and obey.

The only correct answer to this inquiry is, that an exhibition and practical application of the doctrine of the Gospel, as stated and illustrated by Jesus and his apostles, has been the means under God, of bringing about the glorious revolution, the happy change the religious world has experienced, during the last half century—a change which is by no means confined to the denomination whose representatives are now before me, but which to no inconsiderable extent is experienced throughout all Christendom—and when we compare our present condition, in point of numbers, and ability and influence with the past—we perceive that wonders have been wrought by the almighty power of truth and love; that much has been done in the name of the great Head of the church, whereof we have reason to rejoice in God. But when we suffer our thoughts to go over the religious world, and view the extent of the withering influences of religious error, and sin, exerting their tyrannical sway over the fair creation of God, we feel that indeed there remaineth much yet to be done—and from past success, and an increasing conviction of the truth and utility of the doctrine of the Gospel which leads the believer to "trust in the living God as the Saviour of all men," and an ardent desire to serve our generation faithfully—may we feel impelled to use all the means in our power, to make every effort of which we are capable to carry forward so glorious a work. When we thus reason, and perceive how much yet remaineth to be done, we very sensibly realize our wants—and as we reflect on our own weakness, we exclaim, "who is sufficient for these things?" But remembering that "our sufficiency is of God, who hath made us able ministers of the New Testament, not of the letter which killeth, but of the spirit which giveth life" we feel that we are well able to go forward and possess the land.

It will be perceived by a reference to the past, that the cause in which we are engaged has progressed just in proportion to the number of faithful, devoted, judicious, and persevering laborers who have entered the ministry of universal salvation—in proportion as the public mind has progressed in knowledge and refinement—and in proportion as the glorious doctrine of this ministry has been carried out in its practical influence and results, by those who have taught and professed faith in its truth.

This being the fact, it is seen at once, that to pursue the same course which has brought us to our present prosperous condition, will carry forward the work to its final completion. We have no occasion for making any alteration in our creed, or attempting to improve or amend the truth of God, that it may keep pace with the improvements of the age—no; our great work consists in conforming faith and practice to that immutable truth, which came by Jesus Christ, and which needs no amending that it may be received by all when it is understood, for it is perfectly adapted to our nature and wants. Therefore, while there remaineth yet very much to be done, we have nothing to do by way of mending the "platform" and improving the confession of faith, to suit the prejudices of the age, or to save our doctrine—the doctrine of the Gospel—from being contradicted by established laws in the natural world, or known and established truths which relate to other sciences. The old "platform" which contends that "God hath purposed in himself to gather in Christ all things, to give all who die in Adam immortality in Christ"—and the old "confession of faith"—that "Jesus Christ is the Son of God, the Saviour of the world"—and the old test of discipleship, by which all may decide who are, and who are not, Christians in practice, viz., "If ye have love one to another"—instead of being distanced by the wonderful and rapid improvements of the age, and thereby showing their defects, and calling for a change to meet the spirit of the times, stand forth like "the pillar of cloud by day, and of fire by night," to guide those who are disposed to seek the liberty of the Gospel, in the belief and practice of the simple truth, the benevolent principles of Jesus Christ, which stand as the everlasting monuments of the love and wisdom of him who is the Father of us all.

4. But while we feel confident, that the only efficient means for the advancement of the cause of Gospel truth and human happiness, consist in a clear exposition and practical application of the doctrine of Jesus and the apostles, we should be ready to bring to our aid, in this important work, all those powerful auxiliaries which the light of reason, science, experience, and attending circumstances may suggest.

When it is admitted that the doctrine we hold, is according to the will of God, we feel that in embracing it, we have taken a stand on the immovable rock of eternal truth; and therefore feel perfectly safe in inviting the most thorough investigation; believing that all truth must harmonize, and hence religious truth when understood, will always be strengthened in the mind of man by a knowledge of all other truths. Hence the many controversies and discussions in which the Christian world have engaged, as to which of the various systems are founded on the truth of God, and which have called out the zeal and talents of giant minds, (and too often the bitterness and rancor of little souls,) have all served, so far at least as their general results are concerned, to strengthen in all minds, confidence in the Divine Paternity, and to weaken faith in the eternity of sin and misery. And even the discussion of the question, whether any of the systems claiming support from the Bible, are founded in truth and reason, have had the same general tendency, to settle the public mind in favor of the universal and efficient grace of God—and that the revelation of Gospel truth was made to our race because it was true, and not that it is true because it was revealed.

It is not enough for us to know that we are in want of faithful, devoted and pious public servants of God and the people—but we should also realise the fact, that religious instruction in order to be of service, must be adapted to the age and condition of those for whose benefit it is designed—that religious teachers must at least keep pace with the improvements of the age, or their labors will be of little or no consequence, and may be injurious to the very cause they are intending to promote.

The impetus which has been given to the cause of Gospel truth, religious knowledge, and Christian fellowship, within the last few years, by the organization of Sabbath schools, Bible classes, institutes, churches, and social conference meetings, is as good as it is great. And these humble, though efficient auxiliaries to religious instruction, prove by their influence on all who engage in such services from right motives, that the doctrine of the Gospel is adapted to our nature and wants—for it is seen that the doctrine of Christ is not only in harmony with, but is calculated to sustain and further all our interests—destroying by its power and influence all our moral enemies, and sustaining all our friends.

In going forward to possess the land which is yet under the dominion of error, and in cultivating what we already possess, we should studiously avoid the obstacles which may be thrown in our way, and which if not timely perceived and removed, or shunned, may occasion much confusion, and greatly retard, for a while at least, the onward march of righteousness and truth. And as we all reject as absurd, the doctrine of the divine right of kings—as our system does not recognize the supremacy of Popes, Cardinals, or other ecclesiastical dignitaries, but securing to each the right to decide for himself in all matters of faith, and to be governed by the laws and spirit of him to whom we reverently bow as our Prophet, Priest and King—and to observe such rules as may be adopted by the body of which we voluntarily become members; it becomes us as individuals to be very watchful over our own thoughts, words, and actions, as well as over the conduct of those with whom we are associated in Christian fellowship, that we may, each in his individual capacity, detect and guard against any evils which might otherwise draw us from the path of duty and usefulness.

5. Let it ever be remembered, that we should be no less vigilant in our associated capacity. It is to be feared that we are not always sufficiently impressed with the importance of those acts in which we participate in this capacity. If the responsibility of what may be called the conduct of a society, of an association, or a convention, in which we may have participated, or to which we may have silently consented, was to rest on our individual selves, it is highly probable that we should feel a greater anxiety that all the doings of such bodies should be characterized by strict propriety. But ought we not to be as cautious, as vigilant, as persevering, as though the whole weight of the responsibility was to rest on our own character?

Dividing this responsibility equally between ten, fifty or an hundred, would not remedy an evil which may be allowed to exist as the result of an associational imprudence; but will rather serve to increase it, as it thereby receives the sanction of the body, instead of an individual. In this particular, my brethren, is there not room for improvement? Or if it is believed that the system of discipline which we have adopted, covers all the grounds necessary for the regulation and growth of the members belonging to our body—let me ask, is that land properly cultivated? In other words, are the few wholesome rules which we have adopted, strictly observed? If they are, and if there are any evils existing, or any wants experienced which can not be supplied by the application of existing rules, it is clear that other provisions should be made. And this position does not in the least reflect on the wisdom, or the goodness, of those who framed existing rules, and established those precedents by which our affairs have been regulated. They were adopted because they met the demands of the age; they answered the purposes for which they were framed—but in carrying forward the same work under other circumstances, other regulations may be required, and if required, should be provided.

6. I trust I shall not be accused of being influenced by a dictatorial spirit, when I say that the times seem to demand, that greater caution should be observed in the admission of candidates to our ministry, than has hitherto marked our course. The time has been, when there existed in the state of things, those barriers, which to a very great extent prevented any one from attaching himself to our ministry, except those who loved the Gospel and its promulgation, more than every thing beside.

Those who then came forward to the responsible office, had they been interrogated as was Peter by his Master, whether he loved him more than the draught of fishes which he had just taken ashore, might in imitation of the apostle. have appealed to the omniscience of Him who knew the secrets of all hearts, in confirmation of their supreme attachment to the cause of that truth, in the defence and promulgation of which, they wore out their lives.

It was a love of God's truth and man's happiness, which chiefly induced them to preach the Gospel; they felt as did another: "Wo is me if I preach not the Gospel"—the high satisfaction they enjoyed in so doing, was their chief compensation; there was then, little complaint of poor pay masters, in this respect, for it was chiefly in preaching that they received their salaries.

They too, were thoroughly initiated into the principles of the Gospel, not so much by hearing it preached, as by reading over and over again, the sacred record, and single handed and alone, except by the efficient aid of the spirit of truth, did they arrive at their conclusions—and then, in opposition to their friends—to long established sentiments—to popular and powerful religious and political authority, and in opposition to their own pecuniary interest and individual ease, did they go forth to proclaim the impartial love of God.

And their ardent love for the Gospel and its promulgation, made the ministry their first object, and a corresponding conduct their constant aim, and what success crowned their labors!

Our individual reputation for correct Biblical knowledge, and proper ministerial and Christian deportment—and hence our usefulness in the vineyard of our Lord and Master, depends in no small degree, on the character and reputation of our ministry as a whole. If one member of that ministry is dishonored by ignorance or sin, the whole body must feel the shock, and every other member will suffer more or less. It is so in the estimation of the world, it must be so, while a profession of fellowship exists. Therefore, promptness in attending to any cause of complaint, decision of character and action, tempered with moderation, forbearance and charity, with a high sense of the proper dignity and influence of the ministerial character, should always be evinced by all the acts of our ecclesiastical bodies.

In receiving candidates for the ministry, if we would not render that ministry powerless and inefficient, we must insist on such literary qualifications, and such religious veneration, and love of Gospel truth, as will enable them to perform those services which are expected of those in their calling, in such a manner as will not be disgusting to an enlightened audience, or all their labors however well attended, and zealously performed, will be nearly lost; and their services will be a dead weight upon the cause which they may love with all their hearts; but which they can never promote as public teachers. Not every honest man, nor all who love the truth of God, were made to preach that truth, although every preacher should, and must possess these traits, if he would magnify his office and benefit his race.

In going forward to possess the land which is yet before us, there is another evil to be avoided, which I desire here to notice.

It is one which somewhat troubled the early heralds of a world's salvation, when they were few in number, and even when their Lord and Master was with them in person.

A desire to be esteemed the greatest. Our Saviour did not attempt to quench this spirit of ambition, but gave them to understand that true greatness, that for which they might contend, consists in goodness. That they would in reality be deserving of that for which they were striving, in proportion as they should serve each other.

It is worthy of note, that our Saviour did not condemn this principle, for the very good reason, that without it, no land would be either possessed or cultivated.

The principle is good, and we may all strive to be greatest on the principle tolerated by the Saviour. May no other desire give direction to our ambition, as ministers of Him who made goodness the criterion of greatness.

7. While then we are possessed of a commendable ambition as a denomination, to enlarge our borders, to carry the conquest of impartial grace and salvation farther into the Limitarian camp, and to possess ourselves of the land which they have occupied—it is, all important that the land should be subdued and cultivated. The consistent minister of universal reconciliation, will not be at all satisfied in merely convincing some of his fellow-beings that the dogma of endless misery, and its concomitants are false, or in disconcerting a whole parish, who have believed and sustained that sentiment. No—he is satisfied only as he sees them initiated into the principles of impartial grace, and they becoming more and more confirmed and established in the truth, being zealously affected thereby, while they draw water, with joyful and confiding hearts and obedient minds, from the well of salvation. So that a truly religious spirit and feeling may exist, pervading their whole souls, and being evinced in their whole deportment, spreading joy and gladness, and reconciliation, where gloom, and sorrow, and fear, once reigned in all their peace-destroying influence—the holy fire of love to God and man, not only be kindled up in the soul, but continue to burn on the altar of the heart, to the consuming of all hatred and sin, making earth a paradise, and its inhabitants characteristically the children of God. This should be the grand object of our ministry.

And this happy state of things can be brought about, just in proportion as mankind become acquainted with the character and will of God, with their own nature and real wants, their duty, and their final destination.

A knowledge of ourselves as we are, and what we may become by the due cultivation and wise improvement of all our natural faculties, will acquaint us with our wants; and this knowledge, together with our natural desire to have our wants supplied, will stimulate us to perform our duty; add to this, the knowledge which the Gospel imparts with respect to our final destiny, and we have all that can possibly be desired.

In acquiring and diffusing this knowledge, "there remaineth yet very much to be done."—And those who engage in the important work of moral improvement, should so discipline themselves in the school of Christ, that they may be able to remove the objections which ignorance, and prejudice, and bigotry, may bring against "the common salvation:" the most successful method by which such work can be done, is in the spirit of the Gospel, to labor to remove the grand cause of all opposition to the views we entertain of Gospel truth, and human duty and human destiny, viz., ignorance, which is the mother of all that is urged against the glorious Gospel of universal grace and salvation.

So that while we are with one hand building up the waste places in Zion, we may with the other successfully wield the sword of the spirit, and thus be valiant for the truth.

Such is the hold which the truth, in regard to the nature, wants and destiny of universal man, already has on the public mind, that its progress can no more be prevented, than a mighty river can be stayed in its course to the ocean.

In taking a cursory view of the state of the religious world, and judging of the progress of liberal and truly Gospel or Christian sentiments, by the tenacity with which the different sects hold their respective names, we shall be deceived as to the real state of the case. The leaven of the Gospel has been doing its silent though efficient work, forming as it does, an under current, which is steadily bearing the Christian world onward to the broad expanse of waters, even to "a place of broad rivers and streams"—and this gently swelling tide of religious and intellectual affairs, must continue to roll on, till all shall reach the ocean of boundless love—and party names be lost in that spirit which will enable every knee reverently to bow to that worthy name, which is above every name, and induce every tongue joyfully to confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father.

Brethren, while there remaineth a single rood of land to be possessed, or a human soul, under the influence of the tyrannizing spirit of error, while there is to be seen in the vineyard of our Lord and Master, a single "plant which our heavenly Father hath not planted"—may we go forth in the almightiness of that truth which will destroy all error, and in the spirit of that grace which shall superabound over sin, to the work of evangelizing the world. And that we may be successful in the dissemination of Gospel truth, to the destruction of false doctrines and sin, may we study to have our whole souls more and more imbued with the spirit of the doctrine which we preach, that its practical influences may shine forth in our whole deportment; that others, seeing our good works, as well as hearing us "speak the words which become sound doctrine," may be induced to glorify him who is God over all, and forever blessed.

May no root of bitterness be allowed to spring up among us, and turn us aside from the work of our calling, but may we let brotherly love continue, that the pleasure of the Lord may continue to prosper in our hands—and each revolving year show, that the light of science, and the spirit of the Gospel, are causing the race of man to extend their possessions, and to cultivate the soil of human nature, that fruit in abundance may be produced, to the glory of God and to the honor and happiness of man.

And may "God cause us always to triumph in Christ, making manifest the savor of his knowledge by us in every place," and finally give us, and all for whomsoever Jesus tasted death, endless life in heaven. AMEN.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

NUMBER XIV.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

ISAIAH—The book of Isaiah was written by himself. There is more of the sublime in the writings of this prophet than in any other. He must have exercised the prophetical office about sixty years—from Uzziah to Hezekiah. There is a tradition that he was put to death in the reign of Mannassah, by being sawn between two boards; and to this it is thought that Paul alludes when he says of some of the ancient worthies, (see Heb. xi: 7,) that they were sawn asunder.

Isa. viii: 3. "Then said the Lord to me, call his name Maher-shalal-hash-baz."

These words contain the sum and substance of Isaiah's prophecy of the destruction of Damascus and Samaria by the Assyrians. It is expressed with great brevity in four words—maher, shalal, hash baz; i. e., to hasten the spoil, to take quickly the prey; or haste to the spoil, quick to the prey.

Isa. ix: 6. "And his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."

In the version of the seventy, this passage is translated thus, And his name shall be called the Messenger of the Great Design. This, says Dr. Priestly, was probably an exact translation of the original.

Isa. 14th chapter—In this chapter we find a striking poetical and hyperbolical description of the fall of Babylon, and the powerful king of it. In verse 9 the dead are personified, and represented as meeting and accosting him on his arrival among them. It is astonishing how any one should quote verse 12 in proof of a fallen angel, when by taking it in connection with the whole chapter, it is so evident that the Lucifer here spoken of was the king of Babylon. See verses 16 and 17.

Isa. xlv: 7. "I form the light and create darkness; I make peace and create evil."

This language was addressed or applied to Cyrus, king of Persia. It has allusion to the religion of the Persians, according to which good and evil, light and darkness had different authors.—Cyrus had probably adopted this opinion, and this was designed to correct it. It is distinctly declared in this chapter that there is but one God, who is the sole author of all things, and this is the unequivocal testimony of the whole Bible.

Isa. lxv: 17. "For behold I create new heavens and a new earth."

The new heavens and new earth here spoken of, evidently mean a new and better state of things, (see verse 18,) where it is said—"But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I shall create: for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy."

In our next we shall show what is meant by the phrase "new heavens and new earth," and by the rolling of the heavens together as a scroll, and the moving of the mountains and islands out of their places, etc.

REPENTANCE.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

"Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," is the language of the Bible. Now what is repentance but a change of the mind and affections—a work for the affections? It is true, a man may repent outwardly—may refrain from the commission of sin, and appear externally to be very pious; but still, the inner man may remain unchanged, and the heart be corrupt in the sight of Heaven. The repentance spoken of in the Bible, is not a repentance like this. It has its effects upon the inner, rather than upon the outward man; upon the heart and the affections, unloosing their hold upon the vanities and corruptions of the world, and fixing them upon things heavenly and divine.

THE MORMONS.

Under this head an article appeared in the Magazine of the 6th ult., written by H. R. Schetterly, of Utica, Mich. The author's design is to give an explanation of "the religious opinions" of the Mormons, or as they now very modestly designate themselves, "the Latter day Saints." His information was derived, we are informed, "from an attentive perusal of some of their publications, and more especially, from a protracted and friendly conversation with one of their Elders."

As I, too, have had some considerable conversation with a Mormon Elder, both of a friendly and an unfriendly character, and as I have attentively perused some Mormon writings, and believe that I have some knowledge concerning both the faith and character of the Mormons, I have thought proper to follow the example of Dr. S., by penning a short article on this subject.

Dr. S. says, "The Latter day Saints are Restorationists to the fullest extent." And after noticing their pretensions in regard to the working of miracles, and having "direct revelations," and "visions," and seeing wonderful "signs in the heavens," he observes, "in all of which I believe they are sincere." Concerning these two particulars, I have arrived at a very different conclusion. I do not believe these people are Restorationists in any sense, much less "to the fullest extent." Neither can I award them the meed of sincerity in their absurd and wicked pretensions.

In the Mormon Bible, a work which Mormons consider a key to the Old and New Testaments, without the aid of which their mysteries can not be unlocked, or their teachings understood, (a work, too, containing many expressions which every intelligent Universalist must pronounce ridiculous and blasphemous in the extreme,) we find the sentence of "eternal damnation" virtually pronounced upon all who reject its wretched and absurd teachings. And this phrase, "eternal damnation," is evidently employed in the popular sense, and understood by Mormons as significant of endless wretchedness. Surely there is not much Restorationism about this. One Elder Brown might have told Dr. S. that he was a "Restorationist to the fullest extent;" and he might have been perfectly honest in so doing, for aught I know to the contrary. So, also, however, did one Elder Winchester tell me precisely the same thing in substance; but he afterwards, in my presence, publicly denied not only this sentiment, but that he had ever told me he believed it.

From all that I can learn of these people, their faith is somewhat like a weather-cock, continually shifting its position. When partaking of the bounty of a Universalist, they are "Restorationists to the fullest extent." When quartering with the Baptists, there is a perfect agreement between them in sentiment. But when associating with the enemies of Universalism or the doctrines of the Baptist church, these are the most absurd things in existence.

Elder Winchester, a preacher who has been remarkably successful among a certain class of people, called at my house some months ago to solicit the use of the church of which I have control, for an evening lecture. During our interview, which lasted some hours, he gave me to understand that according to his belief, mankind universally will finally be saved. He stated, however, that there had been a universal falling away from the primitive church—that all religious sects were in error but their own—and that the Mormons, who were the only true believers, were appointed by, and inspired of, God to restore the church to its primitive purity. He said that none were true believers but those who could show the signs which Jesus declared should follow faith, and they were the only people who could show those signs; and much more such nonsense, too tedious to repeat, he gave me as the belief of the "Latter day Saints."

Being willing that this man should be heard by the people, I granted him the use of our church, and circulated a notice of his meeting. The evening came, and the house was filled in every part. Having heard that the Baptists would constitute the larger portion of this congregation, he so contrived as to convince them that he was a real, genuine Baptist, and they one and all hailed him as a true Gospel preacher. His sermon, if so it can be called, was pointedly directed against the very sentiment which he assured me was one of the principal items of his faith; and for more than an hour he continued to pour out a stream of the most bitter invective against Universalism—sending all who believe it to hell—and repeatedly defying any one to disprove his foolish positions and gratuitous assumptions. In answer to his repeated challenges, I made a few remarks when he had closed, which so aroused the old man within him, that he was worked up into a fury, and before he left us, he gave us substantial reason to believe that his inspiration partook more of the spirit of the devil, than of the Master whom he professed to follow.

Shortly afterward, this same man preached in a village some miles distant from here, where the Baptists are but few in number, and his discourse resulted in a controversy between him and the Baptist clergyman, while the Universalists were convinced that he was full in their faith. On one occasion, I attended a meeting where a controversy was to be held between this Mormon on the one hand, and a Methodist and Baptist preacher on the other. Finding that these men were not likely to accomplish much, from the fact that they were as ignorant of the true meaning of the Bible as the person they opposed, I arose, and with their mutual consent took the stand they were occupying against the Mormon. I attempted, and believe successfully, to show that in nearly all his scriptural quotations, he had disregard the connection; that in some instances he had been guilty of the most palpable perversion, and that the sentiments he had advanced were opposed to the plainest declarations of the written Word. The reply I received was an appeal against myself to the prejudices of the people in favor of endless misery. He warned his hearers against what I had said, in substance as follows: "You should remember that the person who has just addressed you is a Universalist, and if his exposition of the passages I have cited and he has examined, be correct, Universalism is true, and none can refute it: and surely this no Christian will admit." Here is a very fair specimen of "Restorationism to its fullest extent."

At another time, after hearing this man deliver a lengthy discourse, in which he very freely and charitably denounced all but the Mormons as ignoramuses or impostors, and as enemies of God and of the truth, upon whom he pronounced, without mercy or measure, the vengeance of Heaven and the torments of the damned, I inquired of him particularly if any others than the Mormons would be saved? He answered unhesitatingly, No! and cited in proof, "he that believeth not shall be damned." I asked him if he supposed God would damn the heathen for not believing that which they never had an opportunity to believe? "No!" was the reply, "none will be damned but those who, having heard the Gospel preached, persist in rejecting it. You were safe yourself, before you heard me preach, for you never before had heard the Gospel; but as you have now heard, if you do not believe and embrace what I have told you, [it was the most perfect nonsense I had ever listened to,] and if you are not baptized by immersion, and have hands laid upon you for the reception of the Holy Ghost, you will be damned." If this be true, Mormonism is the greatest curse ever sent into the world; and he is the most unfortunate of all human beings, who happens to hear a Mormon preach without embracing his preposterous tenets; and he is the greatest philanthropist who does the most toward arresting the progress or preventing the proclamation of those tenets.—If I understand Mormonism correctly, it maintains that none but genuine believers, viz., Mormons, will finally be saved—unbelievers who have never heard Mormonism, will be destroyed or annihilated, and those who have heard and rejected Mormonism, will be damned forever.

And as to the sincerity of Mormon preachers, were they ignorant and deluded fanatics and enthusiasts, there would be some ground for the supposition that they are sincere in their wild vagaries and marvellous pretensions. But such is not the case. They are a cool, deliberate, calculating set of men; and are capable of resorting to the lowest cunning, and of practicing almost every species of trickery to impose their absurdities upon the ignorant, and make proselytes to their faith. The man who can believe these persons sincere, must possess a faith capable of stretching farther than mine is wont to reach. Their pretensions are of that nature, that it is not possible for them to be deceived in relation to them. And either they do see wonderful signs in the heavens—they do receive special visitations from God—they do see and converse with angels—they are divinely inspired—and do actually work miracles—or they are base impostors and hypocritical deceivers. And certain it is, that the evidence in favor of the latter position amounts almost to a demonstration. They pretend that Joseph Smith, their leader, found in a rock, or somewhere else, the golden plates of a Bible, deposited there by Divine authority, and brought to light by Divine assistance, and yet they have never seen these plates. They pretend to believe all this, upon the authority of Smith and several of his associates, men who were once notorious for their immorality, and who have never given any substantial evidence of their reformation. That Smith, Harris, Rigdon, and Co., are impostors in passing off their book as a revelation from God, and in affirming that angels appeared to them, testifying that it was such a revelation, is evident to every Universalist, from the simple fact, that the book itself contains doctrines diametrically opposed to the teachings of the Sacred Record. The author of Smith's book was unquestionably a believer in all the prominent items of the Partialist creed; and was a Trinitarian in the strictest sense of the word. Hence he makes his Bible not only teach the doctrine of endless misery, but also of the Trinity, and in language as plain if not plainer, than that used by the professions of these sentiments when endeavoring to enforce them. Mormon preachers pretend, too, that they are divinely inspired, as was the apostles of our Lord, and yet they know that they are as irritable and passionate, as ignorant and worldly minded, as their uninspired neighbors. They pretend to see wonderful signs in the heavens, but can never show those signs to others. They pretend they can work miracles, but none but a Mormon ever saw a miracle worked by one of them.

If these men are sincere in their pretensions, they are the most cruel hearted and wicked men living. They profess to believe that men are going to an endless hell because of their unbelief, and although they have the power to convince them of their error, and make believers of them, and thus save them from destruction, still they will not exercise that power. I requested—nay, entreated Elder W. to show me one sign—to work one miracle, assuring him that I would believe at once, if he would do so; but no, he would rather see me go to hell, and be miserable there forever, than grant me this little favor. I have so much charity for him as to believe he could not.

My principal object in writing this article, is to warn our brethren against the impositions which Mormons are practicing upon them in different parts of our country. They neither regard our sentiments nor ourselves any further than they can make them subserve their own interests. They are Partialists in the strictest sense of that word—Partialists both in faith and practice—and more bigoted and exclusive than any other sect of Partialists with which I am acquainted. Let us be careful, therefore, lest we lay hands upon them too suddenly. They may be no credit to us. So long as they retain Smith's Bible as a portion of their faith, they are neither Restorationists nor Universalists, whatever they may say to the contrary. And when they reject the book of Mormon, and make less lofty pretensions, it will be time enough for us to hail them as brethren in faith, and extend to them the right hand of Christian fellowship. GOD IS A TYRANT.

Reader, start not at the above assertion—it may appear wild and inconsistent at first—but, mark, if the doctrine of eternal punishment be true, my assertion is, in my opinion, well founded. All admit that God foreknew every thing—that he knew before he created man, what he would do, and consequently what he would not do. With this foreknowledge, he created man—gave him a law, the violation of which, subjected him to eternal misery. Now, if God knew before he created man, that he would violate the law given to him, then the very act of his creating man, proves God a tyrant—or in other words, that it was God's design and pleasure (for God does his pleasure always) that man should suffer eternal pain. If this conclusion is erroneous, I wish to be corrected. My opinion is, however, that God is not a tyrant; this opinion I derived from the Bible, and the conclusion, as above, is drawn from the supposition that the doctrine of eternal torment is true. The cardinal object in presenting the above remarks to the public, is to ascertain, if possible, whether the doctrine inculcated by Partialists, does not plainly prove God an arbitrary being.—All agree, I believe, that the Bible does not furnish a single argument in favor of the position that God is a cruel being—but believing as I do, that Orthodox reasoning represents God as being such a being, I am forced to believe that they (the Orthodox) believe one thing and teach another. How is it? Speak. JEAN.

"But wo unto that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed! it had been good for that man if he had not been born!" Matt. xxvi: 24.

When the mind of man is exercised in its native purity, one of its most beautiful features is benevolence, or a desire to alleviate the miseries of others. Whether we behold it in our Saviour, while affectionately healing the unfortunates of the human family; or in the apostles, while sacrificing peace and life to enlighten a benighted world with the light of divine truth; or in Howard, while visiting the cell of the deserted prisoner; or in the sisters of charity, while ministering at the couch of disease; it is still true, that the heart of man is animated by a spark of love which was struck from the vast and illimitable sun of affection which pervades the universe. Even when the mind is cramped, chained and shattered by the dread power of idolatry, we often find an exhibition of this benevolence, which beams upon the crimes of man, like the beacon-light upon the darkness of the storm.

But, beneath the influences of Christianity, the divine light of the moral world, this benevolence is more purely manifested. The distress of friends, the pain of those we love, or the agony of our fellow-beings, sends a thrill of sorrow to the heart, and we shed the tear of commiseration or breathe the sincere wish of delivering them from wo. The neglected widow excites our benevolence for her relief, as the substantial charities of the land prove, while, when we hear of some great calamity, an eruption of Vesuvius destroying many villages with their inhabitants, or an earthquake swallowing up great cities with those that dwell in them, the involuntary prayer rises from the altar of our love, that the account may prove untrue, and that we may be spared the fact of so much misery.

This truth, I feel assured, will avail me in securing attention to all that may be offered on a subject of deep importance. We have heard a report, and some no doubt believe it, that Judas Iscariot, for his deep treachery in betraying our blessed Lord into the hands of his bitter foes, is doomed to endless misery—a misery which will exceed all the accumulated evils of this world; for, while all the pains of this world are finite, this misery is not only supposed to be as intense as infinity can make it, but it is represented to be as lasting as the existence of God, and as burning more fiercely when the sun shall become dim and the stars shall fade from their courses. This report we esteem incorrect, and though it is seriously believed by many, yet we doubt the strength of the testimony upon which it is founded. All of those, no doubt, who suppose that Judas is lost, feel sorrow at his horrible fate; for it would do doing them discredit to suppose, that they can not look upon earthly misery without sorrow, and yet can consider the tempest which is falling upon Judas without commiseration. Consequently, if it be shown to them, that the report is incorrect, and that he is not flung away into anguish like a loathsome weed, their hearts must rejoice, and their souls be glad, that one evidence of lasting misery is forever extinguished in the waters of divine truth.

We do really believe that the report is incorrect, that the testimony adduced will not support it, that this endless degradation will form no good purpose in the government of God, and that we have evidence to prove, though his crime was great and the punishment severe, that his coming into existence is not such a vast evil as many suppose. But we do not ask you to receive this statement unsupported, to rely upon our assertion without proof—but we do ask you to consider the evidence we may offer in aid of what we have said.

In pursuing this subject, we shall, I. Consider the evidence generally brought to prove the destruction of Judas. II. Point out the reasons why we suppose he was saved.

I. Consider the evidence adduced to prove his endless destruction, in effecting which, we shall directly proceed to an explanation of the passages which are brought out as evidence to show his final exclusion from heaven and happiness.

1. In that solemn and interesting scene, where our Saviour sat at the table of the passover for the last time, and the disciples inquired of their Lord, who it was that should betray him, Jesus answered—"He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me; the Son of man goeth of him, as it is written, but wo unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! it had been good for that man if he had not been born." Matt. xxvi: 23,24. This language is supposed to prove the endless destruction of Judas, because, even if Judas were to endure ages of intense agony, and then be saved, it would have been better for him to have been born; since those ages of agony would bear no comparison with the infinite felicity and joy which would come after them. But it is shocking to the human mind, to suppose that God would have thrust Judas into the world without his consent, when it was better that he should not have come into it, for it is contrary to all our notions of the Deity to conclude that he will choose the evil before the good, and send Judas into life, with perfect knowledge before. Judas was born, that he would betray Christ, sink to endless tortures, and thus his few days of earthly life become an infinite curse, instead of a blessing: and for that, too, which was instrumental in opening the glories of the Gospel; for had not Christ been betrayed and died, he could not have arisen from the dead, and without the resurrection of the dead, where was Christianity?

Farther; the phrase, "it had been good for that man if he had not been born," is simply a Jewish saying, when any person was subject to heavy calamity, and was used in reference to present evil, and not to futurity. Dr. A. Clarke says—"When I find that it was a proverbial saying, (among the Jews to express the state of any flagrant transgressor,) and that it has been used in many cases, where the fixing of the irreversible doom of a sinner is not implied, it may be capable of a more favorable interpretation than what is generally given to it." After giving a number of examples to prove that this was the proper usage of the phrase, he says—"These examples sufficiently prove that this was a common proverb, and is used with a great variety and latitude of meaning; and seems intended to show, that the case of such and such persons was not only very deplorable, but extremely dangerous, but does not imply the positive impossibility either of their repentance or salvation."—Notes at the end of 1st chap. Acts. To which testimony Dr. Hammond may be added; for, in considering the language of our Saviour, he does not intimate that any thing more was intended by it, than that Judas was "a most wretched creature." Hence, it would seem that our Saviour simply used the phrase to designate the great calamity which fell upon Judas as the consequence of his treachery and desertion.

But, the question arises—have we any Scriptural instances, which show that the phrase was a proverbial expression, denoting calamity? We have! Job said, "Let the day perish wherein I was born." iii: 3. Jeremiah, when Pashur smote him and put him in the stocks, for prophesying against Jerusalem, said—"Cursed be the day wherein I was born; let not the day wherein my mother bare me be blessed." xx: 14.—Now no person can suppose that it was better for Job and Jeremiah not to have been born, since all believe that these two personages are worthy of heaven, and consequently will enjoy future happiness. Why, then, did they make those expressions? It was because of present calamity. Job uttered it, because of the destruction of his property, the murder of his children, and the defilement of his body—Jeremiah spake it, because he had been dishonored, beaten and put in the stocks, by Pashur. These instances, then, show, that the phrase is simply a proverbial expression, like many of the expressions of grief which we use to denote calamity. As used by our Saviour, it referred to the terrible consequences which befell Judas for his treachery; viz., that horrible death of strangulation which he endured—about which with much more propriety it could be said, "it were good for that man if he had not been born," than it was for Jeremiah to say, "cursed be the day wherein I was born." And, I urge it upon you, if in the morning of creation God pronounced man good, and it was far better for Judas not to have been born, can we reconcile his existence with the benevolence of the Deity?

2. It is argued that Judas must be cast into pain which will never cease, because our Saviour said, when praying for the apostles, John xvii: 12—"While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name; those that thou gavest me I have kept; and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition; that the Scripture might be fulfilled." But this application is incorrect, for the following reasons:—to say that the expression "Son of perdition," denotes endless misery, is a total begging of the question. The critical reader of the Bible is aware of the fact, that when an individual became subject to evil or joy, he was called the son of that evil or joy.—Hence, in 1 Sam. xxv: 17, it is said of Nabal—"He is such a son of Belial, that a man can not speak to him." Son of Belial means son of worthlessness, or a worthless person. Concerning David, it is said in Ps. lxxxix: 22, "The son of wickedness shall not afflict him"—or a wicked person shall not harm him. Of Nebuchadnezzar it is said, "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning." Isa. xiv: 12.—Or son of the morning star, for so Nebuchadnezzar was called for his exaltation. These three instances are sufficient to prove this position, though instances might be multiplied to a great number.

After the same manner, Judas is called the "son of perdition." He was devoted to destruction, to a premature death, and an ignominious end—hence he was the "son of destruction," or the victim of death. Rosenmuller makes perdition to mean simply a defection from Christ the teacher, consonant to the character of a noted impostor. Wakefield translates it the "son of mischief"—"a Hebrew phrase for a destructive, pernicious person." Hammond calls him the noted traitor. While the judicious Macknight, on the phrase, "son of perdition," in 2 Thess. ii: 3, gives us the following comment—"This appellation being given to Judas, John xvii: 12, Dr. Newton thinks, the application of it to the man of sin, signifies, that, like Judas, the man of sin was to be a false apostle, and would betray Christ, and be utterly destroyed." Hence, it must be evident, that Judas was called the "son of perdition," because he was the child of an ignominious death.

Nor does the term "lost," prove that Judas is forever excluded from heaven; for the term "lost" does not signify that the object lost, will not be found again.—The piece of silver in the parable was lost, but the woman found it again—the sheep was lost, but the good shepherd found it again—the wandering prodigal was lost, but his father declared that he was found again.—In fact, we are taught that "the Son of man came to save that which was lost." Matt. xviii: 11. Consequently, even if Judas was lost, he may be found again.

Besides, to suppose that Judas is endlessly lost, contradicts our Saviour. In John iii: 35, he expressly affirms, that "the Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hands." This being a fact, let us notice what he says about these "all things." "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." John vi: 37–39. Now, if Judas be lost entirely, then our Saviour does lose something which the Father hath given him; for Judas was among his possession.

True, in the verse under consideration, he declares that he lost nothing but the son of perdition; but this is a matter easy of reconciliation. God gave to his Son, at the opening of the Gospel dispensation, twelve men as promulgers of his truth; these he had kept through his whole ministry, except the son of perdition, who was lost from the apostleship, from the circle of twelve, from the stars of truth which first rose into the heaven of Christianity. From nothing else was Judas lost, and into nothing was he lost, but treachery and a premature death. But in the other case, he alludes to the end of the Gospel, when, of all the creatures which God hath given him, he will lose none; for he came to execute the will of God, which will is, to have all men saved and come to the knowledge of the truth. Consequently Judas will not be excluded.

We may well say that Saul was lost, while in persecution, as the wandering prodigal was lost while in a foreign land; but Saul was found by the Saviour. If Saul was found, then there is probability that Judas will be found, for Judas was no worse than Saul.

Again, our Saviour declares—"But none of them is lost, except the son of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled." The question arises, of what Scripture did our Saviour speak? One Scripture is, Ps. xli: 9—"Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me." That this language applies to Judas is clear from what our Saviour said to his disciples—"I know whom I have chosen; but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, he that eateth bread with me, hath lifted up his heel against me." Another Scripture is, Ps. cix: 8—"Let his days be few: and let another take his office." That the days of Judas were cut short, all know—and that another took his office, is clear from the 1st chapter of Acts; in which we have an account of the fall of Matthias to fill the vacancy made by the treachery of Judas. Indeed, Luke, in the 1st chap. of Acts, expressly so applies it. From these facts, it seems that the conduct of Judas was the fulfilment of prophecy; and that very treachery of his, by which Jesus was delivered into the hands of the Jews, was the opening scene of a series of events, the trial, crucifixion and resurrection of Christ, which established the truth of Christianity, a system which has effected immense good among men. We do not intend to exculpate Judas, however, because in the hands of God, good was brought out of what he intended for evil. But we do ask, is it not shocking to suppose, that the conduct of Judas should be the fulfilment of prophecy, spoken long before he was born, and yet he, the unconscious instrument of vast good, should be endlessly destroyed without mercy?

If I am asked how I view this subject, I answer, in the same light that I view the case of Joseph and his brethren. The brethren of Joseph were lost to virtue, when they sold him as a slave. This act, which they intended for evil, was overruled by Providence for good—the preservation of the patriarchs, from whom, according to the flesh, Christ sprang. But their evil intention was not suffered to eventuate in their destruction, for, though punished, yet they became at last reconciled. So, what Judas meant for evil, God overruled for good; and though he tasted the bitter fruits of his transgression, yet he will be reconciled, and will enjoy the pleasures of that Gospel, which was established through the death and resurrection of Christ.

3. It is said that Judas must be lost in endless wo, because he committed suicide—for Matthew affirms that Judas went and hanged himself. Matt. xxvii: 5. But admitting that Judas was a suicide, is it not entire assumption to say that a suicide can not be saved? Where, in the Bible, do we find testimony which expressly shuts out the poor child of self-destruction from heaven? No where! True, it may be said, as being Scripture, that no self-murderer hath eternal life; but this happens not to be found in the Bible which Christ and his apostles made; it was dreamed by some mind very intent on maintaining its creed, But there are facts which show that Judas did not hang himself—for, though the common version says that he hanged himself, yet Dr. Clarke declares that the word translated "hanged," is by the very best critics rendered, "was choked"—so that instead of hanging himself, he was choked by his excessive grief. This is rendered more clear, from the fact, that Luke says nothing about hanging, but gives the end of Judas in the following language—"Now this man purchased a field with the reward of iniquity; and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out." Acts i: 18.

This latter language is a delicate method of expressing the disease under which Judas labored, a disease brought on by his excessive grief. That disease was a violent dysentary, so powerful that his bowels came out piecemeal, and he miserably died. Such instances have happened—as in the case of king Jehoram, recorded in 2 Chron. 21st chapter; who, for his wickedness, was threatened with a disease, which came upon him, and his bowels fell out. This also would seem to have been the disease with which Herod was smitten, for suffering himself to be worshipped as a god, as we are told in the 12th chapter of Acts. But there is an instance almost exactly similar to that of Judas, which is recorded by Josephus, in his war, B. 1, C. 3. It is the case of Aristobulus, who murdered his mother and his brother; for which crime his grief and remorse became so great, that his bowels were torn with excruciating torments, and he voided much blood.

From these considerations, the case of Judas seems to be this—when he found that he had betrayed his Lord to death, his grief became intense, and brought on a violent affliction in his bowels, so that he voided them; which, with his frenzied despair choking him, sent him to an ignominious death as the reward of his treachery, proving to him that transgression is hard.

4. The only testimony which is supposed to prove the endless destruction of Judas, is in Acts i: 25; where, as the apostles were about choosing one to fill the place of Judas, it is said, "That he may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place." The phrase, "to his own place," is commonly understood to be hell—but I did not know before that hell belonged to Judas—I thought that the creeds represented it to belong to all unrepentant sinners. Besides, is it not entirely gratuitous to say, that the place intended is hell? Nothing is said about hell in the passage, and there are other places which may have been intended.

The question arises, what was the place of Judas?—I answer, the apostleship. He was chosen as one of the apostles, and it was his place to have part in the ministry. From this place Judas fell, because of his transgression, and Matthias was elected that he might fill the place of Judas, and thus own what Judas had forfeited. This view is confirmed by what Luke says in Acts i: 20, quoting from Ps. cix:—"His bishopric let another take." You perceive that the bishopric is called Judas'—but another took it and went into Judas' place. Hence, it was said, "that he (Matthias) may take part of his ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he (Matthias) might go to his (Judas') own place."

Thus I have examined the testimony which is brought forward to prove the utter exclusion of Judas from heaven; and according to my own impressions, it does not establish the common notion on this point. But lest it be said that I have prejudged this matter, I would remark, that if this testimony has produced a favorable effect upon a mind whose prejudices were against it, it will form presumption that we have not prejudged.—I will then give the convictions of a believer in endless misery. Dr. Clarke, after he had carefully examined all the evidence brought to prove the endless misery of Judas, says:—"The utmost that can be said for the case of Judas is this; he committed a heinous act of sin and ingratitude; but he repented and did what he could to undo his wicked act; he had committed the sin unto death, i. e., the sin that involves the death of the body; but who can say, (if mercy was offered to Christ's murderers, and the Gospel was first to be preached at Jerusalem, that these very murderers might have the first offer of salvation through him whom they had pierced,) that the same mercy could not be extended to the wretched Judas? I contend, that the chief priests, who instigated Judas to deliver up his Master, and who crucified him; and who crucified him too as a malefactor, having at the same time, the most indubitable evidence of his innocence, were worse men than Judas Iscariot himself; and that if mercy was extended to those, the wretched penitent traitor did not die out of the reach of the yearning of its bowels. And I contend farther, that there is no positive evidence of the final damnation of Judas in the sacred text. I hope it will not displease the humane readers, that I have entered so deeply into the consideration of this most deplorable case. I would not set up knowingly any plea against the claims of justice; and God forbid that a sinner should be found capable of pleading against the cries of mercy in behalf of a fellow-culprit."—Notes at end of 1st Acts. Such were the impressions of Dr. Clarke—such are our impressions. THE TRUMPET.

It was from no want of sympathy, but from the pressing of some more engrossing subject at the time, that we did not notice the burning of the Trumpet office on the 14th ult. Br. Whittemore was insured, but not to cover his entire loss—his mail books were saved from the fire—and his account books were saved through the fire by being in a salamander safe. The Trumpet of the 19th, being nearly ready for the press, was destroyed, so that we got none till a week after, when it appeared again in renewed beauty and power. Long may it flourish—and when burned out, may it ever come forth again thus renewed.

The Trumpet office is now established at No. 14, Devonshire-street, (up stairs,) a few doors South of State-street. A. B. G.

THE EXPOSITOR—FOR NOVEMBER,

Has been received and read with the interest it usually excites. The article by Br. Thayer, on "Demoniacs—possessed with devils, unclean spirits, etc.," is a very valuable, clear and cogent article, containing probably more information in a little space, than most articles ever before published in that periodical. It, alone, is worth a year's subscription to the Expositor to any person who has not access to Farmer, Lardner, or other similar rare works treating on that subject. The "Opinions of ancient Heathens, on the supremacy of God, immortality of the soul, etc.," is a hasty and interesting, though imperfect sketch, compiled from Enfield's History of Philosophy, by Br. L. Willis. "Educational Reform, its results, and our duties in relation thereto," is a notice and commendation of four celebrated works on popular and home education, by an able writer—if I mistake not, a medical man of the "far West." "The standing still of the sun and moon, Josh. x: 12–15," by Br. H. B. 2d, compiled from a translation of a German article published in the Biblical Repository, is the best solution yet given of a difficult passage. The author gives all the different solutions yet offered, and then offers his own. He supposes the Book of Jasher to have been a volume of Hebrew poems, and that the Historian quotes the passage in question as a mere embellishment of his own strait forward narrative of facts. He gives instances of such quotations for the sake of variety and ornament, by other Scripture writers—and they are common in our own day. He then gives the passage in its poetic form, as it actually exists in the Hebrew, preceded and followed by the prose narrative of the writer of the Book of Joshua, thus—

"Then spake Joshua unto the Lord,
In the day when the Lord delivered up the Amorites before the children of Israel;
And he said, in the sight of Israel:
Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon.
And thou Moon, in the valley of Ajalon!
And the Sun stood still,
And the moon stayed,
Until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies.
[Is not this written in the Book of Jasher?]
So the Sun stood still in the midst of heaven,
And hasted not to go down about a whole day.
And there was no day like that before it or after it,
That the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man;
For the Lord fought for Israel.
And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp in Gilgal."

Having thus given the entire quotation from the Hebrew poet, the historian goes on with his account, beginning where he left off to introduce it, and tells the circumstances that occurred before Joshua's return to Gilgal. To obtain a clear idea, however, of the writer's hypothesis, the reader should examine the entire article carefully, for himself.

A commendatory review of "The Rose of Sharon," and an Essay on the nature, power and value of faith, (the last by Br. W. S. Balch,) closes this number—the closing number of the third volume, new series.

Thus far to write, is a pleasure—what follows, from its touching a tender chord in our own experience, as well as out of regard to the character of our denomination, is painful.

The publishers are at an annual expense of about $1300, which must be paid in cash. They have less than 800 subscribers, of whom only about 400 have paid, leaving them losers, thus far, of $500 on the volume!—and this too, on a work, the subscription to which should always be in advance! What are we coming to? Must the publishers of our periodicals always suffer thus grievously, for the want of promptness in their subscribers; or must all our periodicals be abandoned—struck out of existence? Let Universalists consider quickly, and ACT ere it is too late. We give the conclusion of their address to their patrons. A. B. G.

The Proprietors would further remark, that at the commencement of the present volume a number of subscribers to the former volume waited until one or two Nos. had been issued before notifying us of their wish to discontinue; therefore we give notice to all such as wish to discontinue, that we shall hold every person as a subscriber to the next volume who does not notify us to the contrary, before the publication of the first No. of the next volume, agreeably to the following decision:—

Important Decision for the Publishers of Newspapers, etc. Judge Thompson, of Indiana, at a late sitting of the Circuit Court, at which he presided, gave the following decision:—"That if a subscriber to a Periodical failed to notify the Editor to discontinue the same at the end of the time subscribed for, and pay up the arrearages, he was bound for another year."

THE UNIVERSALIST UNION.

This valuable and beautiful periodical is suspended!—not for the want of subscribers who would take and read it—for it had thousands of these—but for want of subscribers who were willing to take it, and pay for it in advance. A heart-sickness came over me in reading in the closing number of the 4th volume, dated November 2d, that the number of subscribers received on the new terms—viz., payment within three months from the time of subscribing—was not sufficient to pay the expenses of publication for the coming year. Subsequently, however, Br. Price expresses a hope that, as names are still coming in, he may be able to go on after a suspension of a few weeks. We hope so too—we ardently desire it—for we do not know how to spare the Union—how to bear the disgrace of our denomination in allowing it to stop for the want of support.

These are critical times for publishers—and unless Universalists arouse immediately to the performance of their duty as subscribers to their periodicals, they must expect many of them to be discontinued, and the cause to suffer, and their outstanding accounts to be collected by law—an event that both publishers and subcribers must deeply regret—but what else can be done, when those on whom we depend, on whom we have waited through heart-sickening months and years, (and waited in vain,) do not voluntarily remit to us our hard-earned, long waited for dues? We do hope that the responsible subscribers to the Union will immediately send in their names on the new terms, and so secure its continuance. And we also ardently hope, and seriously entreat, that the delinquent subscribers to the Magazine and Advocate will, by immediately sending us what is due on their subscriptions, relieve us from the intolerable pressure we now are under. What say our subscribers? Shall our hope be realized—our humble entreaties be answered? What thou doest, reader, do it quickly.

BLACK LACE.

——"Lace not! lace not!
The thing you lace may die."

I had a dream, which was not all a dream;
A sable fringe did edge the golden sun—
The sky looked down disquieted and dull—
The moon was struggling in a vapory veil—
The stars did wander darkling through a shroud
Of gloom mysterious that enveloped them;
Our mother Earth, her mountains and her plains,
And trees and towers the same sad livery wore;
Her streams did murmur through a cloud of blackness—
Her fountains spouted thickly in their curtain—
Her very winds breathed forth a stifled sound—
Her birds in a strange chaos flapped their wings—
And all the human things that walked her face
Forgot their cares and passions in that,
Emulous of darkness! Every female brow
Wore an unearthly aspect, as by fits
Light fell upon it; shades like moody night
Floated around each form, with pictured stars
All of one hue of gloom. The graceful circlet
That bound the classic head—the drapery
That wrapped the shoulder, and the rounded waist,
Down to the glancing foot, which erst did gleam
Like to "a fairy's on a moonlit leaf"—
Were black as Erebus! It seemed the pall
Of Nature's loveliness, self-shrouded thus!
From the dark city came the mourning hosts,
And each grew blacker by degrees, and vanished
In the surrounding blackness. Two survived,
And they were rivals: by the altar-stone,
Sable they met—and then they lifted up
Their eyes—and as they saw each other's face,
They started back—and looked—and shrieked, and died!
"Even of their mutual hideousness they died!"

THE WIFE'S PRAYER.

Hear me—O! hear me now!
By the red flush upon thy wasted cheek,
By the deep tracery o'er thy marbled brow,
Hear me!—Bear with me, husband, while I speak!

I've marked thee, day by day—
Thine hours are all of anxious, vague unrest—
Thine eye hath caught a stern, unwonted ray—
Thy lip hath lost all memory of its [illegible]

This wakeful ear hath heard
Thoughts nursed by thee in solitude apart;
Which like the young of the devoted bird,
Feed on the burning life-blood of thy heart.

Thy wife sits pale beside—
Thy child shrinks back appalled from thy embrace—
Thy menials quail before thy mien of pride—
Thy very dog avoids thy altered face!

O! for poor glory's wreath—
Casting from thee all tenderness and gladness—
Thou trackest a phantom on whose misty breath
Tireth the way-founts, till thou thirst to madness!

My prayer is all for thee—
My life is thine—by our remembered bliss,
By all thy watchful hours of misery,
What meed hath Fame to render thee for this?

If thou yet lovest me, hear!
Now, while thy feet press onward to the goal,
Turn thee, O turn thee, in thy stern career,
And thrust this mad ambition from thy soul!

VALUE OF CHARACTER TO YOUNG MEN.—No young man, who has a just sense of his own value, will sport with his own character. A watchful regard to his character in early youth, will be of incalculable value to him in all the remaining years of his life. When tempted to deviate from strict propriety of deportment, he should ask himself, can I afford this? Can I endure hereafter to look back upon this?

It is of amazing worth to a young man to have a pure mind. for this is the foundation of a pure character. Thus the mind hath in its own power the selection of its themes of meditation. If youth only knew how durable and how dismal is the injury produced by the indulgence of degrading thoughts; if they only realized how frightful were the moral deformities which a cherished habit of loose imagination produces on the soul, they would shun them as the bite of a serpent. The power of books to excite the imagination, is a fearful element of moral death, when employed in the service of vice.

The cultivation of an amiable, elevated, and glowing heart, alive to the beauties of nature, and all the sublimities of truth invigorates the intellect; gives to the will independence of baser passions, and to the affection that power of adhesion to whatever is pure and good and grand, which is calculated to lead out the whole nature of man into those scenes of action and impression by which its energies may be most appropriately employed, and by its high destination may be most effectually reached. The opportunities of exciting these faculties in benevolent and self-denying efforts for the welfare of our fellow men, are so many and great, that it is really worth while to live. The heart which is truly evangelically benevolent, may luxuriate in an age like this.

The promises of God are inexpressibly rich; the main tendencies of things so manifestly in accordance with them; the extent of moral influence is so great, and the effects of its employment so visible, that whoever aspires after benevolent action and reaches forth to these things that remain for us, in the true dignity of his nature can find free scope for his intellect, and all-inspiring themes for his heart.—N. Y. Evangelist.

APPLAUSE.—When I was a boy I once went to the theatre. The tragedy of Hamlet was performed; a play possessing some noble thoughts, and much subtle morality. The audience listened with admiration and with applause. I said to myself, "it must be a glorious thing to obtain this empire over man's intellects and emotions." But now an Italian mountebank appeared on the stage—a man of extraordinary strength and sleight of hand. He performed a variety of juggling tricks, and distorted his body into a thousand surprising and unnatural positions. The audience were transported beyond themselves; if they had felt delight in Hamlet, they glowed with rapture at the mountebank. They had listened with attention to the lofty thought, but they were snatched from themselves by the marvel of the strange posture. "Enough," said I, correcting my former notion. Where is the glory of gaining applause or of ruling men's minds, when a greater enthusiasm is excited by mere bodily agility than was kindled by the most wonderful emanations of a transcendant genius." I have never forgot the impressions of that evening.—Bulwer.

In this city, November 4th, by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. FREDERICK S. FRENCH, to Miss MARY NANCY SPAULDING, all of this place.

In Canadice, September 29th, by Rev. Wm. Queal, Mr. WILLIAM B. SPENCER, of Springwater Valley, to Miss NANCY BURDEN, of the former place.

In Rush, October 1st, by Rev. J. Chase, Mr. MARVIN ROBERTS, to Miss JANE PAULINA PORTER, both of Mendon.

DEATHS.

In Fort Plain, October 2d, of a complication of diseases, PETER, son of Peter and Eliza Valentine, aged 17 months. Funeral on the 4th—sermon by H. B. S.

At Clinton, Mich., June 29th, HARRIET, daughter of D. D. and Anna Piper, aged 6 years and 8 months. Br. and Sister Piper are both firm believers in the great salvation, therefore they sorrow not as those who have no hope.—May the blessing of God rest upon the parents, and the two children left behind. A sermon was delivered by the writer of this. H. R.

At Tecumseh, Mich., August 2d, JOHN OSBORN, aged 28 years. Br. O. died in faith, believing the precious promises; he was in fact a practical Universalist. He was perfectly reconciled to the approach of death. He requested that I should attend his funeral, and selected a text, found in the cviiith Psalm—"O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men." The funeral was held at the Presbyterian session house, at which place the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the weeping widow and a sympathising audience by the writer. H. R.

In the town of Madison, Mich., August 11th, EBENEZER MUDGE, aged 68 years. Br. M. died in peace, believing he should go to rest. The funeral obsequies took place on Monday, the 12th, at which time a large congregation assembled to pay their respects to a departed friend. He has left a widow and several children to mourn his loss. Sermon by the writer. H. R.

At Cassville, Grant county, W. T., on the 12th of September, as was supposed of a fit of apoplexy, FRANKLIN J. MUNGER, Esq., aged about 29 years, formerly of Hamilton village, Madison county, N. Y.

The deceased had been long and familiarly known to the writer of this notice, and he can truly say, that on receiving the sad intelligence of his death, there is no friend who is not a near relative for whom the bitter pang of regret could have been more keenly felt. He was a lawyer by profession, and left Hamilton for Cassville, the above named place, full of hope and expectation, about two years and a half since, where he pursued the duties of his profession with honor to himself and the satisfaction of the people, until the time of his death. He had but just emerged from the conflicting difficulties attendant upon early settlers, and his future prospects bid fair to make himself and family a home which would render them comfortable and happy.

He has left a wife and two little children far from their native home, together with many relatives and friends in other parts, to mourn their irreparable loss.

M. CLARK.

In Hume, August 12th, of consumption, Br. RICHARD HENDA, aged 64 years. Br. Henda was a firm and consistent believer in the doctrine of the restitution, and his faith in God's universal love, enabled him to endure his last illness with resignation and Christian fortitude. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to a crowded assembly of relatives and neighbors, by the writer, on the 14th. May that faith in the Gospel of God's grace, which enabled him to joyfully anticipate the time when he should be clothed upon with immortality, be the sure consolation of his bereaved companion, and numerous relatives.

I. B. SHARP.

In Sparta, Crawford county, Pa., August 2d, after a short and distressing illness, Mr. ICHABOD BLAKESLEE, aged 66 years. He was a member of the Baptist church. Towards the close of his life his faith in God's love somewhat supplied the deficiency in his narrow creed, although he was not an avowed Universalist. He lived a practical follower of the Saviour, and died in full faith of immortality beyond this fleeting world. His widowed companion is a believer in the restitution, by whose request this is presented for publication. I. B. SHARP.

 Trumpet please copy the above notices.

In Antwerp, on the 12th of September, after a very brief illness, OLIVER STOWELL, Esq., aged 61 years. Mr. Stowell was one of the earliest settlers of that town, commencing, as most "pioneers" do, with no other reliance but his own exertions. He had, by his habits of industry and economy, acquired a comfortable affluence, which enabled him to spend the latter part of his life in a pleasant retirement from the cares that had burthened his earlier years. His whole life is a worthy pattern for the imitation of others, and his unexpected removal from life casts a deep gloom over a numerous circle of relatives, and a cloud upon the face of the whole community.

He died in the firm belief (which he had long entertained) of the efficacy of the blood of the Saviour to wash away the sins of the whole human family. Rev. Mr. Waggoner, of Watertown, attended his funeral, and preached a very appropriate and feeling discourse. "The mourners go about the streets."—Watertown Jeffersonian.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED....NO. IX.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TO HUSBANDS.

THE VALUE OF A GOOD REPUTATION.

"Honor and fame from no condition rise,
Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

A good reputation is indispensably necessary to secure respect, prosperity and peace. Under its shield we are effectually screened and protected from calumny and detraction, and from dishonor and contempt. It affords us the congratulation and rejoicing of well tried friends in our prosperity, and insures us their sympathy and aid, in adversity. A virtuous name secures the respect and countenance of the reputable, the wise and good, and is a complete coat of mail, against which the darts of envy or malice, will be directed in vain. But without reputation, without the respect and confidence of our fellow-creatures, of what value is life? To feel that we are looked upon with distrust and suspicion—that we are disliked, and despised, and shunned, by those whose approbation is an honor, and whose condemnation is a disgrace, and to feel conscious that we merit this disrespect on account of our vicious conduct—what can compensate for such degrading emotions?—what has earth to bestow to induce a thinking mind to adopt a course of life, that would be fruitful in such results? Conscious innocence is a soothing balm to its possessor—it imparts strength, and vigor, and assurance, under the most adventitious circumstances. What, though enmity is awake against us—what, though detraction is inventing its bitterest calumnies, and malice is assailing with its deadliest fangs? We can smile amid all these attempts at our ruin, when our conscience whispers that we are innocent; for we know that however successful wickedness may appear for a season, however high it may rear its hydra head and boast of its triumphs, truth will ere long destroy it, and annihilate its works, and then our innocence will shine out as the morning, and our integrity as the noon-day sun! But to feel that all those allegations which would be calumny and defamation if applied to the innocent, are just and deserved when applied to ourselves—is there any calamity more to be dreaded and avoided?

A course of uprightness and virtue, is the only natural path for man to pursue. He was formed by his Creator to walk in such a path—all his capacities and endowments are peculiarly and expressly adapted for it—and hence it will develope the highest capabilities and attainments, and insure the utmost enjoyments of his nature.

"Virtue's foundations with the world's were laid;
Heaven mixed her with our make, and twisted close
Her sacred interests with the springs of life.
Who breaks her awful mandate, shocks himself,
His better self."

This conclusion of the poet is perfectly obvious. The practice of virtue being the only course for which man's faculties are designed or adapted, strictly speaking, it is, hence, the only course in which he can experience the genuine happiness which his nature is capable of producing. The practice of sin being unnatural to man, being an abuse, a prostitution of his capacities to acts altogether beneath and contradictory to his nature, can no more produce true and actual happiness, than any machine can discharge its functions properly, when out of repair! Whoever supposes the contrary, is ignorant of the laws of his own constitution, ignorant of the nature and design of God's government, ignorant of the constituent principles of human happiness; and if he allows this ignorance to bias his conduct, he will, sooner or later, unavoidably become involved in guilt and that wretchedness which is its invariable accompaniment.*

"A good name," says the wise man, "is rather to be chosen than great riches." Yet how many reverse this principle, and act as though they estimated riches of much more value than a good name. How many have sacrificed a good name, sacrificed every thing valuable in life, and destroyed even their own happiness, that they might accumulate wealth. And of what value is gold, when its possessor is despised by his fellow-men? The wisdom of Solomon's declaration, has not deteriorated by the lapse of ages. There is not an intelligent being in existence, who, had he the capacity and opportunity to scan the whole subject of human enjoyments, would not far more readily choose a good name with poverty, than all of Ophir's gold without it. With a pure heart and an unsullied reputation, there can be, comparatively speaking, but little wretchedness in life—without them, there can be but little actual enjoyment! It has been well said, that the poor pittance of seventy years, is not worth being a villain for. To live under the unsparing lash of a guilty conscience—to be disrespected by the world and by ourselves—to go down unwept to the grave of the disreputable—to have those who pass by our last resting place, point with the finger and exclaim, "there lies one who was a stranger to the path of virtue and religion, who gave no heed to the commandments of Heaven, the dictates of wisdom, or the voice of truth, but who, day by day, violated the principles of justice, honor and integrity, who oppressed the widow and the orphan, the poor and unfortunate, and whose death was a relief and a deliverance to the community in which he resided"—this surely is not a prospect which should lure a rational being into the adoption and practice of wicked principles. And yet man should contemplate these as the general features which God has rigidly enstamped upon the course of those who violate his laws, and pay no heed to those seeds of virtue and goodness, which he has scattered into every heart!

The influence of a good reputation, is diversified in character and almost boundless in extent. Its influence upon the personal peace and happiness of men, is of immense value. There is an inherent desire in every soul to gain the approbation of its fellow-creatures. And to obtain the commendation of the upright and reputable, is more desirable even to the vicious, than the applause of their companions in wickedness. To be approbated, respected, and honored in the community where we reside, is both a natural and a commendable desire. Now among all enlightened and respectable people, there is but one way to obtain this esteem, and that is, by establishing a good name, a virtuous reputation! However it may be among other nations, in this our enlightened land, no man can secure the respect of society, no man can gain the confidence of the great mass of the people and enjoy the honors which they are capable of bestowing, who is generally known to be addicted to vicious and immoral habits. So well is this fact understood by politicians, that their great effort is to conceal the moral defects of their candidates as far as possible, and magnify and emblazon their virtues and their good deeds before the people—well knowing that, in a virtuous community, the most brilliant talents can not atone for a lack of integrity and virtue! Hence, whoever is ambitious to rise in the world—whoever would obtain the confidence and the applause of the people, must build his hopes upon the firm foundation of a well established reputation, or he is doomed to a most bitter and wretched disappointment. Those who would have their presence in the business mart or the private residence, in the public assembly or the social circle, always greeted with a smile of approbation, rather than with a coldness or a frown which indicates that their absence is more agreeable than their presence, must remember that these tokens of respect are not granted indiscriminately by mankind, but are bestowed only upon those who have a reputation unstained by wickedness.

The influence of a good reputation in business transactions, is of immense value. That a fair, upright and honest course of dealing, is the safest and best in every possible point of view, is universally acknowledged. He who pursues it faithfully, without allowing any temptation of supposed gain or anticipated happiness, to allure him from a straight forward course, is a wise man, indeed. He secures the confidence and patronage of society—two requisites which are indispensible to success in every occupation and calling. If he is prosperous in business, it affords general satisfaction to all with whom he has intercourse—If misfortune overtakes him, every honorable man is ready to aid in retrieving his losses and in placing his affairs in a more prosperous train. But whether prosperity attends him or not, he possesses that which is of more value than all the wealth of the world—a spotless reputation, the respect of his fellow-beings, and a conscience which whispers peace to his heart! But let any other than an honest and honorable course be pursued, and he who is guilty of it, must stem the tide of universal disapprobation from God and man, and his own conscience. And well that it is so; for what would be the state of society, were fraud and chicanery to receive the public countenance and approbation? There is a tacit understanding upon this subject throughout the whole civilized world—every where, dishonesty is rebuked and condemned. Even the vicious themselves will join in denouncing any palpable violation of integrity, in which they are not personally interested. Now there are many people well aware of these things—well aware that dishonesty is opposed to the law of God and of man, and to their own sense of right—who still most strangely allow the supposition to linger in their minds, that if they can very secretly and artfully take advantage of the ignorance or credulity of those with whom they deal, they can materially benefit themselves and avoid all detection. To this inclination they will perhaps give way in some trifling matters. One dishonest act begets the desire and paves the way for another—the love of unlawful gain constantly increases by gratification, and more and more gains an influence over them, by deadening the moral sensibilities and perceptions—they launch deeper and still deeper, into the vortex of corruption—until at length, some act more barefaced than the rest, opens the eyes of the whole community to their character, and in a moment they find themselves standing upon the crumbling verge of ruin, degradation and despair! Is this an over-drawn picture? Alas! would that it were! But too well is it known that our country is full of melancholy instances which exemplify the literal truth of this representation. When the career of dishonesty is not pursued in this extreme—when a man continues to take but a trifling advantage, very cautiously as he supposes, whenever opportunity offers, and does not venture to any deep step in guilt—still it is a career which must inevitably result disastrously to his interests and character. He can not long pursue this course without being detected by those who deal with him. And when once his customers learn that they have been systematically imposed upon and defrauded—when they ascertain that it has been his constant object to obtain as much of their money, not as honesty, but as opportunity, allowed—their dealings with him immediately cease; whatever business prosperity he may have had, is at an end; he is shunned as one not to be trusted, and dishonesty is branded upon his character in letters so broad and deep, that years of after rectitude will hardly suffice to obliterate them!

When we view this subject by the light of religion and experience, what recklessness, what utter folly, do we behold in the conduct of thousands! God has solemnly declared "the way of the transgressor is hard." But the transgressor virtually exclaims—"I will make my way of sin easy and pleasant." And who art thou, vain worm of the dust, that repliest against Jehovah, thy Creator? The moment an individual deliberately sets out on a career of dishonesty and crime, he commences an actual controversy (if the term may be allowed) with Omnipotence—the vain mortal endeavoring with his poor wisdom to counteract and overreach the infinite and unerring wisdom of Heaven, and to find happiness where Deity has determined he shall find misery! And can any mortal possessing the least discernment, inquire the result of this controversy? Let him behold that body suspended from the gibbet, an awful spectacle, upon which thousands are gazing, and he will read the answer to his inquiry!—Or let him enter the massive walls of the numerous prisons throughout the land—those modern Gehennas which are crowded with the degraded victims of sin—and in the deep lineaments of gloom, and wretchedness, and despair, engraven upon their features, he will behold a solution to his question, and a convincing evidence of the truth of Heaven's declaration—"the way of the transgressor is hard!"

Every husband and father is morally bound, by the intimate connection which unites him to his wife and children, to establish and maintain a good reputation. Such are the customs of society, that the reputation of a man, whether good or bad, is shared to no small extent, by his family. I do not say this should be so—indeed, it should not be—but that it is so, is indisputable. When the husband maintains a good character, he is admitted into respectable society, and his family enjoy this privilege with him. But let the husband be stigmatized with a bad reputation, and although the family, when possessing great merit, may still be admitted into respectable circles, yet they can not occupy that station, nor receive those attentions, which they would under other circumstances—and they themselves, are weighed down with a consciousness that there is a taint upon their very name, which they have no power to remove. Who have not had their hearts pained by beholding the crimson blush of shame suffuse the cheek of the pure-hearted wife, or the young and innocent daughter, when the name of an unworthy husband or father has been pronounced in company, or when allusion was made to some vice to which it was well known he was addicted? How cruelly wretched is such a condition! Husband! would you have your companion, your children, blessed with the consciousness of having a guardian and protector who is worthy of their respect and love?—would you have them occupy an honorable rank and move in respectable classes in society? In no way can you aid them so effectually in securing these privileges, as by throwing around them the influences of a good reputation of your own. As you value their respectability and peace, as you prize your own standing, prosperity, and happiness, through life, see to it, that you lay the foundation for all these blessings, in a well established reputation for virtue, integrity and benevolence.

How is a good reputation to be obtained? It can not be inherited like an estate. The honorable name of a parent, may aid a young man, to a certain extent, in obtaining confidence and respect; but it can not long screen him from the odium of unjust and dishonorable conduct. A virtuous reputation can not be purchased by riches. Wealth is not virtue, neither is it honor, or goodness. Would that many of its possessors were not so frequently found exhibiting traits of character directly in opposition to these principles! The riches of a Crœsus can not avert the deep condemnation which is pronounced by every virtuous community, against iniquity and corruption. A good reputation can not be surreptitiously secured by empty professions, or by an outward show of virtue and piety. An appearance of propriety is easily put on, and a cloak of hypocrisy, may, for a season, conceal the workings of a wicked heart. But whoever supposes that he can go on from year to year, through life, safely executing schemes of iniquity under this disguise, gives himself credit for more wisdom and skill than he actually possesses, and attributes more stupidity and blindness to those with whom he has intercourse, than they would be willing to assume. The deception, in due time, will be removed—the "sheep's clothing" will be stripped off, and the wolf, in all his moral obliquity, will stand revealed to the world! How many melancholy instances of the truth of these remarks, have been furnished within a few years, and by some too, who have desecrated even the sacred office by their moral pollutions! But they have met their just reward. So true are the words of Fletcher—

> "Our acts our angels are, or good or ill,
> The fatal shadows that walk by us still."

There is but one manner in which a good reputation can be secured—it must be acquired by individual exertion—it must be wrought out by every one who would enjoy it, in faithful perseverance and untiring assiduity. This, like many other desirable blessings in life, is placed before men to inspire their higher and better nature with activity—to draw out and develope those noble and heavenly characteristics which constitute the moral image of God within us—and to be the reward of all those who faithfully practice in all respects, the Saviour's "golden rule." It is in vain to hope for, and sigh after, this reward, without adequate exertions. It must be toiled for, with care, and diligence, and watchfulness—it must be won by manly exertion in the broad, open field of active life—by a vigorous and successful warfare against all those temptations and allurements which beset the pathway of life. A desirable reputation was never secured "by lucky chance!" And he who waits for fortune to throw him such a prize, will be compelled to exercise for a long time, one virtue at least—patience! As the industrious ant raises its mimic mountain by diligently heaping mite upon mite, so must every man rear the superstructure of a good character, by a long and unwavering succession of kind, virtuous and honorable actions! The Creator has wisely ordained that every man shall reap as he sows. If he sows integrity, honesty, goodness, love to God and man, he shall without fail, in due time, reap honor, respectability, the confidence of his fellowmen, and the indwelling sunshine of an approving conscience. But if he prefers to sow falsehood, deceit, and the various species of dishonesty and immorality, he will as surely be compelled to gather a harvest of ignominy, disgrace, ruin and wretchedness! It requires but one discerning glance at the world, to perceive that these just laws of Heaven, are in constant and unswerving operation throughout all ranks in society. He who is wise, will be admonished by the disappointments, the failures, the wretchedness of others, to be cautious and sow as he desires to reap.

GIVING THANKS.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

We design in the present article, to correct some errors, existing in the Christian community, in reference to the religious service usually performed at table. It is not to discourage this service, the reader will understand, but to correct some errors respecting it.

I. It is customary with some Christians, to perform two services, one before eating, which they call "asking a blessing," and another after eating, which is called "giving thanks." The different names which they give to these services, show that they regard them as different in nature. Hence they perform what they conceive to be two different services. This they should not do, if they mean to be regulated by scriptural usage. In Scripture but one service is usually named, and, probably, but one, in general, was performed. In those passages where two services are mentioned, it is evident that they were not regarded as different, but the same in nature. Let the following passages be considered.—In Mark viii: 6, 7, we read—"And he commanded the people to sit down on the ground: and he took the seven loaves and gave thanks (eucharisteo) and brake; and gave to his disciples to set before them; and they did set them before the people. And they had a few small fishes; and he blessed (eulogeo) and commanded to set them also before them."

Here it would seem that two services were performed, and they are designated by two different terms; but that these services were not different in nature, is evident from the passage itself, and will be made still more obvious before closing our remarks. The act of blessing, last mentioned, has the same relation to the fishes, that the giving of thanks has to the loaves; and both were performed before the food was received.—This certainly can have no connection with the practice of those Christians who ask a blessing before, and return thanks after eating, and in reference to the same food.

Again, in Matt. xxvi: 26, 27, we read as follows—"And as they were eating, Jesus took bread and blessed, and brake, and gave to his disciples, and said, take eat, this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave to them, saying, drink ye all, of it." I have omitted the word it, in this passage, because it has no right to a place here. It was inserted by the translators, and perverts the sense. From this language it appears that two services were performed, but of the same nature, and entirely different from the two which we have referred to as being performed by some Christians. Compare with the above passage, Mark xiv: 22, 23; Luke xxii: 19, 20, and 1 Cor. xi: 24, 25.

Now we would say, that if Christians consider the example of Jesus Christ, as presented in these passages, as binding upon them, it is their duty to imitate him in full; and if they perform two services at table, to perform them as the same in nature, and to designate them either by the same term, or by those that are similar in signification, and will bear the same construction—and also that they perform these services in the manner in which our Saviour performed them, not the one before and the other after eating, but both before the reception of the food to which they relate.

II. In general, professing Christians deem it binding upon them to perform but one service at the table, and this before eating. This we think is as it should be; for in several passages but one service is spoken of.—See John vi: 11, 23; Acts xxvii: 35; Rom. xiv: 6. But this service they designate by an expression altogether inappropriate. They call it "asking a blessing," which is not justified either by propriety or Scripture. First, propriety is against it. We have the blessing before us. We need not ask for it, we have it. God has been pleased to bestow it upon us, and now he demands our gratitude, not our prayers, for it. If I were seated by a table having nothing but empty dishes, there might be a propriety in asking a blessing; but when I am placed before a table laden with the bounties of an indulgent Providence, ready for my reception, I deem it a manifest impropriety to ask a blessing—or rather, I deem it improper to call the expression of our gratitude on such occasions, asking a blessing. This service should be called giving thanks. This expression is sanctioned by the fact that disproves the other. We have the blessing, and this is the reason we should not ask it; but it is also a reason why we should give thanks for it. We should ask for blessings we do not possess, and should give thanks for those we have.

Second: The expression "asking a blessing," as relating to this ceremony, is unscriptural. True, the word bless is used, but it does not signify to ask a blessing. It signifies to bless God, or in other words, to give thanks to God for the favors he has conferred upon us. We frequently use the word in the same sense.

It has been the opinion of some learned men, that the word bless, (eulogeo,) when used in reference to the loaves and fishes, by which the multitude in the wilderness were miraculously fed by our Saviour, means to multiply or increase the quantity of the food. But this opinion is wholly without foundation. True, the loaves and fishes were multiplied, so as to supply the wants of a vast multitude; but the term bless has evidently nothing to do with this fact. It was used in reference to the last Supper, (see the passages already referred to,) where it will not, I presume, be pretended that the bread and wine were multiplied, or changed from what they were before.

In all those passages which speak of the Lord's Supper, it is used as synonimous with giving thanks, (eucharisteo.) Matthew and Mark use the word bless in reference to the bread, and the phrase give thanks, in reference to the wine.—Luke and Paul use the latter expression in reference to the bread, and do not name any service relating to the wine. Mark speaks of our Saviour giving thanks, in respect to the loaves, but says he blessed and brake the fishes. So that no one can help seeing that the two terms, eulogeo and eucharisteo, in those passages that relate to the service of which we are speaking, are perfectly synonimous. Neither of them signifies to ask a blessing, but both mean to give thanks. If the question is asked, why are we told that our Saviour "blessed and brake," as though both these terms related to the same object, the answer is—that the language was perfectly intelligible to those who used it, and to those who lived at that time; and no one then understood it to denote that the food was blessed. It was God that was the object of the term bless. Our Saviour blessed God, and broke the food. The reason why the word God is not supplied, is, that it is understood, and did not require to be expressed, as every body knew what was intended. When we use the expression, ask a blessing, why do we not add, of God? and when we speak of giving thanks, why do we not add, to God? The reason is plain, and so it is in relation to the term bless, in the phrase under consideration.

III. Another error in relation to this subject, is the opinion that a service at the table, is a Christian duty—a duty absolutely binding upon all professors of the Christian religion.

Perhaps in calling this an error, we may have erred ourselves. If so, may we be enlightened by those who are wiser than we are.

The reasons which induce us to believe that the Christian religion does not impose this service upon us as a duty, are the following:—

1. It did not originate with the Christian religion. It had existed in the world from time immemorial, before Christianity was introduced.—The Jews performed this service, and our Saviour and his disciples, as Jews, performed it likewise. Hence it is to Judaism, and not to Christianity, that we are to look for the original injunction to attend to this ceremony. If Christianity recognises it as a duty, it certainly lays no claim, and can lay none, to having first imposed it.

2. If this service be a duty enjoined upon us, the question arises, how shall it be performed? Several passages of Scripture speak of but one service—several others mention two services, and one passage, at least, (Luke xxii: 17, 19, 20,) speaks of three services. These passages we have already either quoted or referred to, and need not refer to them again. Let the reader consider them, and ask himself which he shall take as his guide. Will you give thanks once, or twice, or three times? If the service be a Christian duty, it is important that it be performed in the manner sanctioned by the great Teacher of our religion.

3. We find no injunction among the precepts of Jesus Christ, relating to this service. We have examined the Scriptures with a good deal of care, to ascertain our duty in relation to this subject, but can find nothing to assure us that it ought to be performed as a Christian duty. And we are unwilling to receive as a part of Christianity, either in doctrine or precept, what can not be found in that religious system. If it be said that the example of our Saviour is sufficient to make this service binding upon us, we reply, that this would make some other duties binding upon us, which few professing Christians would be willing to perform. It would make it necessary that we attend to most (and may I not say all?) of the ceremonies of the Jewish religion. Our Saviour lived among the Jews; he accordingly observed the customs and ceremonies of the Jews. But the Jews are now destroyed: their religion is no more. Its ceremonies can not, therefore, be binding upon us, either by its own authority, or the mere example of Jesus Christ.

We said, at the commencement of this article, that it was not our intention to discourage the practice of a religious service at the table. We say so now. We approve of this practice. We would have it perpetuated. But we would have Christians understand why they do it, and then we would have it done in a proper manner. The only reason why it should be done, is to be found in its utility. If it be useful, let it be attended to; and if any individual supposes that in his case, (whatever he may think of others,) it is not useful, let him omit it; and let no man call him an infidel for so doing. When it is done, it should be called giving thanks, (at least in my opinion,) and should be performed before eating. This, I think, is sanctioned by propriety, saying nothing of the example of Jesus Christ.

DEDICATION IN McDONOUGH.

On Thursday, October 24th, the new union meeting-house recently erected in the Baldwin Settlement, McDonough, Chenango county, was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. The following services were held:—

1. Voluntary, by the choir. 2. Reading select Scriptures, by Rev. Mr. Bolles. 3. Voluntary. 4. Introductory prayer, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich. 5. Hymn. 6. Sermon, by Elder Russel, (Open Communion Baptist,) 1 Kings vii: 25. 7. Voluntary. 8. Sermon, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, (Universalist,) Ps. xxxvi: 8. 9. Voluntary. 10. Sermon, by Rev. Mr. Bolles, (Presbyterian,) 2 Chron. vi: 18, first clause. 11. Hymn. 12. Dedicatory prayer, by Elder Russel. 13. Voluntary. 14. Benediction, by Elder Stere.

The weather was delightful, the travelling good, the singing excellent, and the congregation large and attentive. The slips, aisles, gallery, entry and pulpit stairs were all literally thronged.—And though this vast assemblage was composed of almost all denominations, and the services lasted without intermission between four and five hours, yet they were apparently listened to with the deepest interest, and received by all with perfect satisfaction. Six or seven Open Communion Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist clergymen were present, and expressed themselves both instructed and pleased with all they heard. The writer was the only Universalist preacher in attendance. On the whole, we think the instruction imparted was well calculated to promote real piety. The sermons of Brs. Russel and Bolles were excellent, both in matter and spirit, and well adapted to the occasion. It was expected that a Universalist would preach in the evening, but as I was otherwise engaged, and had failed in securing the attendance of any ministering brother, it devolved upon Elder Russel to give the discourse, in which, it is said, he manifested the spirit of his Lord and Master. Contending, as we in this section are compelled to do, against a bitter and oftentimes reckless opposition, we rejoice that we are able to record some evidence of a redeeming spirit, and that among the Partialist denominations, there are those who are less anxious to increase the number of their sects than to advance pure and undefiled religion.

The house is built of wood, 34 by 44 feet, and surmounted by a handsome tower. It is pleasantly and conveniently located, and neatly finished, and contains a basement story, which is occupied as a school room, and is also well calculated to accommodate a small congregation.

We believe the Baptists are entitled to the house near one-half of the time, the Universalists to the same, and the Presbyterians the remainder. It is free for any denomination, at any time, when not occupied by the owners.

Long may this edifice remain a living witness of the zeal and liberality of its proprietors, and may the same spirit which characterized the dedicatory services, ever be exercised within its consecrated walls. And when it shall crumble into dust—when it shall be numbered with the things that have been, but are not, may future generations erect altars there, and our Father in heaven be worshipped in spirit and in truth.

CONFERENCE AT PENFIELD.

Br. Grosh—Agreeable to previous appointment, we held the first quarterly Conference of the Ontario Association, for the present year, on the 16th and 17th of October, 1839, in the Methodist chapel in North Penfield. Six preachers were present, to wit—Brs. Miles, Whitcomb, J. M. Cook, Queal, Spaulding and Chase. Six discourses were delivered on the occasion, by Brs. Queal, Cook, Whitcomb and Chase. The congregations were thin in the morning and afternoon of the first day, but as large as could be rationally expected in the evening and on the second day.—Our friends in Penfield, though not numerous, are respectable and persevering. Br. Miles labors with them faithfully one-fourth of the time, and, I believe, to good acceptance. May they prove faithful stewards of the riches of Divine Grace, that they may increase in numbers and in graces.

Brother, I am sorry to say that Universalism, in many places around us, is not in as prosperous a state as we could wish. There is, from some cause or other, a lamentable degree of coldness and indifference among many of our professed friends. I fear that a love of the world, with its charms and deceptions, is drawing off the minds of many of our brethren from the inestimable riches and enjoyments of Christian truth and obedience. I fear that such do not realize the importance of that practical zeal which is according to true knowledge, and that commendable perseverance, which insures success in our moral enterprise. Brethren, one and all, let us wake up, gird on the Christian armor, and do our duty.

TO THE FRIENDS IN MICHIGAN.

The following notice is designed for the information of such of our friends as reside in that part of Michigan where I have travelled and preached during the past year.

I promised some of them to publish an account of my tour, in the Magazine and Advocate. It was my honest intention so to do. My excuse for not having done it, is this.—Since my return home I have been almost blind: I have not been able to write or read. My eyes are now a very little better, but I can hardly see to write a word now. I trust, therefore, that I shall be excused without being charged with neglect.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER XV.

Isaiah xxxiv: 4—"And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll," etc.

The Hebrew poets, to express happiness, prosperity, the instauration and advancement of states, kingdoms and potentates, make use of images taken from the most striking parts of nature; from the sun, moon and stars, which they describe as shining with increased splendor, and never setting; the moon becomes like the meridian sun, and the sun's light is augmented seven-fold. See Isa. xxx: 26, and lxv: 17. Here new heavens and a new earth are created, and a brighter age commences.

On the contrary, the overthrow and destruction of kingdoms, is represented by opposite images: the stars are obscured, the moon withdraws her light, and the sun shines no more; the earth quakes and the heavens tremble, and all things seem tending to their original chaos. See Joel ii: 10, and iii: 15, 16; Amos viii: 9; Matt. xxiv: 29, and Isa. xxxiv: 4. See, also, Bishop Lowth's translation of Isaiah, and his notes thereon, and Sir Isaac Newton's Observations on the Prophecies, part 1st, chap. 2d, and Bishop Thomas Newton's Dissertation on the Prophecies.

Sir Isaac Newton says—The figurative language of the prophets, is taken from the analogy of the world natural, and an empire or kingdom considered as a world politic. Accordingly the whole world natural, consisting of heaven and earth, signifies the whole world politic, consisting of thrones and people, or so much of it as is considered in prophecy; and the things in that world signify the analagous things in this. For the heavens and the things therein, signify thrones and dignities, and those who enjoy them; and the earth, with the things thereon, the inferior people; and the lowest parts of the earth, called sheol, hades, or hell, the lowest or most miserable parts of them. Great earthquakes, and the shaking of earth and heaven, are put for the shaking of kingdoms, so as to distract and overthrow them; the creating a new heaven and new earth, and the passing of an old one, or the beginning and end of a world or age, for the rise and ruin of a body politic, signified thereby. The sun, for the whole species and race of kings, in the kingdoms of the world politic; the moon for the body of the common people, considered as the king's wife; the stars for the subordinate princes and great men, or for bishops and rulers of the people of God, when the sun is Christ.—Setting of the sun, moon and stars, darkening the sun, turning the moon into blood, and falling of the stars, are expressions which signify the falling of a kingdom.

From the above it appears, that in the figurative language of the prophets—

Heaven, and the things therein, signifies thrones and dignities, and those who enjoy them here on earth.

The earth, with the things thereon, signifies the inferior people.

The lowest part of the earth, called sheol, hades, or hell, signifies the lowest or most miserable part of the people.

Great earthquakes, and the shaking of heaven and earth, signify the shaking of kingdoms.

Creating a new heaven and earth, signify the rise of a new kingdom, or body politic.

The passing away of an old heaven and earth, signify the ruin, overthrow or destruction of a government or kingdom.

The sun, signifies the race of kings, and sometimes Jesus Christ.

The moon, signifies the body of the common people.

The stars, signify princes and great men; and when Christ is represented by the sun, the stars signify bishops, priests or rulers.

TOUR—AND DEDICATION AT PROMPTON.

Br. Grosh—Having an engagement to attend the dedication of the new Universalist church in the above mentioned place, I left home on Saturday previous, August 17th, and proceeded to Marathon, to attend my regular appointment for the next day, glad to meet as usual, a large and respectable congregation of devout and attentive hearers. I had labored in this place one quarter of the time for a year, ending in February last, and, after a few months interval yielded to their solicitations to renew my engagement; and I was the more ready to do this, because of their zeal for the cause, and because we have many worthy and intelligent friends there, whose kindness and liberality to me, will long be remembered with gratitude. As often as I start for Marathon, I feel as if I were going home; and when there, I enjoy a degree of ease and freedom, not experienced at all times. This is doubtless owing, in part, to the fact, that our friends there love the cause of Universalism for its own sake, and not merely for the sake of opposition to other sects; and to the pleasure which they seem to feel in attending public worship.

This, Br. Grosh will say, is as it should be.—Every society should thus encourage their preacher, and where such a state of things prevails, prosperity must ever attend the efforts that are made.

Having lodged for the night under the hospitable roof of our social and intelligent friend, Comstock, I proceeded, on Monday, to Binghamton, and called on our esteemed and indefatigable Br. O. Bradford. Long and arduously has this brother labored to establish regular and permanent preaching in the flourishing village of Binghamton, and I trust there is too much stamina among our independent and high-minded farmers in that region, many of whom are staunch friends to the cause, to give up the case as hopeless.

Tuesday morning took stage, and on stopping to dine at Sweet's Inn, about 50 miles from Binghamton, saw a Universalist Almanac hanging by the looking-glass in the dining-room, and concluded they must of course be Universalists; and on further inquiry, soon learned they were so in very deed. They made me welcome, both going and returning, and reminded me of what I had not as yet observed, that I had been there before, some six years ago. I was happy to learn that they were about taking measures to build a meeting-house in that place, under very flattering prospects of success.

From this place, proceeding on my way, I arrived in Bethany, just in time to be conveyed to Prompton, Wayne county, Pa., in season to attend the services of the joyful occasion. As there are no ministering brethren located very near the place, I was apprehensive I should have to tread the wine press alone, but in this was happily disappointed on being joined by our faithful brother, Bartholomew, who assisted in the services. The day was fine—and though we cannot say, as is usual on such occasions, that the house was crowded in every part at an early hour,* yet the congregation was respectable even for numbers, the house being well filled, and especially for character and intelligence, if we may judge from the order and decorum that prevailed throughout the house. Order of services as follows:—

1. Hymn, by the choir. 2. Reading of Scriptures, by Br. Bullard. 3. Hymn, by the choir. 4. Prayer, by Br. Bartholomew. 5. Hymn, by the choir. 6. Sermon, by Br. Bullard. 7. Select piece, by the choir. 8. Remarks, by Br. Bartholomew. Concluded by hymn, and benediction by Br. Bullard. Services were also performed in the afternoon, by the writer. The house at Prompton, is neither large nor expensive, though finished in a neat modern style, with a singing-gallery across the front end, and the pulpit in the rear. It is in every respect adapted to the accommodation of those who statedly worship there; and best of all, the house being nearly paid for, they are now able, and even desirous to hire a preacher. I was urged to settle with them, but could give them no encouragement for the present, other than to visit them once or twice between this and Spring. It is, perhaps, generally known that this portion of our Master's vineyard, has been occupied by our young and worthy Br. Landers, for the last two or three years; and judging from what I saw and heard, I should think his labors had been abundantly blest, and that he was a very excellent and worthy brother. To conclude, we lectured on Thursday evening, at Germanville—on Friday evening, at Bethany, in the court-house, to good congregations—much larger at Bethany than was expected, there being many in attendance who seldom, if ever, attended before—and we can but hope a favorable impression was made. We remained and preached on Sunday again, at the meeting-house at Prompton, forenoon and afternoon; lectured at Honesdale in the evening, to an unusually large and attentive congregation for that place, much to the encouragement of our friends there, and the next day proceeded on my journey homeward, where, by the blessing of God, I found my family in usual health and spirits.

*The congregation would have been much larger, but for the shortness of the notice, which came to hand but three or four days before the time.

Addresses by Br. C. S. Brown. I think I can say in truth, that we had an interesting and profitable meeting. We had a crowded and attentive congregation—a spirit of good will to all was inculcated in the discourses, and a reciprocal feeling was manifested in return by their not forgetting the wants of the preacher; and what is better than all the rest, the blessing of Heaven rested upon us. Our faithful and worthy Br. Bartholomew labors in this region to good acceptance.

CONFERENCE AT TYLERSVILLE.

By appointment of the Black River Association, a public Conference was held at Tylersville, Jefferson county, September 18th. A Moderator, Clerk, and committee of arrangements were chosen, and the following resolutions passed, viz:—

Whereas, Br. H. L. Hayward, now of Champion, a young brother of unblemished and excellent moral character, and good ministerial qualifications, has preached several months within our limits to very good acceptance, now asks our fellowship, therefore,

Resolved, That the only reason why we do not grant such letter, is, because this Council can not do it without an assumption of power, inasmuch as it is composed, not of delegates appointed by our societies, but of brethren present without such appointment.

Resolved, That we recommend to our several societies to send delegates to our quarterly Conferences as well as to the annual meetings of this Association.

Three sermons were preached to a goodly number of devout and attentive hearers, whose cup of spiritual joy seemed to increase to overflowing; and after the evening sermon, liberty was given for any to speak for the furtherance of the Gospel; and it was very gratifying to hear the venerable believer in the unbounded grace of God, who had enjoyed its blessed consolations for fifty years, and shown its power and influence in life, calmly and earnestly recommend it to others: and particularly satisfactory to hear a very intelligent and worthy member of the Baptist church, who had listened to the services of the day, clearly and forcibly plead the vital importance of religion; respectfully dissent from the doctrines he had heard, without any attempt to controvert them, and treat all present in the most charitable and candid manner. Such things will do good, by doing away hurtful prejudices and extending the knowledge of the truth.

We were disappointed in the non-attendance of several ministering brethren, and members of societies in that vicinity, who were expected, but the excellence of a religious meeting does not depend on its numbers. The spirit of the Lord was there, and our hearts were made glad in his holy name. Consistency seems to require, either that delegates be sent to our Conferences, or that no Council be formed. May the Lord grant wisdom to direct in all duty. Per order, P. Morse.

DEDICATION AT POTSDAM.

On Thursday, September 19th, the Universalist meeting-house in Potsdam, St. Lawrence county, was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. The order of the services were as follows—1. Volnntary by the Choir. 2. Invocation by Br. W. H. Waggoner. 3. Hymn. 4. Reading select Scriptures by Br. H. L. Hayward. 5. Hymn. 6. Dedicatory sermon by Br. W. H. Waggoner. 7. Dedicatory prayer by Br. F. J. Briggs. 8. Hymn. 9. Benediction by Br. W. M. Fuller.

A second discourse was also delivered by the writer in the afternoon, and another by Br. Hayward in the evening. The day was pleasant, the congregations quite large, and every thing conspired to render it a season of much interest and joy. The house is built of wood, fifty-three by thirty-seven feet, is most beautifully situated, and with its high and well proportioned tower, makes a very imposing appearance. The friends in Potsdam, who have so faithfully persevered in the finishing of this house, deserve great praise for their exertions. Long and laborious was the struggle, and now it is their Father's good will to give them the kingdom. Their house is all paid for, and now they wish to engage an energetic and vigilant preacher. The Lord grant them this much needed blessing, and smile upon their endeavors to worship him in spirit and in truth. W. H. W.

A WORD FROM AN OLD FRIEND.

TO THE READERS AND PATRONS OF THIS PAPER.

It is with no ordinary emotions, and not without feelings of the deepest mortification and regret that I appear at this time before the readers and patrons of this paper, on the subject of the present communication. With this establishment I have been intimately acquainted from its commencement, and until recently constantly connected with it. Years did I toil without any pecuniary compensation whatever, for its permanent establishment and the prosperity of that blessed cause in which it is engaged. Years and years have I labored and toiled, much of the time through the live-long day and until the midnight lamp grew dim, yea, many times till one, two, or three hours past midnight, to satisfy my patrons and faithfully discharge the editorial and publishing duties imposed upon me. After thus incessantly laboring for ten years, I fondly flattered myself this paper was established on a firm and immovable foundation—that it would continue to flourish, not only bearing the glad tidings of peace, joy and salvation to its thousands of readers, but rewarding its faithful conductors with a reasonable remuneration for their toil, and affording them at least a competent living. Its subscription list was large, and, I thought, made up mostly of true and faithful friends—such friends indeed as would not prove faithless in time of need. But although there are some such friends still among its patrons—and may God bless them for their fidelity—yet alas! there are many, quite too many, who appear utterly unmindful of duty, and alike regardless of the calls of justice and honor. With still a very large subscription list—and indeed under existing circumstances the extent of circulation does but increase their embarrassments—with outstanding debts MORE THAN DOUBLY SUFFICIENT, if paid, to meet all their pecuniary engagements, the publishers find it impossible in these times to pay their debts, for paper and other absolute necessaries, and keep the publication going: And unless their debtors pay up their arrearages, and their professed patrons generally meet their subscriptions more promptly, they will be compelled to fail and to abandon the publication altogether! This is no false alarm, no idle pretence. It is a solemn, a deeply mortifying fact! And unless the needed aid, or rather the too long delayed justice—for they ask not mercy, but simple justice at the hands of their subscribers—come soon, very soon, it will come too late, if at all!

Universalists! patrons of this paper, one and all! my old and my own friends! for such I trust I may still call many of you, shall this call from your old friend and brother in behalf of the publishers of this paper, be in vain? Shall this paper go down, after having stood so long, "against the wiles of the adversary," and circulated so widely in spite of every effort of its enemies to destroy it? Its worst enemies having failed to overthrow or even to injure it, shall its professed friends now kill it outright, by their neglect? Shall the numerous and wide places it has filled for so many years in your families, your societies, your leisure hours, be by your unfaithfulness, your injustice, now and henceforth vacated, to become a desolate waste, a howling wilderness, and the places that once knew it, know it no more forever?—Friends! answer these questions to your consciences and your God! and answer them quickly.

Yours in truth and faithfulness,

D. Skinner.

BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATIONS....NO. IX.

"But wo unto that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed it had been good for that man if he had not been born!"

Matt. xxvi: 24.

[CONCLUDED.]

II. We shall consider the reasons why we suppose that Judas will be saved, in which consideration, we shall endeavor to keep strictly within the bounds of fact, presenting nothing upon conjecture or supposition, or that may not be founded in truth.

1. We have every evidence to believe that the character of Judas stood fair, until towards the close of the ministry of our Saviour. He was chosen as an apostle of Christ, which would not have been the case, had he then been a bad man. After Christ had selected the twelve apostles, Judas being one of them, "he gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of diseases," Matt. x: 1; and then sent them forth among the children of Israel. In Luke ix: 6, we are told that "they departed, and went through the towns, preaching the Gospel, and healing every where." In the 10th verse, of the same chapter, we are informed that the apostles told Jesus all they had done.

From these facts it is evident, that Judas was sent forth with the rest of the apostles, that he received the same power as they, that he taught the people and healed the sick, in common with them; which certainly would not have been permitted, had he been an iniquitous man. Nor have we the least intimation that his conduct was otherwise than good, until he consented to betray Jesus, with one exception, which took place a short time previous to the death of Christ, when a woman anointed the Saviour with a pound of costly ointment. Judas murmured at the waste, and inquired why it was not sold, and the proceeds given to the poor; not that he cared for the poor, but because he carried their little bag or box, and was a thief, or was in the habit of taking money from it. John xii. With this single exception, his character previously stood fair and his reputation good. And, though this fact does not remove his criminality in betraying his Lord, yet it forms an extenuating circumstance which makes in his favor, and shows that he was not long tried in crime. Had he long shown signs of villainy and wickedness, had his life been marked with foul blots of vitiated conduct; was it evident that he intended to procure the death of Christ, and without feeling, sold that life for a few pieces of silver, the matter would wear a different aspect. But the whole affair, the testimony of the evangelists, and the conduct of Judas when he saw the effect of his covetousness, plainly show that he was not schooled in crime and a continued course of wickedness. This fact certainly leads to the conclusion, that the case of Judas should be considered in a more favorable light, than though he was a long-tried criminal, and like the Pharisees, had sought the life of his Master with determined malice.

2. There is not the least intimation or evidence that Judas intended the death of Jesus. I can discover about the whole case, nothing on the part of Judas but excessive covetousness; for it appears to me, that he supposed he could get thirty pieces of silver, and still not the least harm come upon the Saviour. Judas had long been with Jesus, had seen him perform the mightiest works, had seen him escape many threatening dangers, and knew that on one particular occasion, when his foes threatened to cast him down from a precipice, he was saved from the danger. It is pretty evident that Judas did not dream of danger in the present instance. He wanted money; he knew that he could get it from the Pharisees, by consenting to betray his Master; that when he had put Christ into their hands, his part would be fulfilled, while he believed, when they attempted to take the life of Christ, he would use his great power, and escape from them, as in other instances. Thus, no harm would come to the Saviour, while he would obtain thirty pieces of silver.

That this view is correct, is rendered clear by the fact, that when Judas saw that the life of Jesus was in jeopardy, his covetousness forsook him, and he endeavored to liberate his Master by returning the thirty pieces of silver and declaring the innocence of Christ.

3. He exhibited the most genuine repentance for his crime. Suppose that an individual now, who had committed some great crime, should voluntarily come forward and confess it, and endeavor to make restitution, to redeem the evil which had grown out of his conduct; should we not affirm that he exhibited marks of sincere repentance? Yet Judas exhibited all these.

He covenanted with the Jews, to betray his Master into their hands for thirty pieces of silver. This was effected, and he received his money. But when he saw Christ in danger, when he saw death hang over his beloved Master, what did he do? "Then Judas which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, I have sinned, in that I have betrayed innocent blood. And they said, what is that to us? see thou to that. And he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and was choked." Matt. xxvii: 3, 4, 5. From this language it is evident, that Judas was sorry for his treachery, that he confessed his crime, that he returned the money, that he avowed the innocence of Jesus, and when he found that all this did not effect the liberation of Christ, his choking grief and the disorder which it produced, procured his death. This is genuine repentance; but whether we admit it to be so or not, it is purer coin than generally passes for repentance at the present day. We see individuals who have grown rich upon the spoils of others, simply saying that they are sorry, and then admitted to the church and communion as true penitents, without making restitution. We see murderers, when they cry and speak of sorrow, received as true penitents, and promised heaven even from the gallows. In neither of these instances, are half as many marks of true repentance exhibited, as in the case of Judas—for he endeavored by every means in his power, to remedy the evil he had brought about.

Besides, he feelingly lamented his crime and confessed his sin. If he be not forgiven, what shall we do with the assurance of the apostle, when he said, "if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." 1 John i: 9. This promise was certain—Judas complied with the conditions—and who will take it upon them to say, that Judas will not be forgiven?

4. Judas was not the worst among men: and why people should suppose that no forgiveness can be extended to Judas, when it was extended to individuals who were much worse than he, I can hardly account. The murderers of Christ were far more wicked than Judas.—They thirsted for the blood of Jesus, they employed false witnesses to condemn him, and even when assured by Judas that he had betrayed innocent blood, they took no notice of it, but persisted in executing their savage purpose, until it was gratified by seeing Christ nailed to the cross.

But Judas had no malice against his Master; he cherished no hatred; his crime was thoughtless covetousness. He confessed the innocence of his Master before the multitude, and proclaimed his own wicked guilt and shame most clearly, and with every indication of genuine sincerity. Yet pardon and salvation was preached to these murderers. In Acts iii: 14, 15, Peter expressly tells the Jews, who heard him speak, "But ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you; and killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses." Yet, in the same discourse, he said to those murderers—"Unto you first, God having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." verse 26. While we are told, that "the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith." Acts vi: 7. If then, pardon and forgiveness were extended to the murderers of our Lord, whose crime far exceeded that of Judas, how can any person suppose that Judas will not be forgiven, when he sincerely and truly repented? If God has promised forgiveness to the repentant, then there is every reason to to suppose that Judas is forgiven.

5. In the great plan of salvation, we find no special reservation made to exclude Judas from the provisions of Zion. Did we find any such reservation, then the matter would be clear and beyond the shadow of a doubt, that Judas is irrecoverably lost. For it would be inconsistent for Christ to come into the world with the express purpose of seeking and saving all the lost, when he positively knew that Judas was gone without remedy.

In the promises made to Abraham, that in his seed—whom Paul, in the 3d of Galatians, tells us is Christ—all the nations, families and kindreds of the earth shall be blessed—which blessing, Paul declares in the same chapter, is faith—no notification is given that Judas is to have no part in the blessing. On the contrary, we conclude, that as he did belong to a family and a nation of the earth, he also is embraced by the promise, and consequently will enjoy its blessings. In the certifications which are given us, that Christ died for all, tasted death for every man, gave himself as a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, and a ransom for all, no limitation is made; the sacrifice was positively for all; and Judas is one. Paul declares that God will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth. In the light of this affirmation, I would have it remembered, that Judas betrayed his Master long before Paul made this declaration. Consequently, if Judas is endlessly lost, Paul knew that fact as well as modern professors. If this was so, can it be supposed that Paul could declare that God willed all men to receive the truth, when, with his own power, he had determinedly fixed Judas in unceasing misery, where he never could enjoy the truth? If God had once willed that all men should be saved, he could not have done so after the destruction of Judas, for he can not will against positive knowledge. The expression of Paul, then, proves that Judas was included in the will of the Deity concerning a knowledge of the truth. In the 15th of 1st Corinthians, where we are assured that Christ shall subdue all things unto himself, no exception is made in the case of Judas—and when assured that God shall be all in all, it is not said that he shall be all in all except in the case of Judas. No, indeed, he is not out of the reach of the mercy of God, or the love of the Deity; for the same benevolent power which could reclaim Saul of Tarsus, can forgive a penitent Judas.

Thus, do we close the examination of this important subject. And we see, while there is no proof of the endless misery of Judas, that he did betray his Lord, that his punishment consisted in exquisite remorse, which caused his death, that as he exhibited a sincere repentance, as he comes under the power of Christ, so he will finally be saved and adopted as a child of God. This is the substance of the whole subject, and though it is a matter of deep regret that he became so covetous, yet it is rejoicing to the benevolent mind to believe that even he will taste the purity of obedience and the excellency of truth.

If what has been offered on this subject, be correct, (and whether correct or not, I leave for the reader to decide,) it must be seen that one proof of endless misery has been wrested from it. And if so, I am sure no benevolent mind can feel sorry; for the sentiment of endless misery is so terrible in its results, and involves such horrible pains, that, as its proofs are struck off one after another and shown to be weak, the mind must increase in joy; which position I must believe, until I can find men desiring and hoping endless misery to be true.

And, oh! my readers, would not your feelings be elevated even to the heavens, if the light should shine, and you be convinced that the melody of universal reconciliation shall finally prevail over the discord of sin and misery, and tune every mind to the praise of the Great Original? Would not the intellect thrill with pleasure, if it could perceive the hand of God wiping endless misery and total depravity from the tablets of faith, and in letters of light and love, printing on all nature and revelation, that God will destroy in the mountain of truth, "the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations," "that he will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall be taken away from off all the earth. for the Lord hath spoken it." Isa. xxv: 7, 8. What can be more exalting to the heart, than to believe that a period will arrive, when the veil of ignorance, paganism and error, which covers the mental eyes of the nations, shall be stripped off; when tyranny, vice and dishonesty, the rebuke of men, will be removed; when the tears of sorrow, of distress and pain shall be wiped from off every face; when death shall be swallowed up in the victory of the Lamb, and the whole human family be fixed like burning stars amid the pure knowledge and unfading joys of heaven!

This period must and will come in the fulness of time, if the plans of Jehovah shall be fulfilled, and the desires of the Saviour shall be accomplished; the tide of mental improvement will roll onward, until the secrets of nature, those vast and illimitable works which are now closed from the intellect, shall burst upon the mind, and its spontaneous praise shall be given in one chorus to Him, where divine love pours through the universe like a sea of glory.

Yes! and thank God, the time is fast rolling onward, when this noble truth will be generally believed and practiced. The work was commenced on the morning of the reformation, when the waters of investigation burst the barriers of state policy. Ever since that period, creeds have been shaking, and shaking they will finally flee like mist in the morning sun. As knowledge and good feeling have increased, opinion after opinion has been struck from partial belief, as contrary to the character of God. And depend upon it, the work once commenced, they will not, they can not stop short of the grace of God—they will not linger in a confined and partial stream of benevolence, but they will boldly steer for the unbounded ocean of divine love, as broad and as free as it is cheering and glorious. And instead of beholding on the throne of the universe, a being of like passions with themselves, they will fall down and worship Him who is good to all. G. W. M.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

The article by Br. Skinner, in another column, may well startle many of our friends—we hope it will, especially those who have been dreaming that all was going on well, (in despite of our frequent calls for aid,) without any payments on their part. But it may need a few words in explanation.

We purchased the establishment from Br. Skinner, four years ago, at a price we believed it would pay in six or seven years, besides the current expences. We had no capital of our own—our reliance was wholly on the subscribers to the paper. The first year more than realized our hopes and calculations. But ever since, instead of being able to pay the instalments of and interest on the purchase money, we have actually had to borrow, and run in debt to pay the current expences of the paper! Our bookstore, and other publications, aided us some; but not enough to make up the deficiency. We carefully examined our list, and year by year struck off those we deemed dead weights, but still we could not bring our expences within our actual receipts. We dunned, we entreated, we begged our subscribers to be more prompt in payment—the great mass heeded us not, and others complained that we dunned too much! And now, at the end of four years, with a list of nearly 7000 subscribers, we have outstanding on subscriptions, considerably upwards of $20,000, and are yet suffering weekly and daily for the want of means to carry on the paper, and to pay debts contracted in publishing it!

Under these circumstances, we are compelled (for if our subscribers do not, very soon, attend to our wants, we must wind up our affairs, sue every debtor, to save ourselves from being sued and ruined)—we are compelled to expose our situation thus, in a last appeal to the honor, honesty, generosity and justice of our subscribers. The establishment is abundantly able, if its subscribers will only do their duty; and if they will not, the sooner it is abandoned, and its affairs wound up, the better for all parties. What say our debtors? Will they speedily pay us our due, and allow us to go on publishing the paper, and doing the immense good it is well calculated to effect in the world; or, must we abandon it, and use legal means to collect our hard earned dues, to the disgrace of all whose neglect drives us to this last resort? We hope—we fervently hope that a very few days will bring us the cheering tokens, that the paper will be sustained—that our subscribers, though hitherto careless and negligent, are not unjust nor ungenerous—and in this hope we issue our proposals for publishing at least another volume of the Magazine and Advocate. We send that proposal with the appeal of Br. Skinner, and this statement, that our agents and friends may know all our present sufferings, our wants, and the terms on which depend the future prospects of the paper. As there is owing to us, (besides stock on hand,) considerably more than double what we owe to others, we think there can be no danger of ultimate loss to any persons who pay in advance for future volumes, even should those volumes not be published. But such is still our confidence in our debtors, that we can not believe they will neglect this appeal—and if they do not, not only the next volume, but, we trust, many volumes after it, will see the light, and do their proper amount of good to the world.

GROSH & HUTCHINSON.

DISTRICT SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

The New-Yorker, in speaking of the fact that "from one-third to one-half of the districts" are still wholly unsupplied with Libraries, makes the following judicious remarks.

"We regret this delinquency on several accounts.—In the first place, the districts which neglect to supply themselves with Libraries, whon they may be obtained at so trifling a cost to them compared with their value, will generally be those that need them most. Again—we apprehend that many of them must have neglected to procure their libraries, in the mistaken belief that the State appropriation thus left undrawn may be obtained next year, when it will amount to sufficient for the purchase of a library. This is expressly negatived by the law, which provides that, whenever a district shall neglect to appropriate during the year its share of public money to the purpose for which it is designed, such money shall be forfeited and revert to the State again. Every district, therefore, which neglects to procure a library, is simply and most insanely throwing away its portion of the Library fund."

Is this fact understood? If not, let those having the matter in charge, be informed of it immediately, and urged to get a library forthwith—better get even works "not exactly as good as they should be," than none at all. Were it not for fear of giving false hopes, I would say that by the time this reaches our readers, we shall probably have a number of works of the Massachusetts Library on hand—but we havo been put off so often, that although promised us again, we fear to trust to the promises of publishers too confidently. A. B. G.

P. S. Since the above was in type, we have learned that the Massachusetts Library is on the way.

OUR PROSPECTUS.

Again we are obliged to rely on the kindness and zeal of our numerous and faithful co-laborers in the good cause—our local agents. We humbly solicit a continuance of their good deeds in behalf of this paper, by circulating our prospectus in their neighborhoods, and procuring for us all the good subscribers they can. Our best subscribers are those who pay in advance every year—we want more such—had it not been for them we must have failed long ago. Our next best subscribers are those who pay within the year—sometimes even in advance. These two classes we call good subscribers—and those who pay before the second year is up, for the former and then present volumes, and sometimes in advance for the next volume, may be set down as tolerable subscribers. Do not send us any who are careless whether they ever pay—for we would have to sue them some day, and do not desire such a job—we fear we have too many such on our list already. Do what you can for us, both in the way of collecting accounts and getting at least good subscribers; for we not only need money, but, as we have to cut off many who seem careless about paying us, it will require 2000 or 3000 new subscribers to keep our list good at its present number. This is a large draft, we know, and we fear it will not be filled up—but we think that if you and our zealous subscribers will use what exertions you can, we can begin the next year with a list of 6000 subscribers that will be worth more to us than our list of 8000, in 1838—for even 5000 advance paying subscribers would be far more profitable than that list was. What say you our friends—May we look for a list of 6000 subscribers, of whom a majority will pay in advance, and the rest within the year? We pause for a reply in deeds. G. and H.

REMEMBER,

All persons indebted for previous volumes, of whose responsibility we have not received some definite information, will have their papers discontinued at the close of this volume. The surest pledge of their responsibility, is, payment in full before the close of the volume.

Agents will please bear the above in mind, and make returns and reports long enough before the close of the volume, so that we may not strike off those who have paid, or who are responsible. And all such subscribers will remember, if mistakes are nevertheless made, that we will gladly correct all errors, on their being made known to us. G. & H.

POETRY.

From the London Weekly Despatch.

"GOOD BYE!"

Farewell! farewell! is often heard
From the lips of those who part,
'Tis a whispered tone—'tis a gentle word,
But it springs not from the heart.
It may serve for the lover's closing lay,
To be sung 'neath a summer's sky;
But give to me the lips that say
The honest words—"Good bye!"

Adieu! adieu! may greet the ear,
In the guise of courtly speech;
But when we leave the kind and dear,
'Tis not what the soul would teach.
Whene'er we grasp the hand of those
We would have forever nigh,
The flame of friendship bursts and glows
In the warm, frank words—"Good bye!"

The mother sending forth her child
To meet with cares and strife,
Breathes through her tears, her doubts and fears,
For the loved one's future life.
No cold "adieu," no "farewell" lives
Within her choking sigh;
But the deepest sob of anguish gives—
"God bless thee, boy! good bye!"

Go watch the pale and dying one,
When the glance has lost its beam—
When the world is cold as the marble stone,
And the brow a passing dream:
And the latest pressure of the hand,
The look of the closing eye,
Yield what the heart must understand,
A long—a last "Good bye!"

THE USE OF FLOWERS.

BY MARY HOWITT.

God might have made the earth bring forth
Enough for great and small,
The oak tree and the cedar tree,
Without a flower at all.

We might have had enough, enough,
For every want of ours,
For luxury, medicine, and toil,
And yet have had no flowers.

The ore within the mountain mine
Requireth room to grow;
Nor doth it need the lotus flower
To make the river flow.

The clouds might give abundant rain,
The nightly dews might fall,
And herb that keepeth life in man,
Might have drunk in them all.

Then, wherefore, wherefore were they made?
All dyed with rainbow light—
All fashioned for supremest grace—
Up springing day and night.

Springing in valleys green and low,
And on the mountains high,
And in the silent wilderness,
Where no man passeth by.

Our outward life requires them not—
Then, wherefore had they birth?
To minister delight to man—
To beautify the earth.

To comfort man—to whisper hope,
Whene'er his faith is dim,
For who so careth for the flowers,
Will much more care for Him!

SUPERSTITION OF THE HORSE SHOE.—[From "The Ladies' Gazette of Fashion."] The horse shoe was, of old, held to be of especial service as a security against the attacks of evil spirits. This virtue may have been assigned, perhaps, by the rule of contraries, from its being a thing incompatible with the cloven foot of the Evil One; or from the rude resemblance which the horse shoe bears to the rays of glory which, in ancient pictures, are made to surround the heads of saints and angels; or, finally, from some notion of its purity, acquired in passing through the fire. This latter superstition receives some countenance from the method resorted to for the cure of horses that had become vicious, or afflicted by any distemper which village farriery did not understand; such disease was invariably attributed to witchcraft, and the mode of cure seems to imply the belief that the imperfect purification by fire of the shoes which the animal wore, had afforded an inlet to malevolent influences. Accordingly, the horse was led into the smithy; the door was closed and barred; the shoes were taken off, and placed in the fire, and the witch or warlock was speedily under the necessity of removing the spell under which the animal suffered. We have a further proof that the efficacy of fire constituted a part of the virtues inherent in the manner of reclaiming bewitched milk. All who have the management of a dairy know that at certain seasons of the year butter will not "come" from cream, nor milk be converted into curd, with the same ease as at others. The modern reasoners on the causes of things look upon this as being occasioned by the sort of food the cattle take; but all the farmres' wives of the last century knew perfectly well that it was the effect of nothing else but some envious person's evil eye; and they took their measures accordingly. On the return of the milkmaids from the foaming with their milking pails upon their heads, when the foremost took down her vessel in order to pass under the doorway, the mistress was ready to drop a horse shoe heated red hot into the milk. It was necessary that the ceremony should be performed at the instant the young woman was lowering the pail; and it was further required that no one should be aware of the good dame's intention; the troop of milkmaids was often thrown into the utmost dismay by the sudden bubbling and hissing, and the screams of their companions more immediately concerned. The loss of the whole meal of milk was the usual consequence, to say nothing of the work created for the cooper by the crash of tumbling cogues; but these were matters of inferior importance, the future productiveness of the milk being an ample set off against lesser mischances; and that, it need scarcely be added, was invariably secured. A horse shoe was commonly nailed upon the doors of the cow house, but this was not at all sufficient protection, as in summer the cows were not driven home at night, but milked in a field, and shut up in an open enclosure. When people began to be half ashamed of the superstition, instead of nailing the horse shoe on the outside, they fixed it to the inside of the doors both of dwelling houses and farm houses; and in that situation it may to this day be detected in many parts of the country. Thus the devil, though not openly defied might come to burn his fingers if he were to attempt an entrance. The Chinese have their tombs built in the shape of the horse shoe, as we are informed by Captain Hall, in his voyage to Loo Choo; which custom is very curious, as it may be fairly regarded as a branch of the superstition prevalent among ourselves.

DEATHS.

In Boston, Mass., on the 3d inst., after a brief illness, Mrs. LUCY ANN TOMPKINS, wife of Br. Abel Tompkins. Publisher of the Universalist and Ladies' Repository, aged 23 years. Of a cheerful and amiable disposition, life to her was joy, and her friends were many—and to leave these, a fond husband to whom she had been united but fourteen months, and a tender babe, was no common trial for one so young and happy. And though she felt the pang, yet hers was a faith that overcometh the world, and her last words were, "I am willing to die—I am happy." May the consoling power of the same faith that thus supported her, be balm to the stricken hearts of her bereaved husband and many friends. A. B. G.

At Adrian, Mich., August 12th, HENRIETTE, daughter of Paul and Waty W. Taber, aged 22 years. Miss T. was a young woman for whom nature had done much. Her natural and acquired abilities were good. She was possessed of an amiable disposition. She was an understanding, practical Universalist. Her protracted and painful illness she endured with fortitude and Christian resignation. I called to see her on the day she died, and found her reconciled to the will of her heavenly Father. Indeed, she desired to depart and be with her Saviour. She desired me to attend her funeral, and selected the text for the occasion, found in Sam. iii: 31, 32. The funeral was held in the Baptist church on Tuesday afternoon, at which time a large congregation assembled—the Baptist clergyman, and many of the members of the church were present. There seemed to be but one common feeling through the whole congregation. I never preached to a more attentive audience. I sincerely believe that many of the Orthodox present were heartily glad of an opportunity to hear the Gospel preached in its purity. She has left a father, mother, and two sisters, together with many dear friends to mourn their loss. May God bless and comfort them. H. R.

August 17th, CLARKSON, son of Jeremiah and Eliza Jane Sabin, aged 2 years. The funeral was attended by the writer. H. R.

In Watertown, October 2d, of consumption, Mr. HORACE COOK, in the 38th year of his age. In the relations of a son and a brother, of a husband and father, of neighbor and citizen, Br. Cook was an ornament to human nature and to the Christian name. In his religious faith he was a steadfast Universalist, and in his case, another name is to be added to the long list of those who have found Universalism "good to live" by good on the bed of sickness, and inexpressibly "GOOD to die by." He conversed of death with the same calmness as on every day concerns, and though, like his Saviour he could pray that the cup of death might pass that he might live to sustain his beloved family, yet like him he was resigned to his heavenly Father's will, and uniformly affirmed that he was not afraid to die. He has left an amiable wife and three young sons, an aged father, two brothers and three sisters, who feel that their loss is irreparable, yet thanks be to God they mourn not without hope. The Lord in mercy support the widow and bless her dear orphan boys. Funeral services on the 4th inst. Sermon by J. FRENCH.

In Watervale, Pompey, August 5th, Mr. AMOS ABOTT, aged 72 years, Mr. A. was a believer in the doctrine of a world's salvation. May the doctrine which cheered him in health, sickness, and death, prove a source of comfort to the surviving relatives. Sermon by the writer, W. M. D.

In Oran, Pompey, September 30th, Mr. STEPHEN BRUNSON, aged 65 years. Though it was his fortune to be poor and to live in obscurity, yet he was rich in faith, and in the hour of dissolution he possessed that treasure, a firm trust in God, which proves to be of more value than worldly honors, silver or gold. Sermon by W. M. D.

In Georgetown, Madison county, October 5th, Mr. ABNER FISHER, aged 56 years. In the death of Mr. F., a large family is deprived of the care and kindness of an affectionate father, and are left, (their mother having been removed by death,) to the discretion of their youthful minds to bear the storms of life. May God in mercy comfort them in their bereavement, and early teach them the joy blighting influence of vice, and the happiness enjoyed in obedience and virtue. The funeral was attended in the Baptist meeting house, (our thanks to them for their kindness,) to a large and attentive congregation. The Baptist preacher (Mr. Reed) and Br. Woolley took part in the services. Sermon by W. M. D.

In Oran, Pompey, October 9th, Mr. SAMUEL CHEESBRO, aged 40 years. May the mourners be comforted by the cheering reflection that "as we have borne the image of the earthy we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Sermon by W. M. D.

In Hastings, June 8th, Mr. JOHN CORNELL, aged 38 years.

In Hume, July 5th, Mrs. LUCY WARN, consort of A. T. Warn, aged 33 years. Funeral on the 6th, by the writer. I. B. S.

In Florence, Huron county, Ohio, on the 18th of April last, Mrs. EMELINE L. TERRY, wife of Br. Halsey Terry, aged 30 years and two months. She met death with composure and reconciliation, in the full and firm belief of universal salvation. She was an excellent Christian, and community as well as her husband and children sustained a heavy loss. G. MESSINGER.

OCCASIONAL SERMON,

Delivered before the Cayuga Association, at Genoa, September 25, 1839.

BY REV. N. BROWN.

[Published by request.]

"Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, the morning cometh, and also the night: if ye will inquire, inquire, ye; return, come."—Isaiah xxi: 11, 12.

Beautiful, striking and sublime, is the language of our text. Rife with interest and meaning are the sentiments which it contains. It breathes a spirit of earnestness and deep fervor, and is well calculated to come home to the soul and heart of every watchman upon the walls of our spiritual Zion,—of every well-wisher to the holy cause of humanity and Gospel truth.

A wonderful vision filled with strange images passed before the face of the evangelical prophet. This vision was called the "burden of Dumah." Some of its glowing and high-wrought imaginings of prophetic and poetic description are exhibited in our text. This vision may in some sense properly apply to the captivity of the Jews, and their subsequent deliverance from temporal bondage; but we think it had a still more deeply prophetic and striking application—referring to the spiritual defection and desolation of Zion, and the glory that in after ages should be revealed under the Gospel dispensation, when the night of darkness, error and sin should in a great degree pass away, and the star of promise and hope should be fixed in the heavens to guide the wayfaring pilgrim in his journeying through the world.

The prophet had been deploring the sad and desolate state of Zion. The watchmen upon her walls were few, unfaithful and corrupt. The once peculiar people of the most high God had corrupted their way—had become unmindful of their Benefactor and Friend. Darkness began to cover the whole earth and gross darkness the people. Notwithstanding the nation of the Jews had been so signally favored of God—had basked so long in the sun-light of his glory—had been protected and supported by his almighty arm; notwithstanding God had led them out of Egyptian bondage and established them in a land smiling with luxuriance and beauty, and teeming with plenty—had made them a great and a mighty nation—had committed unto them the oracles of heaven—had condescended to dwell in the ark, and in the sanctuary of their temple—to crown them with victory and triumph over their numerous enemies; yet they were often prone to wander far from their God. They became filled with ingratitude, rebellion and pride; often did they reject the worship of the King of kings and Lord of lords, and bow the knee in idolatrous worship to idols of stocks and stones, of their own forming.

In tracing the eventful history of this highly favored, though oft perverse, ungrateful, and idolatrous nation, from the land of Egypt to the land of promise, we shall find numerous instances of repining, obstinacy, rebellion and idolatry. And from the time of the author of our text, up to the advent of our Saviour, there had been such a frightful moral defection—such a gradual corruption of the whole Jewish nation—such a degeneracy in a spiritual point of view, that the once radiant glories of Zion had departed; Zion indeed had become desolate and lay a heap of mouldering ruins. The black and frightful pall of error, idolatry and sin seemed spread over the whole earth. From the ark and the sanctuary the candle of the Lord had been removed. The world seemed as one vast charnel-house of moral pollution and spiritual death. Idolatry had gathered numerous hosts of guilty worshippers around her blood-stained altars. The house of Judah and of Israel had made void the law of God through their vain traditions and idle ceremonies; their religion had lost its vitality and spirituality in principle and practice, their only righteousness was self-righteousness, their light had become darkness, their glory a name, their worship mockery, and an abomination to the Most High!

As we pass along down the rapid, flowing stream of time, we arrive at a point in the history of the world fraught with joy and thrilling interest to the whole human race. At this period the watch-towers of Zion had been forsaken—they had crumbled to ruins; the light of glory that once streamed around their summits had been quenched, and the dark wings of desolation and moral night brooded over the once smiling and beauteous land.

But the hope of Israel had not wholly departed. There still remained a little, humble band of watchmen that had held fast their integrity amid the wide spread degeneracy of the Jewish nation.—They watched upon the plains of Judea. Long had they waited for the glorious sign of promise to gild the heavens with its cheering light, and point them to the coming of their long expected Shiloh. It is true that their fleecy flocks were now the principal objects of their watch-care on this eventful night. But by no means did this humble and pastoral occupation engross their whole thoughts and attention.

The shades of darkness had gathered o'er the recently smiling and sunny plains of Judea. Bright Sol had finished his joyous journey through his wonted course, and had sunk to his occidental couch behind the everlasting mountains which girt the Palestinic plains in the far off west. The pale queen of night had no mild and silver glories to shed down upon the fair earth at this eventful period. Thick and dense were the inky clouds that now had gathered over this humble orb; it witnessed not the thrilling and enrapturing scenes that were about to be displayed to the little devotional band of shepherds that were reclining upon a little grassy mound, "watching their flocks by night." The wide expanded arch of the heavens was not as yet garnished with its wonted resplendency of star-lit glories; for all the brightly shining orbs of light had retired to give place to a still more glorious and effulgent orb of celestial brightness—the star, the wondrous star of Bethlehem that was about to be let down from the blazing throne of the Eternal to harbinger the advent of a world's Redeemer! Silence and solitude had gathered around. Already had the shepherd's evening devotions ascended like sweet incense from their adoring hearts to their Father and their God, and now they had sunk into a gentle slumber, with their souls filled with heavenly and divine things; anxiously and patiently had they been waiting for the hope of Israel, when the bright Sun of Righteousness should arise with healing in his balmy wings, and pour a flood-tide of light and glory upon a darkened and alienated world!

Gloomy, starless and cheerless was the aspect of that night; yet the slumbers of the humble shepherds were as peaceful and calm as the unruffled bosom of the placid lake. In dreaming fancy, soft music, like the gentle zephyr, came stealing over their senses, and fell like the distant music of angels upon the ear. It seemed to pour a stream of joy and gladness into their hearts.—The music ceased, and died away upon the ear, and then a heavenly voice we will suppose was heard as from the celestial courts of glory—"Watchmen, what of the night?—Watchmen, what of the night?" Easy indeed is it to imagine the probable answer that at that time would be given to this important question. "The morning cometh and also the night. Darkness covers the plains, but a more gross darkness the people. Departed is the glory of Israel—the light of heaven is shut out from our sight; Zion is desolate, forsaken, and a heap of spiritual ruins. The candle of the Lord has been removed from our midst; all flesh has corrupted its way before God. No cheering sign of promise appears to gladden our hearts. Shiloh delays his coming, and in vain we watch for the Holy One that should be a light to enlighten the Gentiles, and a glory in the midst of Israel!"

But suddenly a bright effulgence of celestial blazonry was poured down from the zenith of the heavens, and shed a soft and joyous radiance around the astonished and trembling shepherds, now aroused from their peaceful slumbers. Darkness fled from the wide extended plains. A celestial messenger from on high hovered around on golden pinions, and, with a voice breathing forth the sweet music of heaven, he bids them to "fear not! for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people: for unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord!" "And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, Glory to God in highest! on earth peace, good will toward men!"

O with what ecstacy of joy did the humble shepherds listen to the heavenly message!—Their fearful forebodings now fled away. The hope of Israel had come on his visit of benevolence and love to a darkened and alienated world, and they were constrained to mingle their glad hosannahs with those of the celestial host! The glorious star of Bethlehem was before them—it guided them where the infant Jesus was laid.

In the person and mission of the Saviour of the world, a beacon light of glory was kindled up amid the darkness of spiritual night, which shed the gladdening light of heavenly truth and peace upon many hearts, and the clouds of error, superstition and sin in a great degree fled before the effulgent beams of the Sun of Righteousness, which had arisen with healing in his balmy wings. Truth and righteousness were again established in the earth. Life and immortality were clearly brought to light as the final high, holy and happy portion of the vast family of man. Shiloh came to do the will of the Father, and to be the Saviour of the world; to finish sin, make an end of transgression, and bring in everlasting righteousness; to crown the wants of all the dependent children of our common Father in heaven. He fell at last a martyr to the hate of his deadly enemies; he died upon the rugged cross, arose triumphant from the tomb, and demonstrated the truth that although man dies, yet he shall live again,—that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection from the dead.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

* * * * But alas! how soon again did the clouds of moral darkness begin to gather over the world. The bright Sun of Righteousness which had so recently arisen in glory and gladness, pouring joy and peace upon a benighted world, now began to be obscured, and a sad and mournful spiritual defection characterised the Christian church. The light of Gospel day began to wane, to merge itself into fast approaching night. The taint of Judaism began to affect, more or less, many of the professed believers in the Christian faith, in many parts of the world. Some of the minor features of Christianity, at first began to be marred by ignorant and designing men, and some mystical errors were engrafted into the sacred tree of Gospel truth. Many of the early converts to Christianity were Jews, whose minds had been long and thoroughly imbued with the religion of their fathers—Jews, who had never wholly given up their partiality for many of the forms and services of the Jewish sanctuary, as well as for some of the peculiar doctrines of their church—hence the taint of Judaism, to which allusion has been made. It appears that a few misguided, though perhaps well-meaning, christianized Hebrews, were guilty of a kind of truckling policy, and undertook to unite or blend together the Jewish and Christian churches, it being a kind of conciliatory compromise, for the purpose of gaining over more easily and to better advantage, converts from among the proud and unbelieving Jews.—But the taint of Judaism did not alone affect the Christian church; that of heathenism began to infuse its poison throughout the whole Christian body. The absurd and ridiculous errors of the Gnostics, were so many borrowed errors from the heathen schools, though assuming a modified form. Some strange dogmas from the Platonic Philosophy crept into the Christian church, and gradually began to be cherished as saving and darling features in the Gospel system. It will be borne in mind that by far the greatest number of the early converts to Christianity, were converts from heathenism, far exceeding the number of converted Jews. Many of these heathen converts were eminent philosophers, of influence and talent. They, like the Jewish converts, had never wholly given up their partiality for some of the peculiar dogmas of their philosophy and religion. And some of them, it would appear, anxious to multiply converts to Christianity more rapidly, did not hesitate to tolerate in the Christian church, some of these heathen dogmas, baptizing them as Christian truth, and all for the purpose of rendering the Christian system as unexceptionable as possible to the worldly-wise heathen, and at the same time flattering, by this means, their vanity and their pride. Thus was blended in some degree, Christian truth with heathen dogmas; dogmas which even at the present day, are like so many frightful plague spots upon what is termed Orthodox Christianity, in many parts of the world.

1. The heathen dogma of ceaseless wo, or that the torments of the wicked would be of as long continuance as the happiness of the righteous, was first proclaimed in the Christian church by Tertullian, Bishop of Carthage, in the third century. An eminent church historian remarks, that he was at first a heathen and pursued the profession of the law, but afterwards embraced the Christian religion; and that during the close of his life, he fell into some gross errors. He appears, continues this writer, to have been a pious man, but his piety was of a melancholy and austere cast. He was deficient in judgment, and prone to credulity and superstition, which may serve for his departure from good principles in the latter part of his life. It was not strange that a man of such strong heathen prejudices, of such a morose and irascible temperament of mind, should become partial to the withering dogma of endless wo, that his enemies might, in his view, be punished to the greatest possible extent.

2. The doctrine of the personality of the devil, seemed to have been borrowed from the Jews about the same time. The Jews, as it is well known, borrowed their doctrine of devils from the system of Zoroaster, the great Magian Reformer, while they were in the Babylonian captivity.

3. The incomprehensible dogma of the Trinity seems to have been of heathen origin, and no doubt some of the heathen dogmas of pagan mythology suggested the strange idea that three are one, and one, three! This doctrine never became a generally received dogma of the Christian church, until the fourth century, and not then, without much controversy, confusion and strife. It was at last proved true, (as was supposed,) not by argument, but by ballot, at the celebrated 2d council of Constantinople—the strongest party claiming to be on the side of truth. From this time up to the commencement of the 7th century, the Christian church continued rapidly to degenerate in doctrine, principle and practice. In the year 606. the supremacy of the Pope was established. Here was an unprecedented stretch of spiritual pride and priestly domination. This was the stepping-stone, or new starting-point of more abominations and errors, which crept rapidly into the Christian church. From this time up to the Reformation under Martin Luther, a long age of spiritual darkness brooded over the Christian world, It appears, however, that there were a few humble followers of Christ, that had, amid the long and wide spread desolation around, held fast their integrity, and had maintained the principles of the Gospel in comparative purity.—We shall allude to this in the proper place.

4. The history of the Roman Pontiffs who lived in the tenth century, is a history of so many monsters, and not of men, and exhibits a horrible series of the most flagitious, tremendous and complicated crimes, as all writers, even those of the Roman church, confess. This was called the leaden age, an age that pressed like a frightful incubus upon the professedly Christian nations of Europe.

5. The eleventh century is distinguished for the final separation of the Eastern and Western churches, or, as they were often termed, the Greek and Latin churches. Both of these churches had now sunk into a deplorable state of degeneracy and corruption.

It may here be remarked, that the commencement of the ninth century was characterized by the labors of a devoted and pious Christian, by the name of Claude, of the city of Turin. He, by his fearlessness and zeal, planted a few of the seeds of Christian purity and knowledge, which sprung up and were blessed at length in yielding much spiritual fruit. He laid the foundation of several churches in the valleys of Piedmont, which for more than two centuries maintained the doctrine of the Gospel and the worship of God in much purity. It appears that the doctrine of ceaseless wo, was not a doctrine received by any of these churches.

6. The twelfth century was not wholly darkened by the clouds of superstition and error. A few diverging rays from the Sun of righteousness and truth, were poured upon the hearts of some devoted Christians in the valley of Piedmont, and in other parts of Europe. Peter Waldo, of Lyons, in France, became a zealous reformer in the Christian church, in the year 1160. He was highly successful in spreading the truth in his neighborhood, and in some parts of Italy. The followers of Claude and Waldo, were known by a variety of names, such as Waldenses, Leonist, Albigenses, etc. The existence of such a sect, during the continuance of the grand corruption by the Papal power, is thought by many to have been predicted by John the revelator, under the character of the two witnesses.—Rev. ii: 3. By these it is supposed are designated the true followers of Christ, who should, from age to age, bear witness to the truth—who should be faithful watchmen upon the walls of Zion, and should beat back in some degree, the clouds of darkness and error which had long brooded over the Christian church!

7. A still more general and important reformation took place in the fifteenth century, through the labors of Luther and Melancthon. At this time still more religious light and knowledge were elicited. Many long-cherished errors and absurdities were exploded—many corruptions and abominations of the Papal church were exposed, and put under the ban of condemnation, and the seeds of religious liberty were sown, which were destined to produce much spiritual fruit.

8. The elements of religious improvement, of religious liberty and knowledge, continued to work; many minor reforms and improvements were made in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, in Germany, France, and more especially in England. Additional light, from time to time, was shed upon the Christian church; but towards the latter part of the eighteenth century, a bright and glorious star of religious truth and knowledge was fixed in the heavens, and which shed its gladdening and enlightening beams upon the hearts of many who had long been surrounded with spiritual darkness—had been sitting in the valley of the shadow of death! To them light had sprung up. That star lighted up the darkness of spiritual night; it flung its glories across the wide Atlantic, to make glad the wilderness and the solitary places in our own now favored land! Here was then planted the spotless banner of a world's salvation from sin and death. The Zion of our God began then to be built up in beauty and strength. Since that auspicious era in the annals of the religious world, truth has continued to run to and fro, and has been glorified and blessed.—The long night of darkness has in a great degree passed away, and the faithful watchmen upon Zion's walls, now present a mighty phalanx of pledged defenders of the glorious cause of humanity and Gospel truth! That star has set—but it was in glory! The light of that glory which was poured upon the world, yet lingers in the heavens, an eternal memento of the labors of Potter's friend—the more than Luther of America. Other luminaries have arisen, and poured additional floods of light upon the hearts of men—upon the Zion of our God!

INFLUENCE OF ADVERSITY ON MAN.

Delivered at the Annual Exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute, August 28th, 1839.

BY D. BACON.

A very extensive knowledge of the world is not necessary to perceive an influence in adversity. But to an accurate observer of men and things, a great and ameliorating influence is plainly apparent. Of men who have had the high and promising hopes, both of themselves and friends, blasted by continuous prosperity, the catalogue would be long; but much longer would it be of those who owe their present high standing in community, their all, to the invigorating influence of adverse circumstances. We are so constituted, that if constant success attend our efforts and be the result of our plans, in a short time we become arrogant and supercilious towards our fellows, and treat them with scorn and neglect—a certain path to wretchedness if long pursued. But this is not often the case. Continual success is the unfortunate lot of comparatively few. It shall therefore be the endeavor, while pursuing this subject, to present some of the effects of adversity upon man, in the formation of his character.

It is a well known fact, if a child, from its infancy up, be allowed to have its own way, its will in nothing crossed, that there is no surer method to ruin or destroy that child for every thing great and good in this life; and the corrective hand is therefore applied, and the wayward youth thus kept in the path he should tread—the only path to virtuous fame and honor; yet how often does he regret, deeply regret the restrictions that are laid upon him—yea, even utter forth bitter imprecations against those who by thus doing, show themselves to be his best friends. All this is done at the moment, without reflecting upon, or foreseeing the consequences that follow. But when youth passes and gives place to manhood, and the full grown intellect is brought to look back and reflect upon the perilous days of the mind just beginning to blossom, with what gratefulness does he remember those who, as he then thought, so sadly and wantonly disappointed his fondest hopes and anticipations. So with many of us in adversity. We lament present reverses of fortune; we mourn that present circumstances are so adverse, as we believe, to our best interests; that we have to toil and labor, amid storms and perplexities, and corroding cares, to carry some favorite projects into execution, when, as we are almost ready to step into the fanciful enjoyment of their successful termination, some unexpected reverse of fortune snatches the prize from within our grasp, and consigns it to utter destruction. I say, we grieve and lament, at the time, that such should be the case; but when time disperses the veil under which we have labored, and reveals to us the true and final result of our endeavors, how often do we, while contemplating upon them, experience as heartfelt thankfulness that we have been disappointed, as we did sadness when disappointed.

Let us notice, for a few moments, the effect of unbroken prosperity upon us, continued only for a short time. We may at first, perhaps, start well; but soon treacherous memory, surrounded by the blaze of present success, ceases to remind us of past experience. Little by little we deviate from a course which reason would seem to dictate, if it were not totally disregarded, and as time increases, prudence constantly decreases, until we begin to imagine ourselves almost infallible, and naturally look upon those around us with a despising eye. But this is not all: the farther we advance with constant success attending us, the more reckless and imprudent we become in forming plans, and in the choice of measures to carry them into execution; and, as an unavoidable consequence, we must sooner or later experience a sad reverse, and the longer delayed the greater will be the fall.

How forcibly is this illustrated in the history of this country for a few years past. Preceding the year 1834, it had been uncommonly prosperous for a series of years, and the people generally had been rapidly advancing in wealth. But with this gradual and sure increase they were not content; the corroding streams of filthy lucre were too small to satisfy their craving desires. Golden dreams and visions now began to fire many a brain, and so strong became the mania for riches, that people by hundreds began to desert their laudable and profitable employments in the mechanic arts, manufactures and agriculture, and embarked in the wild schemes of base speculation. And what followed? Let the thousands who have so severely felt the hard times from which we have not emerged, answer. The whole country groaned as if under the avenging hand of some mighty desolating scourge!

Now let us briefly notice the effect produced by the change of circumstances, these reverses of fortune, which we call adversity. The very first is, it brings us to ourselves again, and we arise and return to the path of rectitude and duty. Reason and judgment reascend their thrones, and preside over our conduct once more. Our usefulness in society is increased, by rendering us more dependant upon our fellows, thereby enlarging our charity and good will towards them. But more than all, it generates a resistless vigor in the mind, purifies it of dross, releases it from the deadly shackles imposed by luxurious ease, and permits it to walk forth in all the stately dignity of an immortal agent. How many bright and shining lights, that glaringly stand forth in the galaxy of renown, have been placed there by the stern hand of adversity! How many deathless works of genius have thus been forced into existence!

Nothing is so detrimental, so paralyzing to the powers of the mind, as to surround it with affluence and ease. Under such an influence, it sinks down into a listless inactivity, and becomes intellectually dead to every thing truly great and noble. But let that mind come under the purifying hand of affliction—multiply reverses of fortune upon it—and they will but sharpen its energies, and rouse them to an activity that will overcome every obstacle. There is, too, a renovating moral power in adversity. It is, when man is elated by prosperity and engrossed in worldly-mindedness, and consequently forgetful of his dependence upon the Author of his being, and of his duty to his fellow-men, that adversity, with chastening influence, comes to the task, and recals the wanderer to his own proper sphere again. Who that has ever passed through the trying ordeal of sorrow and affliction, but has felt its inspiring influence—has perceived his feelings brighten and beautify—his thoughts become more chaste—his motives purer, and his unnatural fondness for the evanescent things of earth diminished? Who that has ever witnessed a fellow-mortal in distress, but has felt the virtuous emotions of his own soul enkindling into benevolence and charity? Such we believe to be the influence of adversity on man—strengthening his intellectual powers by bringing them into vigorous exercise—chastening his moral feelings, and adding vigor to his virtuous impulses.

The writer of the following appears to possess a mind naturally vigorous and clear, and well stored with the teachings of Scripture, notwithstanding some of his views may be peculiar to himself. Acting on our long established rule, we leave him to speak for himself—he is also responsible for his own opinions—and welcome him as a contributor to our paper. "The auld mann speak, the young should hear," and from the lips of age receive, if not articles of faith, at least food for reflection. Let our venerable brother write his lines far enough a part, and we will have no trouble in preparing his articles for the press. A. B. G.

AN OLD MAN'S LAST REVIEW OF THE SCRIPTURES.

FALL OF MAN.

It is well known to every attentive reader of Scripture, that these words, in their connection, are not in any of the canonical books of the Bible: but the supposition is, that all mankind sinned in Adam, and fell with him in his first transgression; and this is contended for on the plea that all mankind were seminally contained in Adam at the time of his fall. Well, this is granted—but it must also be allowed, that all that we derived from Adam is mortal. He who only hath immortality, never gave that immortality to Adam to sacrifice, or shuffle off, or barter away for an apple, or any other forbidden fruit. I also contend, that it is not the righteous economy of Heaven to authorise, or even permit one man to sin for another. No—not Adam for his children: every man's sins shall lie upon his own head, not on his children's. We derived our earthly or natural man from Adam; but what hath he to do with sin? The earthly man has no pre-eminence above a beast; he is formed of the same dust; he breathes the same air—eats the like food; and as dieth the one, so dieth the other. "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." It is the living principle—the intellectual, the spiritual man that returns to God who gave it, to give an account for the deeds done in the body. It is the spirit that receives the law from his heavenly Father, and is amenable for all the transgressions and deeds done in the body during his stay in that earthly tabernacle. The law is spiritual—therefore it was not given to the natural man, (which we derived from Adam,) for he receiveth not the things of the spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.

Take the case of Adam for instance: "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." Now if that was spoken to the earthly man, then the earthly man must have surely died on the very day of transgression, or I can see no way to maintain the veracity of the Lawgiver. But the earthly man did not die on the day that he disobeyed—therefore the denunciation was not against the earthly or natural man; for the command was not given to him, but was spoken to the man of understanding: to him, obedience is life—and disobedience is death. "Lust, when it conceiveth, bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death"—mental or spiritual death—and that death Adam died on the day of transgression.

As it respects our accountability to God, Adam is no more to us than a brother. We never were in him, by him, nor from him; therefore, that we should fall, or sin, or have fallen or sinned in him, is impossible. God is the father of all our spirits—and when Adam transgressed we were with our heavenly Father, where harm could not reach us or sin defile. That we should lie under God's wrath and curse for an affair that we had no hand in, and knew nothing about, and had we known, could not have prevented, is a doctrine so cruel and unreasonable, that it is one of the greatest mysteries that it should ever gain believers among a civilized and Christian people. No doctrine that ever was propagated amongst the children of men, has tended so much to alienate the affections of children from their heavenly Father, and perpetuate the cold damps of doubt and distrust, as this doctrine sowed among the nations, that they and all their children were under a doom of God's wrath and curse before they were born. Ought we not to exclaim, "An enemy hath done this"?

No marvel that all believers in such sentiments are so hard to be persuaded to return to their allegiance and to their Father's house. Had not the world wondered after the beast, this doctrine would not have been a wonder amongst the children of men. SEVENTY-FOUR.

"VOICE TO THE MARRIED."

Br. GROSH—Having perused, with uncommon interest and delight, Br. Austin's articles under the above title, I can not withhold this public expression of my humble approbation of the writer's valuable labors. It does appear to me, that no excellence in matter or style is wanting. The subject is certainly a profitable one, and should secure the particular attention of every reader of the Magazine and Advocate. The manner in which it is presented, is simple, yet sublime—comprehensive, yet not tedious—plain, yet eloquent. It is well calculated to secure the attention, enlist the feelings, instruct the mind, improve the understanding, convince the heart, and elevate the standard of matrimonial and social enjoyments. The articles thus far, embrace the obvious principles of sound philosophy, pure morality and genuine religion. If Br. Austin can maintain the same sound, forcible and elevated course thus far evinced, to the conclusion of the series, he will furnish society with a work, the utility and value of which can hardly be estimated. It is a matter of no ordinary importance, that the articles alluded to should be carefully read, and the various subjects embraced in them, as carefully remembered, by all to whom an opportunity is presented. THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS

NUMBER XVI.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

JEREMIAH.—This book was written by Jeremiah, who prophesied until after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. It is said that Jeremiah was stoned to death by his countrymen; but this is uncertain.

Jer. xlii: 10—"For I repent me of the evil that I have done unto you."

This language, ascribing human passions or affections to the divine Being, is common in the Scriptures, and has been the butt of much ridicule and cavil for unbelievers. This language is not to be undrstood literally, any more than that which represents God as having hands, feet, eyes, etc.; and those who contend that it is to be understood literally, only betray their utter ignorance of the phraseology of the Bible, and their misconceptions of God's character. For, to say that God did actually repent that he had made man, as we read Gen. vi: 6, is only virtually saying, that when he created man, he did not foresee what would be the consequence; which would be to half dethrone the Almighty. In this passage in Jeremiah, the language means no more than that God would not punish the Jews any more at that time, but would change his conduct with respect to them.

LAMENTATIONS.—This book is a poetical composition of Jeremiah, lamenting the state of his country, after the conquest of it by the Chaldeans; they are written in a mournful and very pathetic style. Jeremiah also wrote Lamentations on the death of the good King Josiah; but they are not now extant.

"GREAT DAY, FOR WHICH ALL OTHER DAYS WERE MADE."—YOUNG.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

What an overwhelming idea is intended to be conveyed in these words. I say, intended to be conveyed, because, as the sentiment has no foundation in truth, it, in fact, conveys no clear idea of any thing. But take it as it stands, and what a view does it present of that Being whom we are taught to revere as the author of all that is beautiful and good! Is not reason astounded at the startling presentation of an Infinite Jehovah, sitting upon the immovable pillars of eternity, surrounded with the dazzling and unapproachable curtains of grandeur and glory, complete in every attribute, and lacking nothing of felicity, yet looking forward through the misty cycles of unborn ages with the unshadowed clearness of omniscient vision, foreseeing the end of all things from the beginning, and instituting a day, or period of time, when he will judge the world in vengeance, though as yet there is no world to judge? Would Infinite Goodness—while contemplating the embryo scroll of Time's varied and eventful history, the deep and damning crimes that should darken the soul's fair page, the untold, withering wretchedness that should wring the quivering heart-strings, while grovelling beneath the load of sin and vanity to which men were subjected by their frail constitution, with the terrible consummation in view of endless, unavailing torment for a great part of his sentient creation—bestow upon them the fearful boon of existence? We know benevolence could not do this. Tyranny, the refinement of cruelty, alone, could willingly endure so terrible a result.

See the fond mother bending above the fair face of her sleeping child. Why does her bosom heave with anguish, and the tear-drops fall fast upon the cherub countenance? Ah, its slumbers are broken by sobs; she has been obliged to correct it for some fault. It has wilfully disobeyed her positive command. Was it anger that moved her to punish her child—was it to avenge herself for the dishonor cast upon her broken law? Oh, no—her aching, throbbing heart, attests how much rather she would have borne the pain, than inflict it upon her beloved one. But justice to the child required it. Its future welfare and happiness were at stake; the delicate, unfolding page of its heart was committed to her care, and it devolved upon her to see that the characters inscribed upon it, should be those of love, gentleness, purity and truth. Its future character must be, in a measure, formed by her; and to secure its obedience, it may be sometimes, but rarely, necessary to inflict chastisement. But would an earthly parent inflict pain for a moment longer than was thought necessary for the reformation of the child? Certainly not, if actuated by parental feeling. Yet, after all care, parents may fail in establishing such principles as they would wish, in the breast of the child. They may fail in wisdom or means for its improvement. But our heavenly Father labors under no such embarrassments, as regards his government. He knows precisely what each individual needs, what are the necessary means for the reformation of every offender, and possesses all power to accomplish his purpose. Nothing is lacking for the final well-being of every member of the human family, when we have the goodness of God to bestow the necessary grace for their salvation. Is it not absurd, then, to suppose, that even Dr. Young was correct, when he taught that Creative Goodness could decree the eternal perdition of souls that were not yet brought into existence? And if one spirit is ever lost, it must be by the decrees of Him who is represented as appointing a day of vengeful judgment, and making all other days for the greater display of that one. Verily, is wisdom honored by her children?

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH—AGAIN.

BR. GROSH—My respected friend and fellow-townsman, Dr. Clowes—formerly, also, a brother minister in the Episcopal Church—has recently made some interesting statements concerning the theological sentiments and proceedings of said Church, which appeared in a late number of your paper. He has shown, very satisfactorily, I think, that the Episcopal Church, as a body—in this country, at least—is not opposed to, but does indeed favor the doctrine of "the restitution of all things." The 17th article, to which Br. Clowes adverts, is certainly very strangely and ambiguously, if not even contradictorily expressed: so much so, that its most acute expounders have been unable to give a consistent and rational exposition of it. It is said to have been originally drawn up by way of accommodation—so that ministers of that church, of different religious views and sentiments, might receive and subscribe to it—each giving the article such a construction as should be agreeable to his own particular views.

At a General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, held in the city of Philadelphia, about the year 1797 or 1798, at which I attended as a delegate from New-Jersey, an attempt was made to set aside the 39 articles of the Church of England, altogether. Some expressed the opinion that no articles of faith were necessary; strenuously urging that the sentiments and doctrines of the Church were fully contained and clearly expressed in the creeds and liturgy, (the Athanasian creed having before been excluded from the American Episcopal prayer book.) To this, however, the Convention did not accede. It was then moved and urged that a new set of articles should be framed, to be adopted instead of the 39 articles. The reasons urged for this measure, were, that several of the articles were wholly unnecessary, and that some others contained doctrines—at least apparently, and according to the obvious meaning of the language employed—to which the clergy in general could not understandingly and conscientiously subscribe. The articles which were considered most objectionable, in point of doctrine, were the 9th and 17th. Concerning the latter, entitled, "Of Predestination and Election," Dr. Clowes has sufficiently remarked. The former, entitled, "Of Original or Birth Sin," was considered equally objectionable. The first part of this article—which embraces the substance of the whole—is as follows:—"Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam, (as the Pelagians do vainly talk,) but it is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man that is naturally engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit; and therefore in every person born into this world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation." This is denominated "Original or Birth Sin"—or, as a certain Bishop of the Church has humorously expressed it, the sin of being born! It is truly a strange title of a very strange article, and ought never to have had a place in any Christian code. But it "waxeth old, and is ready to vanish away."

The 31st article so fully and explicitly recognizes the doctrine of universal grace, that I do not know that the attempt has ever been made to explain it differently. It is indeed founded on the principle of vicarious atonement; and on that principle it goes the whole length, and breadth, and depth, and heighth of universal salvation. As some of your readers may not have seen, or may not recollect the above named article, I will here quote it verbatim.—"Article 31. Of the one Oblation of Christ, finished upon the cross. The offering of Christ once made, is that perfect redemption, propitiation and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin, but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifice of masses, in which it was commonly said that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain and guilt, were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits." Now if, according to this article, perfect redemption, propitiation and satisfaction has been made for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual, what further satisfaction can be required? what more can the most rigorous justice demand? Certainly none. And accordingly the article declares that "there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone," which Christ hath made. How can the doctrine of endless punishment for sin—to satisfy divine justice, as it is strangely said—be sustained or urged consistently with this article? It is impossible; and therefore either the article should be given up, and stricken from the catalogue, or else the tremendous doctrine of endless suffering and unforgiving, Almighty vengeance, should be discarded, as utterly erroneous and abominable. Which will our Episcopal brethren do? Probably neither, as yet, being exceedingly fearful of innovations, either in doctrines or in forms and usages, of any sort, even though resting only on tradition and "man's device."

There are, however, many individuals in the Episcopal Church, both ministers and others, who are firm believers in the doctrine of the "restitution of all things," some openly, and others more secretly, and as they seem to think, more prudently so. And not a few of the dignitaries of that Church, in different ages and countries, have left undeniable testimony of their faith in the heavenly doctrine, as has been repeatedly shown by ample quotations from their theological writings. And I beg leave to close this article with a short extract from one of the Bishops of that Church, whom I do not recollect to have seen referred to as favoring the doctrine of universal reconciliation. It is the late excellent and highly esteemed Bishop Middleton, who was Bishop of Calcutta about the year 1814. The following extract is from a sermon of his, published in pamphlet form, some little time before his death.

"Is it not possible," says he, "at least, that the Allwise may have made us weak, in order that we might learn humility? That he may have created us prone to sin, and to all the wretched consequences which are the natural effects of such a propensity, in order that we might taste a purer happiness in those sensations of joy and gratitude, which are excited by deliverance and mercy, than can ever be the lot of that hopeless and fearless content, which belongs to those who have never felt the want of happiness or virtue! What if the universal good be more effectually consulted by the permission of partial evil? And may not the sin and wretchedness of the present world, be a necessary feature in the vast scheme of that Providence WHOSE PATERNAL CARE EXTENDS THROUGH INFINITE SPACE AND TIME." This may not be a positive declaration of faith in ultimate universal holiness and felicity, but I think no believer in endless punishment and misery, would have employed the language of the above quotation. THE OLD SERPENT'S DOCTRINE DEFENDED.

Br. GROSH—I feel anxious to have the following anecdote appear in your columns, for several reasons. Among the many I could mention, I select one only—it will show to the world plainly that our Partialist brethren in this vicinity, as well as in other places, are using their endeavors to perpetuate, as truth, the palpable falsehood audaciously announced by the serpent to mother Eve, in the garden of Paradise; while, at the same time, it will as clearly show that Universalists contend earnestly for the truth of God, and are, therefore, exonerated from that reprehensible character so long ascribed to them by our opposers. It places the charge where it justly belongs, and our Partialist brethren will undoubtedly exclaim, "And if, and if, said the——that alters the case!" But to the anecdote.

Your readers are all aware that it not unfrequently happens, in little country villages and in many districts, that Sunday schools are established and conducted principally by those who are Partialists, and consequently in favor of "the Sunday School Union"—and for this reason no other books are admitted except those bearing the same character, and Universalist publications are particularly excluded, even where Universalist children compose a great part of the school.—Such was the case in the little village of S., in the county of Chautauque, where a Bible class was also formed, composed of members of several denominations, who gave, in their turn, such answers to the questions contained in the Sunday school book, as best accorded with their views respectively. But it was requested by one of the class, (Br. D., a Universalist,) that a question might be given out at each meeting, to be answered at the next. This proposition was unanimously agreed to, and no one present having a question to put forth, Br. D. introduced the following:—"Is justly deserved punishment ever remitted in any case, according to Scripture?" So positive were several that an answer in the affirmative could be found in almost every page of their Bibles, that they commenced the search, expressing by their confident looks and actions, that so simple a question need not wait a week for an answer. But one week passed away, and each Partialist produced his proof that a man can sin and escape a justly deserved punishment. (How moral the doctrine!) The Universalist had gone so far as to say, that if they would find but one text of Scripture that would confirm such a sentiment, he would renounce his doctrine.—This threw the laboring oar into his own hand. Each passage adduced was shown not to be to the point. Week after week passed away, and though hard was the struggle to obtain one declaration of holy Writ, all proved fruitless, for every passage which they supposed taught the remission of punishment, was found to prove nothing more nor less than the remission of sins. An explanation however was given by Mr. L., one of the superintendants, (Mr. L. and Mr. B., the two superintendants, live in the village of F.,) who confessed he could not see how the guilty could escape, but by the substituted sufferings of Christ; but all who would accept this mode of punishment, would escape easily; but those who would not accept this easy way to sin with impunity, must suffer, themselves, in endless perdition. The subject was dropped for a while, when, at a subsequent meeting, Br. D. gave out notice that he had been laboring under a mistake, for he had found the doctrine they were contending for, was actually taught in the Bible, and he felt willing to acknowledge his error, and if they would all search the Scriptures one week more, without finding the passage, he would point it out to them, for he had become satisfied that the remission of justly deserved punishment was taught in the Bible.—Another week of diligent search was made, but no one found the passage. All now waited in anxious expectation to hear a renouncing Universalist (as they really supposed) point out to them the Scripture testimony which they could not find, and which was so favorable to their views. Br. D. arose, when all eyes were directed towards him, and every ear which before had been deaf to any thing a Universalist could say, was now open to hear the long sought for text. The Scriptures, said Br. D., are very clear on this one point, that obedience to God's moral law constitutes moral life, for to be spiritually minded is life and peace; and disobedience produces moral death, for to be carnally minded is death. And the plain and positive declaration is, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die"—all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. Now, my friends, if we can find where it says, "the soul that sinneth, it shall die," or where God says, "in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die," and another place that says, the soul that sinneth, it shall not die, or a passage that says, thou shalt not surely die, then and there shall we find the very doctrine for which you have long been searching the Scriptures. Here we have it.—"And the serpent said unto the woman, thou shalt not surely die," and though taught in the Bible, and corresponding well with the doctrine you are endeavoring to substantiate, still I can not believe in the author.

Your readers may be assured that it was not a little amusing to behold the fallen countenances of those who had contended so earnestly to uphold the old lying serpent's doctrine. Mr. B., who had expressed his gratitude that so able a man as Br. D. was about to renounce his sentiments, (the truth of God,) and come over to their (the serpent's) side, was perfectly silent, and they all saw plainly, that they had been contending against the truth of Heaven, which declares, that "he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done." BR. BUSHNELL'S CASE.

The following article, from a Methodist paper misnamed Zion's Herald, first met our sight in the Trumpet. I was in hesitancy whether to treat it with silent contempt, as the article deserves, or to notice it, as the importance that may be given to it by others may demand. After a week's delay, I have concluded to give it an insertion, and a few remarks by way of reply, until a fuller reply (if, indeed, Br. Bushnell's friends may deem such an uncourteous, inhuman and lying article worthy of reply) appears from a source more intimately acquainted with the particulars.

From Zion's Herald.

A FACT FOR UNIVERSALISTS.

Mr. Jesse Bushnell once experienced religion, and joined the M. E. Church on trial, and for a while bid fair to be useful in the cause of God. After this, he backslid and embraced the God-dishonoring infidelity of Universalism. Being gifted, and somewhat eloquent, he engaged in the preaching of their "blessed doctrine," I suppose for the "salvation of the world." During his ministry, he had an appointment at West Pownal, Vt. Before his coming to fulfil this appointment, a very pious young woman, Juliet B., felt her soul peculiarly afflicted that this soul-deceiving doctrine should be disseminated among that people, and she made it a matter of long and special prayer, that if it were right, God might bless it to the conviction of the people; but if it were wrong, Mr. B. might be confounded.

The time came,—the congregation and speaker assembled. He commenced discoursing this "doctrine of devils," and had got about half through his discourse, when Heaven or something else, struck him dumb. He was taken to his home, where he has now for about four years been utterly unable to speak, except in the lowest whisper: a marked and striking monument of the God-abominated doctrine of Universalism, also a strong encouragement to persevering prayer for the confusion of this soul-damning delusion. He now lives at Pownal. What will Universalists say to this? Yours, E. SPRAGUE.

Williamstown, Mass., October 18, 1839.

Of the early life of Br. Bushnell, I can not speak—but of the aphonia, or loss of voice with which he (as well as several other clergymen—these latter, Partialists, however—in this State) has been afflicted, I know enough to point out some falsehoods in the above article. Br. Bushnell, after the loss of voice, here named, resumed preaching for several weeks, when a second attack silenced him. He returned to Fort Plain, his then residence, and resided there several months. During that time, he again was restored to the use of his voice, but by confining himself to study, (not to preaching,) lost it the third time, after which, only, he returned to his father's in or near Bennington, Vt. So that Mr. E. Sprague is mistaken in attributing Br. Bushnell's aphonia to the efficacy of the "very pious young woman, Juliet B.'s" prayers at that time! Perhaps, however, if he will call on Miss B. she will not scruple to tell him that she continued her "very pious" and benevolent prayers, at intervals, up to the time when she received a divine revelation informing her that, after several efforts, God had at last struck Mr. B. dumb, at Fort Plain, for her sake!

There is a sickening abomination in such "very pious" pretensions to be the Almighty's counsellor—to instruct him in his ways, and to influence and control him in his judgments—to lead him into acts of cruelty and intolerance which he has forbidden his creatures to perform, or even to desire—that deserves and should receive derision and rebuke from all pure hearted, humble and honest Christians. Let the "very pious young woman" be directed to read Luke ix: 51–56, and learn "what manner of spirit" she is of, before she prays again for the injury of a fellow-being—and Romans xi: 32–36, particularly verse 34, before she presumptuously pretends to have been God's counsellor in this matter. If she will heed these instructions of the Holy Spirit, instead of praying that those she deems teachers of error, may be afflicted in body, she will pray for their conversion to the truth—and if her prayers have the power over God, she pretends, Br. Bushnell, instead of holding "fast his integrity" in all his afflictions, as did righteous Job, will, if he is in an error, soon rejoice in the prospective endless sin and misery of a great portion of his fellow-beings!!!

Reader, shall I tell you an anecdote or two? As they will illustrate the pretensions of this "very pious young woman," I think they may do good.

Anecdote I.—While I resided in Marietta, Pa., I had a neighbor, "a very pious" married "woman," Mrs. C. Her pious and benevolent soul shuddered with holy horror at the idea, that all mankind would ultimately be made holy and happy. Br. Jacob Myers came to Marietta to preach this, to her, awful and horrible doctrine. He had been afflicted, for some days, with a diarrhœa, which, being suddenly checked that morning, caused him to swoon away in the midst of his sermon. (His exhortations during the illness, after the swoon, had, however, more efficacy in convincing opposers of the piety of the preacher and of the sustaining power of his faith, than a dozen sermons could have had.) Immediately on the news of the preacher's illness reaching the "very pious" Mrs. C., she exclaimed that she had prayed to God for that very event—that it was a divine judgment on the preacher, and a testimony of God against his doctrine, in answer to her prayers! After some months, the story travelled to a distant neighborhood, where people had more confidence in the "very pious" Methodist woman, than had the people of Marietta, and a letter was there written sending the story (with a few embellishments, of course) to Connecticut, where it was published and made a great noise, until the whole matter was duly explained. Are not these things written in the Religious Inquirer, at that time edited by Br. Rayner, and published in the city of Hartford, in "the land of steady habits"?

As neither the prayer of the "very pious young woman, Miss Juliet B.," nor of the "very pious old woman, Mrs. C."—both Methodists—were heard of, until after the events took place, for which they declare they prayed, I may as well relate Anecdote II.—A gentleman had for a wife one of those very sagacious, foreseeing women, to whom nothing can come to pass that they did not know very well before it occurred. Wishing one day, either to cure his "better half" of her everlasting "There I told you so—I knew how it would be!"—or, else, to test how far her foreknowledge really did extend—the good man came running into the house one day, as if almost breathless with surprise and vexation. "Oh, Wife—what shall I do? The brindled cow has eaten up my big grindstone!" "Well, now," said the sagacious woman—"didn't I tell you how it would be, if you left that grindstone standing exposed in the barn yard? I knew how it would be? I told you so!"

The reader can make his own application and comments.

THE CHRISTIAN PALLADIUM.

An allegorical article, title and author, may be seen allegorically exhibited on the pages of a paper for November 1st, which paper is allegorically styled the Christian Palladium. We give the article as a specimen of that kind of mud balls which allegorical Christians love to throw at Universalists; and more on account of the curiosity which it presents us of an allegory so twisted and distorted from every possible resemblance to the thing intended to be hit, that the author had to explain his meaning in the last paragraph, lest the reader might think it had reference to the awakened prejudices of its writer.

Now, kind reader, after I had read about two-thirds of the said allegory twice over, in the vain hope of discovering what it meant, and the allegorist's explanation twice, in the vain hope of discovering its application, I happened to remember a few circumstances which are not therein explained, and my cogitations borrowed the form of a dream. It was a wide awake dream, reader; for I never put the dreams of my sleeping hours upon paper. I dreamed that I was sitting at my writing table, with pen in hand, when the allegorically-titled Christian Palladium, for December 1st, was placed before me for perusal. And lo! in my dream I discovered that the said paper had republished the article above alluded to, and in order that it might not be said to be afraid of the truth, it had copied immediately after it, an article from the Magazine and Advocate, headed A Category, being an explanation of the true application of the said allegory. If this dream should ever come to pass, I will endeavor to inform the reader. Here follow the two articles referred to—the first from the Christian Palladium, and the second from our dream box. A. R. B.

AN ALLEGORY.

Mr. Editor—Who can blame a person for thinking allegorically when circumstances are such that one can't help it. And as I have thought that it is no worse to pen a thought than it is to keep thinking it over, I take this occasion to do so.

For some days past, a number of gentlemen from different parts of the United States, have been lecturing to the people of our city on the subject agriculture. The labored point has been to convince the good husbandmen of our vicinity, that they shall have just as good crops, at the harvest, without ploughing, toiling, sowing, etc., as with. It seems to be a very essential article in the creed of their philosophy, that just as much shall be reapt in due time, without husbanding or tilling the soil, as with!! After they have, in their judgment, fully established that point, they then proceed to persuade the farmers, that nevertheless they ought to plough, and sow, and husband, and get their bread by the sweat of the brow, because, forsooth, it will be so much better for their health, and virtue, and happiness. And they seem to plead quite earnestly, too, that they should be practical husbandmen, not forgetting, however, every little while, to remind them of the "essential article" of their creed, viz., that the ultimate crop will be just as abundant without labor as with.

Now the anomaly of this philosophy, is this.—They first bring all their strength and ingenuity to bear, to remove the cause, and then go zealously at work to produce the effect. They first try to convince the farmer, that his harvest will be just as abundant in the end without toil as with it. And then try to persuade him to labor merely to enjoy better health, a keen relish, etc., etc. In the next place, the whole of this system grows out of pure benevolence! The love of these men is so unadulterated and exquisite, that they can't bear to have the farmer think that under any circumstances whatever, it will be possible for him to fail of having a good harvest. And nothing seems to excite their benevolence more than to come across a farmer who feels a deep solicitude about supplies for the future, and who is laboring assiduously, hoping in the sequel, to reap that he sows. What they commisserate so much, is, that the farmer should feel any solicitude about it. To labor, O! that's all right enough; they should labor to be sure, but they should only labor for their present health and happiness. As to the crop, that's all safe enough; and it pains them to think that any should suffer by an anxiety about the future. No, it is a piece of perfect effrontery to their humane and benevolent feelings, to hear any one argue, that there is any connection between tilling the ground and gathering an abundant harvest. They have the tiller of the soil act from an entire different motive—i. e. they would take away the natural motive, and substitute an artificial one. They would remove the real cause, and then seek the effect by some new process. If the farmer was going to labor with an eye to the connection between labor and reward, they would rather he would not labor at all, as the health and happiness accruing from industry, is not near as valuable as a perfect ease about the future, for they dread the pain of anxious apprehensions, more than every thing beside.

While I am giving you a sketch of this curious philosophy, I can not, if it were to save my life, keep the doctrine of modern Universalism out of my mind, as in every respect they are so like each other.

In great haste, yours in the love of the truth.

L. D. Fleming.

Portland, Me., September 23, 1839.

A CATEGORY.

Mr. Palladium:—Sometimes when a man thinks categorically, he is compelled to think aloud; hence he had better think on paper than to waste all his thoughts upon the stupid hills of Maine, as by the latter course, his dear brethren do not know what the quality of his thoughts are, or indeed whether he thinks at all.

On the 18th of September last, a multitude of men assembled, in convention, in the city of Portland, Me., with the intention of rejoicing in the prosperity of a cause which *Christ*ians dislike very much. As I dislike sectarian names, and lest the reader should discover that I have not been very lavish of facts, I shall call them lecturers "on the subject of Agriculture. The labored point has been" to show to mankind, what indeed is irrefutable, that if they sow in time, they are not to wait till eternity for the harvest. But as this gives me no greater share in the harvest than "the wicked Universalists," I have endeavored to spite them by representing them as saying that men may "have just as good crops, at the harvest, without ploughing, toiling, sowing, etc., as with." This on the authority of the tradition of the elders, which has always been opposed to these heretical agriculturists. I know I never heard them preach exactly as I have furnished the description, but then the majority of Christ-ians will believe the tradition of the elders, and that is enough for my purpose. True, also, they "persuade the farmers," and "quite earnestly too," that "they ought to plough, and sow, and husband, and get their bread by the sweat of the brow"—what for? Why, "because, forsooth, it will be so much better for their health, and virtue, and happiness." What a silly argument! It teaches that the punishment for sin is just as certain, as salvation is impartial according to the other argument. The truth is, I hate to have this system of agriculture, (you know my hostility to names,) as it really is, appear before the public without some caricature, lest the world should discover that I have found it easier to combat a man of straw of my own erection, than it is to oppose the spirit of truth.

"Now the anomaly of" my present scheme is this. Having, as I deemed, sufficiently mystified the reader so that he could not discover but what I had represented the above system of agriculture truly, I intended next to soar away into the skies, and produce a specimen of my logic. Accordingly I set about it and constructed a kind of skeleton containing certain prominent words and phrases, which I underscored, that the printer might know they were to be italicised, and placed some distance apart, as corner posts, like, to crawl up on if I should happen to fall in travelling from one to the other. These words and phrases were as follows: cause—love—anxiety—natural motive—artificial one—real cause—effect—anxious apprehensions. Who could not write with such a skeleton as this before him? But, alas! I failed; for when I had filled up the spaces, I found that I could not understand what I meant myself. And believing that the reader is no sharper than I am, I find myself compelled to give him, in few words and plain terms, an explanation of what I have really been about. Here it is.

In the above article I have exhibited a specimen of the arguments and opposition which is pretended to be directed against the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind; but which is really directed against a species of Partialist Universalism—or modern Universalism, such as I contend was preached to Eve in the garden of Eden not long since. "Whoso readeth let him understand."

AGENTS

To whom we send bills, are earnestly solicited to see every subscriber indebted, as early as possible, and ascertain whether the account is correct. Get the pay, if possible; for we need it immediately—and as soon as enough is collected to make out a draft or a remittable sum in one or more large notes, send it on at our expense and risk, by safe private conveyance, if convenient; if not, send by mail. Notice that the bills are made out for the present volume at $2.50—deduct 50 cents if paid before the year closes, as, in that case, the price will be but $2.00.

One thing more. Subscribers sometimes put off the agent, pleading want of money at that time. Now, each subscriber that is owing us, can easier borrow that small sum, than the agent can call on him again and again for it. And not only so, but 1000 subscribers can, each of them, much easier borrow the small sums respectively, than we can borrow a hundredth part of what those small sums will amount to unitedly. We therefore respectfully, but earnestly, urge every subscriber who owes us for more than the present volume, to pay us or our agent promptly, even if he has to borrow the money for a few days or weeks, to do so. It will give but a little inconvenience or disagreeable feeling to the subscriber, and will save us an immense amount on the whole. We know that some of them will hate to borrow a small sum for this purpose; but let each of them reflect that he has literally got so much of our money in his hands—that he has kept some of it from us for more than a year, (we speak of those who owe for more than the present volume,) and that his neighbor can better afford to lend him the small sum for a few weeks, than we can afford to wait any longer for it—to that neighbor it will be but one small sum; but we are laying out hundreds and thousands of such small sums, and suffering in mind, in feelings, in health, and in credit for the want of them.—Brethren, think of these things; and as ye are men—as ye are Universalists, do unto us, as you would have others do unto you in like circumstances. G. & H.

THE DEVIL'S DOCTRINE.....NO. I.

Many—very many of our Christian brethren stand in fear of delusion and seduction by this supposed personage. They believe that he is ever lying in wait to lead them into a belief of some pernicious error, so that he may insure their final and endless perdition. And this fear it is, which spreads a mist before their eyes, and fills their ears with a roaring sound when they come within reach of Universalism, and so prevents them from examining its pretensions or hearing its truths. "It may be the devil's doctrine—he can quote Scripture to answer his purpose—its seeming goodness and loveliness may be the garment of light in which he has clothed his hideous and blasted deformity—I will not see it—I dare not listen to its teachings!" Such are the terrors that assail their timid souls and trembling minds, and envelope all in obscurity and doubt. Most sincerely do I pity their ignorance, and compassionate the sufferings to which it gives rise. And if they can subdue their terrors only long enough to hear a few words of common sense upon the subject, I think I can furnish them with a test by which they can tell, at first sight, any doctrine having its origin with the father of lies and murderous malice.

We will take their own views of the devil, as the foundation of our remarks. He is a wise, or rather, a very crafty, cunning being. He is the arch-enemy of God and man. Most bitterly does he hate God, and most gladly would he cast every stain on his spotless character that malignant cunning can devise, and falsehood supply. As maliciously does he envy man, and ardently desire to drag him down to his own level of wickedness and wo. Such is the character—such the aim of the devil.

Now let us inquire what doctrines he would most probably invent and propagate among men to effect his purpose. For his doctrines will most certainly be as far in accordance with his character, as his aims will allow to be made manifest.

Is it reasonable to suppose, that so crafty a being would represent his most dreaded and hated opponent in a lovely and excellent point of view—that he would endeavor to lead men to love God supremely, by representing him as altogether lovely—as loving mankind universally with a boundless, endless, changeless love, even while they were enemies to him—thus inducing men to love God in return? Is this probable? Is it not even diametrically contrary to all the devil's feelings toward God, and his designs respecting man?

Is it reasonable, also, to suppose that so malignant and cunning a being would expect to secure man in his toils, not only by leading him to love God supremely, but also by inducing man to love his fellow-beings universally? No, the objector will say, it is not reasonable. Yet Universalism, which is feared to be the devil's doctrine, does this. It not only represents God to be the actual Father of all men—all men to be brethren, and therefore entitled to each other's love as a matter of duty—but it also declares that all will share the same glorious destiny—thus removing all prospective causes of hatred (endless differences and distinctions) among men. Universalism can not, therefore, be of the devil; for its doctrine respecting God and man, and its natural tendency on the soul of man—leading men to love God supremely and mankind universally—are the very opposite of the result at which the devil would naturally aim, if he were to invent a doctrine to multiply victims, and disappoint God of his rightful property. More in my next.

THE UNIVERSALIST UNION.

This able and excellent co-worker has appeared again after a brief suspension Br. Price says that, from assurances received, and subscriptions yet coming in, he feels warranted in going on with the work in the octavo form, the terms of which are, two dollars and fifty cents per annum, payable in advance. In connection with the Union, he also publishes a folio sheet, under the title "New-York Christian Messenger," devoted to miscellany, news, and the religious articles of the Union. The Messenger is published at two dollars per annum, payable in advance. We rejoice at the prospect of having this paper—for the two are but one paper in different forms, so far as the main aim (religion) is concerned—revived again, with a prospect of their continuance on a sure foundation. We may expect them every week, after the delay of a week more, to allow new names to come in. A. B. G.

THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

Br. Sawyer, in commenting in a late Union, on the project of establishing a Theological Library in the Central Association, seems to inquire, whether donations from any section of the State, will not be thankfully received. Most certainly will they! We hope, too, to be able to establish a Library, the benefits of which will not be confined to this Association alone. But in endeavoring to ascertain the opinions of our brethren on the subject, and to know what prospect there is of success, we thought it best to confine ourselves to the limits of the body in which the plan originated. If practicable in those limits, it will certainly be so, if made a Library to which nearly all our brethren in Central New-York will contribute, and may have access. We hope the brethren addressed by the circular, are busy in attending to the requests there made. A. B. G.

DESTITUTE SOCIETIES

May now find an opportunity of supplying themselves with the preached word, by notifying us of their wishes; as several brethren have expressed a willingness to locate in this vicinity and the adjoining counties. If I mistake not, there are several societies in this section who have complained that they could not get a preacher.

SERMONS.—We have published the sermons, and long articles on hand, as fast as we could conveniently find room for them. A sermon that occupies more than three pages of our paper is a difficult article, inasmuch as we have to set up nearly the entire paper in that case, before we can put the first form to press—a difficult matter when our printers are hurried. We ask the exercise of patience, therefore, on the part of Br. Brown for dividing his excellent discourse, after delaying it as long as we have done. A. B. G.

☞ As it will necessarily take our travelling agent some weeks to visit all the places on his route, we hope no one who has any money ready for us will wait for him to call on them, for we are in immediate want of all that is or can be collected for us. As Postmasters have a right to remit free of expense, all who are friendly will undoubtedly accommodate our friends in that way, if desired. G. & H.

We learn that the labors of Br. D Pickering with the Universalist society in Buffalo, are discontinued in consequence of the pecuniary embarrassments of that society. A. R. B.

NEW AGENTS.—S. G. Crawford, Havana—John Ferris, Ithaca—N. Crocker, P. M. Lansingville—Lyman P. Ackins, Speedsville—Rev. J. Gallagher, of Pottsville, Pa., is authorized to act as agent wherever he may travel.

Br. Tompkins—Credit Miss Margaret Pratt, Farmington, $2 for the Repository, and discontinue at end of year; Miss H. Hoyt, Batavia, Genesee co., $2, and Rev. Wm. Andrews, Wolcott, the balance due from him, viz., $1.50.—Charge the amount, $5.50, to us. Mrs. A. Greene, of Buffalo, N. Y., did not receive the 12th [May] number of vol. 7, 1839. Please forward. G. and H.

Br. Bazin—H. Barden, of Benton, has not received his September and November numbers of the Expositor.

NOTICE.

All persons, Booksellers excepted, who have any of my 2d Inquiry remaining unsold, in the State of New York, will confer a favor to send them immediately to Messrs. Grosh and Hutchinson, Utica.

W. BALFOUR.

REMEMBER,

All persons indebted for previous volumes, of whose responsibility we have not received some definite information, will have their papers discontinued at the close of this volume. The surest pledge of their responsibility, is, payment in full before the close of the volume.

Agents will please bear the above in mind, and make returns and reports long enough before the close of the volume, so that we may not strike off those who have paid, or who are responsible. And all such subscribers will remember, if mistakes are nevertheless made, that we will gladly correct all errors, on their being made known to us. G. & H.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THERE'S GLOOM AROUND THY HEARTH, MY HOME.

There's gloom around thy hearth, my home.
There's gloom around thy hearth;
What direful foe with ruthless hand
Hath swept thee in his wrath?

Thy shining lights are passed away,
Thy stars no more I see;
E'en stript in every cherished flower,
Thou'rt home no more to me!

Oh, what are all life's numerous joys,
If none with us to share?
The scenes which once the soul could charm,
But idle mockery are!

In vain at twilight's wonted hour,
I turn my steps to greet
The welcome smile, the throbbing heart—
An empty void I meet!

I list to every passing breeze,
And fancy in each moan,
I hear some well-remembered word,
Some old familiar tone!

'Tis night!—I'll haste me to my couch;
Thou God of sleep, be kind!
Let me once more in happy dreams,
The loved and loving find!

Ye plumy warblers, hush your notes,
Nor early tune your song;
That dream of bliss—that taste of heaven,
Your silence may prolong! E. R.

THE ART OF WRITING.

The Rev. J. Williams, in his "Narrative of Missionary Enterprise," gives the following interesting anecdote:

"In the erection of this chapel," (at Barot onga) "a striking idea of the feelings of an untaught people, when observing for the first time the effects of written communications. As I had come to work one morning without my square, I took up a chip, and with a piece of charcoal, wrote upon it a request that Mrs. Williams would send me that article. I called a chief, who was superintending his portion of the work, and said to him, 'Friend, take this, go to our house, and give this to Mrs. Williams.'

"He was a singular looking man, remarkably quick in his movements, and had been a great warrior; but in one of the numerous battles he had fought, lost an eye, and giving me an inexpressible look with the other, he said. 'Take that? she will call me a fool and scold me, if I carry a chip to her.' 'No,' I replied 'she will not: take it, go immediately, for I am in haste.' Perceiving me to be in earnest, he took it, and asked, 'What he must say;' 'the chip will say all I wish.' With a look of astonishment and contempt, he held up the peice of wood, and said 'How can this speak? Has this a mouth?' I desired him to take it immediately, and not spend so much time in talking about it. On arriving at the house, he gave it to Mrs. Williams, who read it—threw it away and went to the tool chest, whither the chief, resolving to see the result of this mysterious proceeding, followed her closely. On reciving the square from her, he said, 'stay, daughter, how do you know that this is what Mr. Williams wants?' 'Why,' she replied, 'did you not give me a chip just now?' 'Yes,' said the astonished warrior, 'but I did not hear it say anything.' 'If you did not; I did,' was the reply; 'for it made known to me what he wanted, and all you have to do is to return it as quickly as possible.' With this the chief leaped out of the house, and catching up the mysterious piece of wood, he ran through the settlement with the chip in one hand and the square in the other, holding them up as high as his arms would reach, and shouting as he went, 'See the wisdom of these English people; they can make chips talk; they can make chips talk!' On giving me the square, he wished to know how it was possible thus to converse with persons at a distance. I gave him all the information in my power; but it was a circumstance involved in so much mystery, that he actually tied a string to the chip, hung it around his neck, and wore it some time. During several following days we frequently saw him surrounded by a crowd, who were listening with intense interest while he narrated the wonders which the chip had performed."

A Good One.—A few years since, an aged clergyman in the western part of this country, speaking of the solemnity attached to the ministerial office, said that during the whole term of forty or fifty years that he officiated therein, his gravity had never but once been disturbed in the pulpit.—On that occasion while engaged in his discourse, he noticed a man, directly in front of him, leaning over the railing of the gallery with something in his hand, which he soon discovered to be a huge quid of tobacco just taken from his mouth. Directly below, sat a man, who was in the constant habit of sleeping at meeting, with his head leaned back, and mouth wide open. The man in the gallery was engaged in raising and lowering his hand and taking an exact observation, till at last having got it right, he let fall the quid of tobacco and it fell plump into the mouth of the sleeper below! The whole scene was so indescribably ludicrous, that for the first and last time in the pulpit, an involuntary smile forced itself upon the countenance of the preacher. The unexpected intrusion of so unpalatable a mouthful awoke the sleeper, and he never was known to indulge in the practice afterwards.

Cheerfulness.—It is better to tread the path of life cheerfully, skipping lightly over the thorns and briars that obstruct your way, than to sit upon every hedge, lamenting your hard fate. The thread of a cheerful man's life spins out much longer than that of a man who is sad and desponding. Prudent conduct in the affairs of this life is highly necessary; but if distress succeed, dejection and despair will not afford relief. The best thing to be done when evil comes upon us, is, not lamentation, but action; not to sit and suffer, but to rise and seek the remedy.

Powers.—An Oxford student joined, without invitation, a party dining at an inn—after dinner he boasted so much of his abilities, that one of the party said, "You have told us enough of what you can do, tell us something you can not do?" "Indeed," said he, "I can not pay my share of the reckoning."

Unlucky Number.—Dr. Kitchener was once at a dinner when thirteen persons were present, when somebody gravely said was an unlucky number. "I admit," said he, "that it is unlucky in one case." "What case is that?"—"Where there is only dinner enough for twelve."

DEATHS.

In Bainbridge, October 29, Mrs. Eveline Johnston, wife of Deacon Levi Johnston, and daughter of Mr. Daniel S. Buck, aged 31 years. Her departure was almost instantaneous. It is supposed to have been caused by a fit of the apoplexy. She has left a partner, four little children, parents, brothers and sisters, and a large circle of other relatives and friends to lament her early exit. We know we speak the sentiments of those most acquainted with her, when we say that very few possess those qualities which make them ornaments in all the relations in which they are placed, and the stations they occupy, to as great an extent as did Sister J. None ever performed the duties of a child, a sister, a wife, a mother, a neighbor or friend, in a manner better calculated to enhance the happiness of all with whom she was connected—and none ever felt a deeper interest in the welfare of those by whom she was surrounded.

In profession and in practice she was a Universalist Her life proved this doctrine good to live by. The Universalist society and church, of which she was a member, sadly deplore her removal—but they believe she also belonged to the general assembly and church of the first born—and their faith lifts the curtain of eternity and encircles a universe as the communicants of the same, in the haven of rest and the land of repose, beyond the reach of sorrow, imperfection or pain. Her relatives are deeply afflicted and realize the extent of their loss, but they too are cheered by the prospect of meeting their departed friend, with all who die in Adam, made alive in Christ, where parting shall be known no more forever. The funeral was attended on the 31st, at the meeting house in South Bainbridge, by congregated hundreds who assembled to embalm her memory with their tears—and by request, the writer delivered a discourse from Matt. ix: 22—"Daughter, be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole." J. T. G.

In Greene, September 16th, Mrs. Tryphena Mead, aged 52 years, leaving a husband and ten children to mourn their loss She was a kind companion, an affectionate mother, a worthy woman. Her funeral was attended on the 18th, by a large concourse of relatives, friends, and neighbors, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered by J. T. G.

In Guilford, of scarlet fever, September 15th, Caroline L., aged one year and three months; and on September 25th, Sarah Ann, aged four years and five months, interesting daughters of Mr. James Rhodes. Thus, in a few days, has our respected brother and his amiable partner, been deprived of two lovely children—and the eldest under circumstances peculiarly distressing. For several weeks did she linger and pine away after it was impossible to induce her to partake of any food. But death kindly came, severed the bands that bound her here and took her home to heaven.

The afflicted relatives, though surrounded by the darkness of Limitarianism, sorrow not without hope, but believe it is well with the children, and are filled with joy unspeakable, in view of the fulfillment of the promises of God and the accomplishment of the mission of that being, who took little children in his arms and blessed them, and said suffer them "to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." The funeral of the former was attended on the 17th, and of the latter on the 27th of September, and discourses delivered to numerous congregations by J. T. G.

In Nasbville, Chautauque county, October 6th, after a distressing illness of four days with scarlet fever, Edward Elvastus, only child of Pitts and Lucia M. Ellis, aged one year and eight months. Thus faded the choice, the blooming flower that once blest his most doting parents; but they mourn not as those without hope, for they are confident of meeting their loved one with a ransomed world where sorrow is no more. Funeral on the 7th, and a discourse by the writer. A. Knapp

In Chenango, September 29th, Mr. James Wheeler.—In former years he was of a limited faith, but for many years previous to his death he was a sincere believer in the restitution. It was reported that he renounced his faith before he died, but I have been informed by respectable witnesses, who were with him before he died, that it was an entire mistake. He was respected as a philanthropist and an honest man. C. S. Brown.

OCCASIONAL SERMON,

Delivered before the Cayuga Association, at Genoa, September 25, 1839.

BY REV. N. BROWN.

[Concluded.]

"Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, the morning cometh, and also the night: if ye will inquire, inquire, ye; return, come."—Isaiah xxi: 11, 12.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES, ETC.

Having now briefly traced the cause of Zion from its establishment among the Jews up to the present time, we design, in the next place, to offer such remarks upon the "signs of the times," as have suggested themselves to our mind—remarks that are intended to have a direct bearing upon the present condition of our spiritual Zion, its future prosperity and triumph—of the spread of light and knowledge in the world—intellectual, moral and religious—all shewing that the busy elements are at work, which must, sooner or later, bring about a mighty revolution in religious improvement and knowledge, and usher in a glorious Gospel day, that shall not be obscured or darkened by a single cloud!

1. The signs of the times, in a scientific, intellectual, moral and religious point of view, are truly auspicious. A deep and an anxious spirit of inquiry is abroad in the world, especially in our own favored land. New and valuable gems of knowledge are almost daily dug up from the exhaustless mine of truth, and are turned to good and important account. New and astonishing facts are constantly being developed and brought to light; facts in science and philosophy, in the arts, in morals and theology. Old and bearded errors, long cherished as important truths, have been banished from the world. Absurd and defective systems of mental and moral philosophy have been numbered with the things that were, or are fast passing away. The true philosophy of the human mind is beginning to be better understood; more rational views of it are now entertained, which render the mind worthy of an emanation from the Father of the spirits of all flesh. The inestimable works of a Spurzheim, a Gall and a Combe, have shed a flood of light upon the world, which has chased away many clouds of error that have long brooded over the human mind. Human nature, in the view of thousands, has been elevated from its long supposed degradation of innate total depravity, and has been demonstrably proved to contain the elements of moral as well as intellectual excellence. This science we believe, even unaided by divine revelation, explodes at once many of the popular religious errors cherished in the Christian church, such as total depravity, personal devil, etc., and its deductions, we think, go far in disproving the horrid dogma of endless wo! I have long entertained the opinion—even before I had any knowledge of this new science of mind—that if the philosophy of human nature was thoroughly and properly understood, there would be satisfactory evidence within and and around us, that many of the popular doctrines in theology were not only false but dishonoring to God and man! There seems to be a kind of divinity within the mind, that indignantly repels the foul charge of man's complete depravity in heart and conduct, and of his exposure to the burning wrath of his heavenly Father, whose name and nature is Love!

2. Truly this is an age of improvement; no one will dispute it, for it is acknowledged by all. New and astonishing discoveries have been made in astronomy, in geology, and mechanics, in materia medica, and physiology, and many other of the sciences. Most of these discoveries have thrown much light upon the true interpretation of the Scriptures, and have materially assisted in shielding the divine Record from the shafts and scoffs of the infidel, and in silencing the cavils of the skeptic and the unbeliever.

3. Benevolent and charitable institutions have been established and encouraged in our land, where the orphan, the unfortunate and the ignorant find peaceful asylums, and can there store their minds with the essentials of human knowledge. The facilities of intellectual culture and improvement, are multiplying continually around us. A new impulse has recently been given to the cause of common school instruction. A great degree of apathy and indifference upon this important subject, which has long pervaded the community, is beginning to be removed, and the most pleasing results have been the consequence. Libraries of useful knowledge are beginning to be established in almost every school for the improvement of the youth in mind and morals.

4. There have been within a quarter of a century past, great and radical improvements in the science of government, in many parts of the Christian world. The penal sanctions of laws have become less sanguinary and barbarous. The design of human punishments is beginning to be understood in its proper light. Instead of punishment being considered as a mere terror to evil doers—an end rather than a means—it is now admitted by the more intelligent and humane, that its object should, in a great degree, be the reformation of the punished—the criminal, of whatsoever nature his crimes may be. These admissions go far in thrusting the doctrine of endless punishment out of the Christian church. It is an assimilation to a right state of things in theology, as well as in the science of human government—of human judiciary and the administration of human laws.

Let us here examine these admissions more closely. Let it be again repeated, that it is pretty generally admitted by the more intelligent and humane, that human punishments should not be vindictive in their nature—not administered as a mere end, but as a means of reformation, for the good of the punished, as well as for the good and peace of society at large. Now this view of the subject must be admitted as rational, sound and benevolent. It will also be admitted, that all human laws and their penal sanctions, should correspond or harmonize with the divine law and its penal sanctions—should be assimilated to them, breathing the same spirit, and aiming at similar results. For as the laws of God are admitted to be founded in justice, wisdom and goodness, so all human laws should be founded in the same principles—should correspond in spirit, administration and design. Now as it is admitted that the administration of human punishments upon transgressors of human laws, should not be vindictive or retaliatory in its nature and aim, but primarily for the reformation of the transgressor and the peace of society, so, vice versa, the unavoidable conclusion follows, that divine punishment inflicted on the transgressor of the divine law, must have the same object and aim in view, showing that the punishment is not vindictive, but flows from the holy fountain of justice and goodness itself; that it comes from a kind Father, who chastises his children for their profit. This last conclusion being admitted, which legitimately grows out of the first premises already assented to, the withering doctrine of unceasing sin and wo falls to the ground forever, some of our Limitarian brethren being judges! For endless reformation would be a gross solecism in itself! No one will contend that the sinner will receive a positive good by being endlessly punished! Such punishment will be purely vindictive—the offspring of an endless hate!

Will any undertake to extricate themselves from this dilemma, by contending that God punishes as an end, but man should punish as a means; that God's punishments are vindictive, but man's should be more noble and benevolent in administration and object? What a dishonoring, what a revolting view will this lead us to entertain of the character and divine administration of that Being who is good unto all, and whose tender mercies are over all his works! Shall mortal man be more just than God? Can the stream rise higher than the fountain!

5. As intellectual knowledge is rapidly progressing, religious knowledge is gradually gaining ground. We sincerely trust that in a quarter of a century the genius of religious improvement will receive such a vigorous impulse, as will enable it to overtake the car of science, which is now moving onward in such rapidity and triumph through our favored land. Many of the more discerning of the popular religionists of the age, are beginning to find out that something must be done, and soon done, in improving and modifying their creeds and religious systems, or those creeds and systems will soon be swept away by the light of science and philosophy—of reason and intellectual knowledge. They are beginning to realize the precarious situation in which they stand. The light of reason and knowledge is beginning to pour its rays too powerfully upon their partial systems, and is fast exposing many of the absurdities of their crooked and mystical creeds!—Hence the many new lights that have already been kindled up, and the many old ones that have been extinguished. Many attempts have been made to improve, modify and remodel the old systems, and to render them less obnoxious, more congenial and corresponding with the genius of intellectual and other improvements of the age. And in some instances, a bungling piece of work it has been! Though it must be allowed, that many of the innovations and departures from the old state of things have been slightly for the better. But some of the pretended improvements are only specious and superficial, like the new gilding of an old rotten frame. In a doctrinal point of view, some glaring discrepancies have been lopped off, some rough features have been smoothed down, and, perhaps, have been whitewashed over; but as to real improvements in measures, practice and policy, we doubt very much whether there have been any that are essentially so.

6. The votaries of these doctrines have marked the many and rapid intellectual improvements of the age; they have seen that by discoveries in science and mechanics, great and important schemes and enterprises have been projected and consummated in astonishingly brief periods of time. Hence they have been anxious to introduce a corresponding state of things in religious schemes, enterprises and measures—something that would compete with the other improvements of the age. Thus we may account for the mad and phrenzied religious excitements of the day; hence the new and improved schemes and means of grace, so called—the hundreds of converts that are made in a single week out of the new material, the deformed and misshapen blocks of total depravity!

7. But these pretended improvements, introduced by new light Partialism—the results of new light measures—have had their day. These old hobbies are beginning to be worn out, and are fast losing their novelty, interest and efficacy, with the more intelligent and discerning. The subject of modern revivalism, by the use of such phrenzied and extravagant means, is beginning to be understood in its proper light. A great and disastrous reaction is now taking place—disastrous to the whole Partialist Zion! A great falling off has been the result. A death-like stupor has settled down like a leaden incubus upon scores of Partialist churches where I am acquainted in our land—a stupor not unlike that felt by the opium eater after the unnatural stimulus has subsided. But we believe a greater good will be the result of this state of things. The great mass of the community are beginning to entertain more just and consistent views of religious doctrines and measures, and a great religious revolution is at hand. But notwithstanding these objectionable measures of new-light revivalism, we should be thankful for the many real improvements that have been introduced within half a century past.

8. Look back no farther than a little before the last half century. What changes, what improvements might be named, that have taken place in the Christian church! The horrors of religious persecution unto death, have been banished the land. No longer are heretics punished in body for the benefit of the soul—hung upon lofty gibbets, and tortured at the whipping-post, or banished into desolate lands. No longer do "blue laws" disgrace our statute books, nor are poor witches subjected to the tender mercies of bigoted and superstitious religionists. No longer are infant skulls used to pave the Pandemonium courts—older and harder ones being substituted instead!—a trifling improvement here; but better than none! No longer is the idea of a literal hell of fire and brimstone tolerated among the intelligent of all religious denominations in Protestant Christendom. The doctrines of the personality of the devil, and of fallen angels, are beginning to be given up by some Limitarian preachers with whom I am acquainted. Indeed, I can not help admiring the great improvements that have been made in demon-ology, as well as in hell-ology! Really, the power of the arch adversary of souls has been surprisingly curtailed, and his influence checked, within a half century past. Many now living, can well remember the time that the foul fiend was at least an annual visitor, in propria personæ, in visible and tangible shape, and would seize his lawful prey, body and soul, and convey it to his infernal domains! He had then the power, it appears, of delegating supernatural power to his faithful followers—of making contracts with them—exchanging indentures, and of transacting a multitude of similar business in the world! Now, alas! these privileges have been vetoed. What has been the cause? Has satan been chained for a season? or has the light of reason and knowledge dispersed these doctrines of heathen superstition?

9. How improved are some of the views once entertained of God. It was once preached by a celebrated doctor of divinity, that the sight of hell torments would augment the happiness of the saints in heaven, and give them a keener relish for their enjoyment! This idea has been discarded. A celebrated catechism once read that the greatest portion of the human race were reprobated to eternal wrath and suffering, without the least foresight of faith or good works, or any thing in the creature, and all to the praise of God's vindictive justice! In vain you look into the Shasters of the Hindoos, the Koran of the Mahometan, for a doctrine more revolting and withering to the soul than this! But here has been another explosion! Where is the religionist in all our land, that will now stand forth in defence of this sentiment! It is generally taught now, that God really desires the salvation of all—that all can be saved if they will.

10. It must be admitted by every candid and discerning mind, that all the improvements in knowledge and the sciences, all the discoveries made in the arts, and in morals and theology, are assimilating to the spirit and doctrine of Universalism. All the new light that has been elicited in the study of the Scriptures—all the improved translations—all the results of critical examinations of intricate and difficult passages, words and terms, have been more and more favorable to the doctrine of the final restitution. Look at Germany—a land that has produced many of the most profound theologians and biblical critics in the world. Most, if not nearly all, of its eminent scholars and divines have given up the doctrine of ceaseless wo, and have frankly admitted that it is not taught in the word of God.

Our Partialist brethren will be willing to admit that great and important improvements have been discovered and adopted by them—that many absurdities and errors have been discarded that were once esteemed as essential truths. They are willing to admit that religious light and knowledge have rapidly increased within a century past. Permit me here to propose a few questions. Do they suppose they have already arrived at the acme of perfection in religious improvements and knowledge? Would they be willing to hazard their soul's salvation on the declaration that there is no further room for improvement? They dare not do it. What is now the opinion of some of their eminent divines, the pillars of their church, as to the relative numbers of the saved and lost? It is now supposed that the number of the lost will bear about the same proportion to the saved as the convicts of our States' prisons to the general mass of the community! Here the great mass of human beings that would once have been believed to be reprobates in the secret councils of the Eternal, have dwindled down to a mere handful. If this reduction continues in the same ratio for a century to come, there will, in all probability, by that time, be no number to reduce! The signs of the times will justify us in coming to this conclusion.

11. The elements of a great and a mighty religious epoch are busily at work, producing a revolution which must ultimately lead to universal knowledge, liberty and peace. We see it in the workings of the political and religious struggles of many nations of the earth—in the bursting forth of long dormant energies of millions of our race; we see it in the astonishing discoveries and improvements constantly made in the arts and sciences, in morals, in philosophy, and in theology. We see it in the rapid spread of religious knowledge and light in our land, in the continual explosions of errors, of absurd and dishonoring systems and theories, in the rapid spread of correct views of the character of God, and the final destiny of our race.

12. What has been the experience and observation of the watchmen upon the walls of our spiritual Zion, upon this important subject? I can not well forbear making a few appeals to them touching the interests of our Zion, before I close.

AN APPEAL.

1. Watchmen upon the walls of Zion—heralds of impartial grace and salvation!—ye who have pledged yourselves to be faithful to the precious cause in which you have cheerfully engaged; ye whose hearts have been made glad by the glorious truths of the Gospel of Christ; ye who have thought it your duty to put on the armor of the cross, and to stand up in defence of the spotless banner of a world's salvation from sin and death—watchmen, what of the night? what its sign of promise? Have ye sad or glorious news to tell us of Zion? or are your souls bowed in sadness in the contemplation of its desolation? Heaven forbid that ye should tell us that the night is still cheerless and starless to your view, and that no signs of gladdening promise glow in the religious horizon! Ah, I know ye have good news of Zion's prosperity. I see it in the kindling eye, and methinks I hear it breathed forth from the soul's depths of my beloved brethren in the ministry—"The light has come; the glory of the Lord hath risen upon us!—ALL'S WELL! ALL'S WELL!—The wilderness and the solitary places have been made glad, and the once spiritual desert is beginning to blossom as the rose!—It is the Lord's doings, and marvellous in our eyes!" Behold the uprising star of truth ascending fast to the zenith of its glory! Its mild and mellowing rays have been shed upon your hearts like sweet incense from heaven, and the shackles of bondage have fallen and thedarkness of your minds has fled away. Thousands are now basking in the genial rays shed down from salvation's star, and shouting aloud for joy!

2. It is true that a few dark clouds of error yet hang in thick and dense masses in some parts of the religious horizon. It is true that the frightful meteor of unceasing wo, occasionally darts its lurid flames athwart the heavens. It is true the burning sword of vengeance, to the view of many trembling and error-bound souls, is there gleaming in wrath, ready to descend in desolation upon a sinful world! Alas! how many horrors and fearful sights in imagination, have been seen by the victim of error and delusion! How many terrors have been conjured up—how much torment and confusion introduced into the world by creeds of frail and puny man! But all these clouds, and horrors, and fearful sights, are fast passing away, and the glorious sign of victory and triumph has appeared in the heavens! It shines upon the pages of Revelation, and tells of a glorious Gospel day that shall be ushered in!—of the downfall of spiritual Babylon, and the complete triumph of truth and righteousness in the earth!

3. Heralds of salvation, I trust that you have been in some measure the means, in the hands of God, in disseminating the light of this glorious truth in the world! I trust that you have been faithful in the discharge of the great duties and responsibilities which rest upon us as the ministers of truth and righteousness! It is a glorious, high and holy work in which you have engaged—fraught with joy and gladness to your souls—with peace and happiness to your fellow-race!

4. You have, I trust, fully made up your minds to hold fast your integrity, though superstition may snarl defiance, though bigotry may rage, though ignorance and error may present a formidable front, though persecution may hurl its vindictive shafts, though slander may dart its poisonous tongue, and popularity may sing the syren song of golden inducement and worldly honors! None of these things move you, or shake your confidence, well knowing that the pleasing consciousness of doing your duty towards God and your fellow-men—the consciousness of being engaged in the glorious cause of Heaven, humanity and truth, outweighs all considerations of a mere worldly nature!

5. What though the rage of persecution may meet you on every hand in your labors of love, remember that the Redeemer of the world, your Lord and Master, suffered in this respect far, very far more than can ever be your lot. He was persecuted even unto death! He fell a victim to the deadly hate of religious bigots and fanatics! And shall we shrink from our duty in view of the few outpourings of wrath, which the wholesome laws of our land will not permit to strike the deadly blow? Look at the fate that attended the primitive heralds of the cross. Almost every one of them suffered the martyr's doom! Do any complain of poverty? Remember, the first proclaimers of the Gospel of peace were also poor, despised, hated of men, destitute, afflicted, wandering about in sheep-skins and goat-skins, and making the caves in the rocks and mountains their abiding place! Shall we then murmur or complain? How vast the contrast between their and our situations!

6. What though religious bigots may, in view of the danger of their craft in some few instances, venture to put down, for the hundredth time, the Gospel of a world's salvation; you know that this course will be hailed by you with joy rather than sorrow. Almost every such instance within our remembrance, so far from "putting down" the doctrine of impartial grace, has put it forward—has given it a fresh impulse; and we think these spiritual Goliahs are fast beginning to find it out.

7. Instead of being disheartened or fearful, you have great reason for "thanking God, and taking courage." Only look back for a little more than half a century: behold the beloved Murray surrounded with bitter persecution, and struggling with almost every difficulty! Persecuted, assaulted by a mob in the city of Boston, where Universalism is now almost triumphant! What a glorious, what an important change has taken place! At that time the doctrine of impartial grace in our land, was like a feeble plant in the midst of a burning desert, trodden down by the feet of a hostile foe! Now, much of that desert has been converted into a beauteous and fertile plain, blossoming as the rose. Now, that once feeble plant that was drooping and withering away, has been refreshed by the waters of life and the dews of salvation; it has sprung up in luxuriance of growth, and permanency of strength; it has become as a mighty tree whose extended branches spread almost from shore to shore, throughout our vast republic! The birds of paradise sing in their midst, and the golden fruit of peace and joy is free for all to partake, without money and without price! Fifty years ago, and the stream of salvation in our land was, as it were, a humble rivulet, scarce sufficient in depth to enable the weary pilgrim to bathe his feet as he reclined upon its banks! That stream has continued to widen and deepen, until it is now a mighty river, pouring its healing waters through the whole spiritual heritage of our land! Then the star of truth shed but a few diverging and feeble rays upon the children of men, and the frightful cloud of darkness and gloom hung in thick and dense masses in the heavens. Now that star shines brightly upon the world—tells of the coming "morning," when a full effulgence of spiritual light shall pervade the whole world: Then there was but one solitary voice to sound the glad news of a world's salvation; now there are many hundreds that stand upon the walls of Zion and shout aloud in triumph, "ALL'S WELL, ALL'S WELL!" That loud-pealing shout, methinks, is wafted through the whole land, and falls upon the ears of thousands like the loud jubilees of triumph from an "army with banners!" At that glad shout, Zion rejoices, and shouts aloud in gladness. The galling chains of error fall from the spiritually bound, and the captive is free! Those who once sat in the valley of the shadow of death, now bask in the sunlight of Heaven's truth! At that loud swelling shout, hydra-headed error, like a giant Belteshazzer, trembles and shrinks aghast in more than mortal fear! Superstition, like a frowning demon with darkened brow of hate, spreads his dragon-wings and flies the land! At that shout, the enemies of a world's salvation tremble in terror and alarm. It is like the death knell to all their hopes! and their black banners fall in impotency to the ground! Their energies are palsied, their courage fails, and they ground the weapons of their unholy warfare! That shout tells of the gladness of our hearts, and of Zion's prosperity. It tells that her Zion's spiritual health and prospective triumph! It tells that her walls are yet invulnerable, that her store-houses are filled with plenteousness of provisions!

CLOSING REMARKS.

A few words more, by the way of practical improvement and application, and we have done.

Watchmen of Zion, will you permit a stripling in Israel to appeal to you upon one subject of vital importance, before I close?

Have we, as heralds of the cross, done all that has lain in our power for the upbuilding of our spiritual Zion? Have we been faithful in declaring the whole counsel of God? Have we given our whole soul to the work of evangelists, and have we made the dissemination of truth and righteousness in the world, the leading object of our lives! How have we acquitted ourselves in the sight of God? Have we come to the people of our charge in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ? Have we failed in lifting our warning voice against the hydra monster sin? Have we sought to lead the wandering prodigal back to the paths of virtue, which are alone the paths of peace? Have we comforted the mourner's heart, and pointed the despairing soul to the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world? Have we spoken peace to the troubled soul, and strengthened the weak in faith and hope? When we have seen the erring sons and daughters of humanity steeped in the black waters of iniquity, tossed about upon the troubled billows of that sea that has no rest, have we sought to reclaim them—to open to them the fountains of salvation and redeeming grace? Have we been the friends of the friendless? Have we plead the cause of the widow, wiped the tear from the orphan's eye, and smoothed the pillow of death? Have we indeed followed the example of our divine Master, and made it the great object of our lives to do good, to be of service to our fellow-race, to preach good tidings to the meek, to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening the prisons to them that are bound; to appoint unto them that mourn in Zion beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness? Have we, by the power of the Gospel of salvation, caused the heart to glow with gratitude towards God, and the soul to rejoice in spiritual liberty with rejoicings unspeakable and full of glory? If we can answer all these questions in the affirmative, then indeed we have done our duties before God and towards our fellow-men, and we shall not lose our reward—Zion shall prosper—"peace shall dwell within her walls, and prosperity within her palaces." AMEN.

Merrickville, August 1st, 1839.

To Henry Wilkison:

SIR—In withholding from you the appellation of Reverend, I do not do it for the purpose of casting reproach upon your official standing in the Methodist church, but for the plain and palpable reason that I think you unworthy of it. Can the appellative so honorable to the venerable and virtuous, be in justice applied to one who, in the face of Heaven and in the hearing of a numerous congregation, wilfully and wickedly misrepresented the conscientious opinions of others? This, Sir, you did do at a camp-meeting held in this town, July 14th, while speaking in reference to the opinions and doctrines of Universalists. Your text was Matt. vii: 13, 14. The few and the many, here spoken of, you concluded to be the whole world of mankind. The few you allowed to be the regenerated—those who were born again, or in other words, such as had agreed with the requisitions laid down by creed makers; while the scriptural signification of the word life, was entirely neglected. These, you affirmed, were they who alone were safe, and consequently in the way that led to joys on high; while the many, being in the broad way, were travelling the road to an endless hell. You then proceeded to speak of the different characters who were in the broad way, until you came to certain errorists, who believed in annihilation; but what was my astonishment when you boldly affirmed that those errorists were Universalists, and that they believed that after the wicked were destroyed, totally annihilated, they would still be saved! You then descended to derision and contempt, and invited your audience to follow your example, viz., to deride such a silly belief, affirming that they were foolish who believed it, and that the propagators of this doctrine were acting in unison with the old serpent, the devil, who first preached Universalism, saying, "Ye shall not surely die." You well knew, Mr. Wilkison, that the laws of the country forbade a reply on the spot without your consent, and you, coward like, took this mean advantage, ensconced yourself behind its bulwarks, and from your secure retreat, exultingly and repeatedly exclaimed, that your potent charges maugred all contradiction. This, doubtless, was the most summary and convenient method of disposing of the incontrovertible and scriptural views of Universalists, and the only one in which you could possibly be successful. Had you at the time been under the moral and restraining influence of Universalism, which teaches the certainty of punishment, and that God will by no means clear the guilty, methinks you would have counted the cost, and have come to the salutary conclusion, that victory obtained at the expense of truth, would be purchased at too high a price; but, unfortunately for the cause of truth and virtue, you teach a different doctrine, viz., that God will not render to every man according to his works, but if the individual repents, God will forgive him both the transgression and the punishment. Verily, this looks most like preaching the doctrine of the old serpent, and in my opinion opens wide the flood-gates of iniquity, by holding out to the sinner a sure and infallible way to escape the wrath of God, which the Scriptures of divine truth inform us is revealed from heaven, against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men.

Allow me, Sir, to inquire from what source you derived your information respecting the sentiments of Universalists? This, doubtless, is a knotty question for you to answer, for I confidently affirm that they are not to be found in their writings; nor are they promulgated from the pulpit by their public teachers. I again reiterate the inquiry, from what source did you obtain them? Was it not in your own distempered brain that they had their origin? Was it not the cankered excrescence of your own imagination? Did it not once occur to you that you were bearing false witness against your neighbors, and that all liars shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and with brimstone, or did you come to the conclusion that the end would sanctify the means? But all this was in perfect keeping with your graceless assertion, that sinners could not be saved without the preaching of an endless hell; whereas my Bible informs me, that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin, and that the goodness of God, and not the fear of hell, leadeth men to repentance. Dr. A. Clarke, whose orthodoxy in faith you can not consistently question, says, in a note on the 111th Psalm, that proclaiming the eternal mercy of God in Christ, is more likely to persuade sinners to return to their Maker, than all the fire of hell. Had you given liberty at the close of your lecture, I should most cheerfully have met and refuted your calumnies, and will still do so, at any convenient place in this town, whenever you may signify a desire to investigate the subject.

In conclusion, Sir, permit me to say that I entertain nothing but the kindest feelings towards you, and though my language may savor somewhat of severity, still it is designed as a medicine to remedy your moral malady. Desperate diseases require desperate remedies. Sincerely hoping that it will yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness, I subscribe myself your friend,

THE WILL OF GOD.

BY MISS H. J. STONE.

"The Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it? and his hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?"
ISAIAH xiv: 27.

These are the words of the true prophet of God. Isaiah, in all his prophecies, speaks the more plainly and pointedly than either of the others. He seems to have had clearer views of God's will and purpose, of the coming of Christ, of his mission, life and sufferings, and of the final consummation of all things, than any other person that lived prior to the Gospel day, or dispensation. So perfectly do his prophecies agree with unquestionable facts that have since transpired, that a child in years, must be struck with the similarity which they present. We can not, therefore, feel to distrust the prophecies, or doubt their true inspiration from God. Whatever, then, they contain, we must receive as from the Almighty himself!

First, then, we learn that the Lord of hosts hath purposed. What this purpose is, we must learn from his sacred word, and from that alone. We have nothing to do with human, man-made creeds; the Bible shall be our only guide. What hath He purposed? Is it, as some would fain have us believe, that God, the mighty maker, upholder and supporter of all things, has created, of his own good will and pleasure, creatures made subject to vanity, disease and death, not willingly—dependent upon him for life and breath, and every blessing which they enjoy—capable of reasoning, comparing and judging almost to an infinite extent—endowed with the capacities of love and friendship, which, when drawn out, ennobled and purified, assimilates them to God and to angels—for the express purpose of passing them by, or leaving them to utter destruction—while others, no better by nature or practice, are, by the irresistible power of God, compelled to repent, and thereby escape endless perdition? Is this the purpose of the Lord of hosts? If so, his own almighty arm must disannul it! Has he not sworn by himself, because he could swear by none greater, that unto him every knee shall bow, every tongue confess that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength? Has he not said, "I am the Lord, I change not"? We see, therefore, this can not be his purpose. A being of infinite wisdom could never have purposed a thing which his own benevolence and love would wish to disannul.

The apostle Paul informs us what this purpose of God was. Let us hear him.—"Wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence, having made known to us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him." Here, then, we see comprehended the purpose of Almighty God; and who shall disannul it? "His hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?" For what is it extended? To save a world lying in wickedness. But the question is often asked, will the whole world ever be saved? We answer, the arm of Omnipotence is outstretched, the hand of an infinite Jehovah is swaying the sceptre of righteousness over the whole earth, and who shall turn it back? Will feeble man attempt to say that he has power? As well might he attempt to number the particles of which this ponderous globe is composed.

When will men learn to think of God as they ought? when understand his infinite and adorable attributes? We sincerely hope, and confidently believe, that the time is not far [illegible] when those heathenish notions which now distract and paralyze the attempts of the Christian church for the spread and diffusion of Gospel light and truth, will be known only in name, recorded in the annals of the past! The Sun of Righteousness has already arisen on our delightful shores; its bright, invigorating beams have already pierced through the dark shades and thick intervening fogs of superstition; some of the dismal and solitary places become beautiful to behold: the rose of universal love and benevolence sheds its sweet perfume to the air around; the noxious weeds of Partialism, election, reprobation and infant damnation, have withered and vanished away, as if touched by the finger of death! "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will to men!" "This is the Lord's work, it is marvellous in our eyes."

But there are yet fields waving with harvest's white, wherein no laborer has yet entered, to thrust in the sickle and reap. Oh, ye laborers in the vineyard of God, be of good courage—fear not—be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might! Go forth at early dawn, and sow the good seed—be faithful in season and out of season—let nothing impede your progress or stay your hands!—for ye shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing your sheaves with you. "They that sow in tears, shall reap in joy." Such is the blissful promise to you, ye servants of the living God. Oh, embrace it, and live upon it! Your work is an arduous one; your duties are many; your trials not few, or your afflictions light. If you are in deed and in truth preachers of righteousness, followers of Christ, "in the world ye shall have tribulation," saith the Saviour. He knew, by painful experience, what his true followers must pass through. Still he would not have you disheartened. "I have overcome the world." So may you, by the same mighty power and spirit of the Gospel. Oh, then, go forward—look not to earth for thy reward, nor to man for thy praise, for thou shalt have treasure in heaven." "Come, follow me." Carry the glad tidings of a world's redemption to earth's remotest bounds. Proclaim Jesus and the resurrection to all the sons of mortality! Tell them of a risen Saviour, who has triumphed over the last enemy of feeble man—who has brought life immortal, glory unending, joys that never fade or wax old as do those of earth, to light, for every son and daughter of the human race. Let your whole life be conformed to the spirit of the Gospel. Let actions speak louder than words, for they are more convincing. You have every thing on your side. The prayers of every heart—the desire of angels—the assurances of a crucified Saviour—the will of God.

CONSOLATION TO MOURNERS.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

"All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass," is the language of inspiration, and how faithfully do we see it verified in scenes which are every day passing before us.—Experience is daily and hourly teaching us the solemn truth that nothing of an earthly nature is stable or enduring. Change and fluctuation are written upon the proudest monuments and the most enduring forms of earth! Yea, "passing away" is inscribed upon the very front of all created things!

In Spring the earth puts forth the tender plant; Summer beholds it in all its beauty and glory; in Autumn it withers, fades away, and dies. In the morning of Summer all nature is clad in her richest robes of "living green;" anon its beauty fades, "the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away."

Even so is it with man. He, with all his beauty, pride, and glory, must yield to the unsparing hand of time, and go the way of all the earth.—Sometimes he is cut down in early spring-time, in the very infancy of his days. Sometimes in youth he withers away like the flower just blossoming, when touched by the chilling frost. Again, he must depart from all the scenes of earth and joys of time in the very pride of manhood, when youth is ripening into maturity, and promising fair to yield a rich and abundant harvest of virtue and peace to beguile the tediousness of old age.

But notwithstanding these things are so, yet it is truly a painful fact. We all know, that by the laws of our physical nature, our bodies must sooner or later moulder back to earth and mingle with their mother dust. Yet this solemn truth oftentimes brings with it many painful reflections.—Death separates the nearest and the dearest relations of earth. It severs those strong ties of the soul which bind us with the cords of undying love and affection to companions, kindred and friends. Perhaps I should say it removes the object of our heart's dearest affections from us, rather than severs the holy ties which bound them to us. For it is one of the purest and holiest principles of our nature that unites kindred hearts in the strong bonds of love—and one which the "pale king of terrors" can not destroy. Those who are near and dear to us on earth, and especially to those who are united to us by the strong, the holy, the enduring ties of wedded love, we cling to through life with all its fluctuations and changes, with all its joys and sorrows, with a tenacity that defies the hand of time, and that will not be baffled by the approach of the stern monarch of the tomb. No! those we love we will rejoice with in prosperity, we will stand by them in adversity, we will watch over them in sickness, we will bend over their couch in the last moments of dissolving nature, and with our own hands, close their eyes in death! Nor is this all. We will follow them to the silent mansions of the dead; and even there, as the cold earth closes over them, we would bury with the dear dust our hearts' holiest and purest affections!

Oh, how strong must be those ties of holy affection which bind kindred and friends together! How strong, how enduring those cords of deep and heartfelt love which unite the faithful and devoted husband, and the young and blooming bride in one holy union! And the separation!—Oh, it must be like tearing asunder the very vitals, like separating the heartstrings of human existence! Oh, if there is a time in the varied events which make up the sum of human life, when the heart needs consolation, when the "balm of Gilead" should be administered to bind up the broken affections, and when "the oil of joy" should be poured into the lacerated bosom, it is when the young wife, whose life is brought nigh unto the tomb by the wasting hand of disease, and who has never known that there was aught of discord to disturb the holy joys of domestic felicity—it is when she is called to bid the last farewell to the companion of her bosom, the loved one of her heart, one who was as near and dear to her as her own life. At such times, when the heart is torn with anguish, and the soul is bleeding at every pore, how valuable are a few truly sympathising friends, whose tears flow freely for other's wo. Then it is a virtue to "weep with those that weep, and to mourn with those that mourn."

And when the lifeless remains of the loved one are removed to the sanctuary of the Most High, and the mourning group are gathered around, and the man of God appears in the sacred desk, oh, if there is consolation in "the glorious gospel of the blessed God," then is the time that it should be administered to the broken heart. Then, above all other times, should the blessed hopes, and the precious promises of our holy religion be unfolded to the weeping, disconsolate soul in all their beauty, loveliness and glory. And he is not worthy of the sacred station he occupies, he is a traitor to the cause of God and of humanity, who will seize upon such opportunities to harrow up still more deeply the already agonized feelings of the heart, to pour gall and wormwood into the lacerated bosom, the wounded, bleeding soul of the mourner, who will seek to root out the blessed hopes inspired by the Gospel of Jesus, and to implant in their stead the barbed arrows of death and despair! Oh, the anguish, the deep, untold anguish the heart must then endure, when, obliged under such circumstances, to sit and listen to the wild breakings, and the frantic ravings of a man, the very tone of whose voice, whose every feature, and every action, is calculated to strike terror, dismay, and horror to the sensitive heart; and who instead of preaching "Jesus and the resurrection," and the hope of eternal life, sends forth from his surcharged imagination the horrors of quenchless fire, the terrors of eternal perdition, and the rayless blackness of endless despair!

This is no fancy sketch, no picture of the imagination. It is solemn reality. These things we have seen with our own eyes, and heard with our own ears, and they are still fresh in the memory of many, for they transpired in our own little village but a few days ago. We would that it were not so, and we would gladly let the subject pass in silence, but our duty, as one "set for the defence of the Gospel," and called to administer "comfort to all that mourn," requires that we should place the circumstances on record, and raise the warning voice in favor of injured and insulted humanity! If we speak plain it is because the subject demands it. We must discharge our duty, however painful may be the task.

But little more than one year ago, the amiable, the gentle-hearted, the confiding Caroline Lewis became the happy bride of the upright, the virtuous, the devoted Richard P. McOmber. It was a deep, a holy love that united them together, and blessed were the fruits of that union. Peaceful and happy, bright and joyous were the days of wedded life to them. They were not professors of religion, yet each was all that the other could desire in a companion for life. No harsh word, no unkind look ever intruded itself to mar the joys of their happy fireside! The stranger was invited to partake of their hospitalities, and the herald of the cross met there a hearty welcome. We speak from experience, for we have been at their house, we have enjoyed their hospitality and their society; we have also witnessed their mutual affection for each other, and we have often thought that the picture of domestic felicity there exhibited, was enough to bring the blush upon him who scorns the society of woman, and looks with disgust upon the joys of wedded life.

But human happiness is not perfect, and theirs was too near so to continue long. The cup of bitterness must be presented to the lips—yea, it must be drank! And he who was, but yesterday, as it were, in the enjoyment of usual health, to-day is laid upon the couch of languishing and disease, and to-morrow falls a prey to the cold embrace of death! Oh, the deep, deep anguish that filled the soul of the bereaved companion in the first hours of her sorrow, can not be described! We will not even attempt it. We will pass over this interval, and follow on to the house of God, the scene of the sacred solemnities of the funeral service. There are the slumbering remains of the departed; there the little group of mourners, clad in the sad habiliments of wo, and around is a large and sympathising audience.—Anon. he who was called to administer the healing balm of consolation to the mourning soul, and whose duty it is, "not to break the bruised reed," arises in the sacred desk; the heart of the widow beats quick with the fond hope that the words of consolation would now fall sweetly upon her ear, and sink gently into her heart, saying, "peace: be still!"

But hark! his voice salutes her ear! But oh, its very first tone strikes terror to the heart, and bids her prepare to meet the heaviest curses of bigotry's scorpion tongue! She hears not the mild and gentle accents of "the Gospel of peace," but the rough, hoarse thunderings of "Mount Sinai!" Instead of saying to her, as Jesus said to Martha, "thy brother"—thy husband "shall rise again," and of pointing her forward to that blissful period when "all who die in Adam shall be made alive in Christ," and forever "live unto God," he left her nothing to hope, but every thing to fear—the blackness, the darkness, the hopelessness of endless despair!

It was too much for her sensitive heart to bear, and more than once was she heard to say, "he will kill me!" The prayer and discourse, though interspersed with numerous fiery epithets from the infernal regions, were yet as cold as the icebergs of Greenland, and would have completely frozen the feelings of every benevolent soul, had they not been dissolving in agonizing sympathy for the wretched, sorrow stricken, mourning friends!

We sat where we could behold the workings of her countenance, and we beheld pictured there the very image of despair, and when she raised her eyes and their searching glance met ours, the dark waves of sorrow rolled in upon the soul, and tears flowed from our eyes, and we would fain have gone even then, and whispered in her ear, "in accents sweet as angels use," the blessed assurance of Jesus: "I am the resurrection and the life," and pointed her away to the "spirit land" where "mortality shall be swallowed up of life," and when the children of universal humanity, made free from the bondage of sin and death, and clad in the shining robes of immortality, and incorruption "can not die any more, being equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection!" Dear sister, may this blessed faith and glorious hope be yours. May they sustain you in all the trials and afflictions of life, and in the hour of death, cheer and animate you with the prospect of a blessed re-union with your departed companion, in a world where sorrow and sighing can never come. Amen.

THE GOSPEL A PERFECT LAW OF LIBERTY.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

The Gospel, which is a law, is perfect when compared with the law of Moses. This law was but a shadow of that which was to come, and could not make men perfect. It could not bring them out from the bondage of sin. It could not wash and make clean the inner man, neither change nor renovate the heart and affections. The language of the Apostle is full and clear upon this point. "For the law," he says, "having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never, with these sacrifices which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect. For then they would have ceased to be offered; because the worshippers once purged, should have have had no more conscience of sins. But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year."

Now the Gospel, as is plain to be seen, is a perfect law, when compared with the law of Moses. It has its effect internally. It speaks to the heart and the conscience of man. It demands not merely the homage of the outward man, but the homage of the soul likewise. And the one who embraces the Gospel in its fulness, is made to act from pure, and honest, and upright motives. The springs of action are purified. He does not act from mere selfish motives, but from those that every enlightened conscience would approve, and those that are honorable and exalted in the sight of heaven!

Says the Psalmist, "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul." This the Mosaic law never could do; it merely influenced the external conduct of man; it did not reach the heart and the affections. It is the Gospel that converts the soul, and hence it may be said to be perfect.

But this law of liberty is perfect in a more exalted sense: it will finally convert every soul, and bring every wanderer back to God. It shall not fail in this. It shall go on from conquering to universal conquest. Its renovating and redeeming influences shall go from nation to nation, and from city to city, and from village to village, and from heart to heart, until error, and sin, and unbelief have been banished from the universe of God—until every altar of superstition has been thrown down—until every heathen temple has been demolished—until all darkness, and bigotry, and fanaticism has been driven from the world, and light, and knowledge, and liberty, and truth, and salvation triumphantly prevail in every land!

BR. BUSHNELL'S CASE AGAIN.

Since I wrote the article published in our last, I have seen the statements by Brs. S. R. Smith and L. C. Browne, published in the Trumpet, in which the false statements of Mr. Sprague, published in the misnamed Zion's Herald, were in part refuted. But the following, from the amiable and devoted wife of our suffering brother, does the work of refutation so thoroughly, and yet so briefly, and is so unaffectedly simple and modest in its statements, that I give it the preference in inserting it in place of either of the others. It will be seen that I erred in supposing that Br. B. was first afflicted in Pownal—it was in Schenectada.

Bennington, November 25th, 1839.

Br. GROSH—The following is taken from Zion's Herald, a Methodist paper printed in Boston.

"A FACT FOR UNIVERSALISTS.

"Mr. Jesse Bushnell once experienced religion, and joined the M. E. Church on trial, and for a while bid fair to be useful in the cause of God. After this, he backslid and embraced the God-dishonoring infidelity of Universalism. Being gifted, and somewhat eloquent, he engaged in the preaching of their "blessed doctrine," I suppose for the "salvation of the world." During his ministry, he had an appointment at West Pownal, Vt. Before his coming to fulfil this appointment, a very pious young woman, Juliet B., felt her soul peculiarly afflicted that this soul-deceiving doctrine should be disseminated among that people, and she made it a matter of long and special prayer, that if it were right, God might bless it to the conviction of the people; but if it were wrong, Mr. B. might be confounded.

"The time came,—the congregation and speaker assembled. He commenced discoursing this "doctrine of devils," and had got about half through his discourse, when Heaven or something else, struck him dumb. He was taken to his home, where he has now for about four years been utterly unable to speak, except in the lowest whisper: a marked and striking monument of the God-abominated doctrine of Universalism, also a strong encouragement to persevering prayer for the confusion of this soul-damning delusion. He now lives at Pownal. What will Universalists say to this? Yours, E. SPRAGUE.

"Williamstown, Mass., October 18, 1839."

As Mr. Sprague has undertaken to tell a fact, but has failed in some respects, I will endeavor to state the circumstances as they are, with the wish of Mr. Bushnell and myself, that you would insert Mr. Sprague's article in your paper, and make such remarks as you think proper.

In the first place, he states that Mr. B. joined the M. E. Church on trial. This is not so. He never joined that church, neither did he ever embrace their doctrine, but has been for years a believer in the doctrine he now enjoys. Four years, last May, we left Fort Plain, for the purpose of visiting his father, who resides in Bennington, Vt., instead of Pownal. Mr. B. had an appointment at Schenectada, where we accordingly stopped. While there, he preached three discourses—two during the day, and one in the evening. He was just closing his evening address, when his voice failed. He however recovered it in a few moments, so as to dismiss the congregation.

We proceeded the next morning on our journey. Mr. B. was well, and experienced no inconvenience in talking, except being considerably hoarse at times. The 9th of June we went to Pownal, to visit a relative of Mr. B. It was afternoon when we got there. There was no appointment given out, Mr. B. not expecting to preach. Quite late in the afternoon, a friend came in, and wished to have Mr. B. preach that evening. He accordingly notified the people. I think the young lady could not have had much time for "long and special prayer." Well, "the time came—the congregation and speaker assembled." Mr. Bushnell made his introductory prayer, and had a little more than named his text, when his voice left him, as it had done at Schenectada.—He was, in less than a fortnight, able to ride to his father's, though his voice was weak, as well as his general strength. The last of July, we left Bennington for Fort Plain, where we remained till the next March. He gained slowly while at Fort Plain—was able to converse about all of the time, and during the winter his health was quite good, and his voice considerably strong. In March following, we again came to Bennington, as Mr. B. was not as well as he had been, and in April was taken down, and has been confined to his bed, neither has he spoken a loud word since.

Mr. B. is very feeble—does not gain any strength. He has had several very sick spells since I was out West. As soon as he gets to be more comfortable, he is taken down worse again, so that he has no chance for gaining health or strength. Yours, etc. ADELIA BUSHNELL.

I have italicised a few passages in Mr. Sprague's veritable story, and in the letter, in order to draw the reader's attention to them more particularly. He will very readily see that this "very pious young lady, Miss Juliet B.," in order to magnify her influence with the Lord, has not been careful to adhere to facts. She stated, (according to Mr. Sprague,) that Mr. Bushnell had an appointment there, and that she commenced praying before he came; whereas it appears that no such appointment existed until after Br. B. came, and then only a few hours before the meeting! So much for this "very pious" falsehood, intended to operate on the ignorant and superstitious. If Mr. Sprague is not a very Jesuit, practicing on the Popish motto, that "the end justifies the means," he will blush at having been drawn into publishing such a silly and easily refuted story—and if he is an honest man—I will not say a Christian—he will publish a refutation of the entire story, with an humble apology to a deceived Methodist community, in the same paper that gave the story. We will see.

Finally—dear reader, do not the boasted "long and special prayers" of the "very pious young lady, Miss Juliet B.," fully prove my "Anecdote II," in our last week's paper, perfectly in point? "Wife, the brindled cow has eaten up the great grindstone." "I told you how it would be!" A. B. G.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

A committee of the New-York legislature reported last Winter, that it was dangerous to abolish the punishment of death—that to do so, would lessen the restraints, and increase the amount of crime, etc. I have not the report before me, and can not; therefore, give the exact words—but believe I have given the precise meaning of their report. In this report, that committee have shown themselves ignorant of facts, or have drawn their inferences as to what would be the effect of abolishing punishment by death, in direct contradiction to the voice of history. For the history of most nations proves, that wherever and whenever executions have been increased, by rendering many crimes punishable with death, there crimes have also increased—even the very crimes, the punishment of which has been rendered thus barbarously severe. The statistics of crime in Great Britain, show clearly, that as punishment by death has been abolished, the crimes thus punished, have decreased in number. And why? Because, as the severity of the punishment was lessened, so as to bring it within the feelings of justice entertained by community, its certainty of infliction was increased. And it is a settled axiom in mental philosophy and in govermental experience, that it is the certainty of punishment, rather than its severity, that deters from crime.

Another reason may be given. As punishments become less severe and more certain, they are made more emendatory in their nature—more reforming in their influence, and thus, not only the frequency of crime, but the number of criminals is reduced. For it is not only better humanity, but also better policy, to reform a criminal, than to destroy him—to make a good and useful citizen out of the felon, than to convert him into a dead carcass—of no use but to the anatomist.

And still another, and the most powerful reason may be given, why crimes and criminals become less numerous, precisely in proportion as the punishments become less severe and more certain—less vindictive and more reformatory in their nature and operation. It is this:—All exhibitions of legalized cruelty and revenge, cultivate a spirit of malice and bloodthirstiness among those who frequently or habitually witness them. Public executions, frequently exhibited to the crowds they always draw together, can not fail to educate the people to undervalue life—to love witnessing its forcible extinction—to delight in the excitement of the animal passions that lead to crime and bloodshed. And even when such executions are private, as in this State, the knowledge of their occurrence—that they are sanctioned by law—and the excitement of feelings that precede them, and is kept alive by reading, talking of, and pondering over the details, after the execution is over—all these things must render even private executions deleterious to public morals. Hence it is, that every legal taking away of life, whether public or private, is sowing the seeds of cruelty and bloodthirstiness in the hearts of hundreds—and these seeds, when the harvest comes, can not fail to increase the number of crimes and of criminals. But the reverse is the effect of all punishments inflicted out of benevolent motives, and intended only to reform the criminal. Such punishments tend as powerfully to stir up and cultivate in the bosoms of the multitude, kindly, benevolent and compassionate feelings, as the others tend to stir up passions of wrath, hatred and revenge. And hence it is, that precisely as punishments are rendered mild, they become more certain—as they become more certain, they tend to restrain crime;—as they become more mild, they tend to reform; and as they become more reformatory, criminals are converted into good citizens;—as punishments become less cruel and revengeful, they minister less to the depraved and violent passions of men—and as men become less cruel and violent, the more atrocious crimes disappear from society. Such are to my mind, the probable reasons why crimes and criminals diminish, as the punishment of death for crimes, is changed for milder and more just punishments.

But whether my reasons are correct or not, the fact stands—that as a nation infuses humanity into its criminal code, crime decreases—that in Great Britain, the statistics of crime show this to be the case—and that, therefore, the committee of the New-York legislature, and the legislature that adopted their report, decided contrary to well established facts, recorded in the history of nations.

But it may be said that, in England, where these ameliorations of the criminal code have taken place, the light crime of theft was formerly punished with death—that we retain capital punishment only for enormous crimes—and that, therefore, however just the argument may be in regard to thefts and minor crimes, it loses weight when applied to the crime of murder, etc.

Not so. History furnishes at least one case where the punishment of death was totally abolished, even for the crime of murder—and what was the consequence?—An increase of that crime, as our New-York legislature asserts? No—no! The consequence was, that in the entire reign of that monarch (Catharine II., of Russia)—even in that semi-barbarous nation—not one murder was committed! What monarch before or after her, has reigned in Russia, the land of knout and decapitation, without having the throne stained with the life-blood of a criminal? No one.

This, however, does not appear to be a solitary case of the beneficial influence resulting from the total abolition of the punishment of death. A traveller, writing in a recent foreign journal, (quoted by the Philadelphia U. S. Gazette, of November 8, 1839,) speaking of Tuscany, and its reigning Grand Duke, says—"The present sovereign, Leopold the Second, possesses all the mild qualities of his father, without the brusquerie (rudeness) of manner which made the latter so offensive; the punishment of death is unknown in his dominions, and yet no part of Italy is so free from crime."

Oh, when will our legislatures learn to look at facts and at reason, and abolish the long tried and always barbarizing punishment of death, to try a milder and more rational punishment! Even as an experiment, the abolition of capital punishment is well worth a fair trial.

REV. ALBERT BARNES, OF PHILADELPHIA.

When an individual breaks free from the trammels of sectarism, and suffers his mind to act without restraint in the development of truth; when he disregards the chains which bigoted views would throw around the intellect, and eloquently defends liberty of thought and enlarged discussion; when he recognises the privileges of reason and the utility of thorough research, such a man is worthy of all praise and admiration. It matters not to what sect he may belong or what name he may bear—it matters not that the form of his worship may differ from that of others, or that he may subscribe to a creed which we believe varies in many important particulars from divine truth, yet, if he has sustained one fact which refers to a common right of the whole human family, and has endeavored to make known that fact to community, he is worthy of Christian regard. Truth is invariably the same, neither name nor sect can alter its principles. And though it may be invested with various forms at different times, still it is truth and should find a welcome in every mind, from whatever source it may come. And so far am I from dreaming that all truth is confined in any one sect, that I can discover some truth in all sects—truth, deserving of reverence, and which we should ever be prepared to receive in sincerity of purpose.

Rev. Albert Barnes of Philadelphia is a Presbyterian; and yet he has ably and eloquently defended some truths of the greatest importance, and to whose prevalence we can utter a sincere and hearty amen. On the exercise of reason, he presents us the following passage:

"We have sat down in pensive grief, when we heard from the lips of tyros in divinity, (as the first message which they bring us,) solemn and unmeasured denunciations of reason in matters of religion. We have asked ourselves whence the herald has derived his commission to commence an assault on what has been implanted in the bosom of man by the hand of the Almighty. Has the book which he holds in his hands told him to utter unfeeling and proscriptive maledictions on all just views of mental operations? Has God commissioned him to summon the world to a rejection of all the lessons taught by the investigations of mind, the decisions of conscience, and the course of events? Is the God who has hitherto been thought to be the God of creation and providence, coming forth, in the old age and decrepitude of the world, to declare that the fundamental principles of civil society, the judicial inflictions of his hand, the lessons taught us in parental and filial intercourse, and in the reasonings of sober men with the eye upturned to heaven, have all been delusive; and that the new revelation is to set at defiance all that has been ascertained to be law, and all that the world has supposed to be just maxims in morals? We marvel not that thinking men shrink from such sweeping denunciations. Nor do we wonder that the ministry is often despised, the sanctuary forsaken, and the day-dreams of any errorist adopted, who professes to give them proper place to the inferences drawn from the government of God,

It is a maxim, we think, which should rule in the hearts of Christian men, and

> "Most of all, in man that ministers,
> And serves the altar,"

that the world is to be convinced that Christians are not of necessity fools. And in doing this, we care not how much of sound reason, and true philosophy, and the analogies of nature, are brought into the sacred desk. The truth is, that religion sets up its jurisdiction over all the operations of the mind. And the truth is, also, that those who have done most to villify and abuse the use of reason, have been the very men who have incorporated the most of false philosophy into their systems of divinity."—Introductory Essay to Butler's Analogy, by A. Barnes, p. 58.

We think that the reflecting of all parties, will adopt the views elicited in this extract, and admit that reason should be left as free in its exercise as the airs of heaven. Nor do we think that they will refuse to adopt the principle running through the following extract:—

"The great principle is to go forth through this country, and is never to be recalled, that there is no subject pertaining to the common welfare that may not be freely and fully canvassed and examined."....."This right is secured to us by the God that made us, and is inwrought into all the elements of freedom and accountable moral agency. God has given us the right to examine all things, and investigate all opinions in science and in morals. He invites us to it by the original aspirations for truth which he has breathed into our souls, and which are as inexhaustible as the soul itself. He invites us to it in his own word; and no book ever written is so much the friend of free and ample discussion as the Bible. All his works invite us to it; the heavens gaze upon us at night, asking us to turn away from earth, and investigate the laws of their motion. The heaving tides invite us to examine them; the bud, the opening leaf, the flower of the forest, the insect, and the lion of the desert, the elements around us, nay, the metals, the solid diamond, ask us to subject all to investigation with the utmost freedom, and to learn their nature. Our institutions are all based on this freedom of investigation. It is to be assumed here that all things may be examined and discussed. We have no liberty which does not suppose this; we know none which does not admit and defend it. Herein is our warfare with the kings and tyrants of the old world; herein is our contest with those thrones of despotism that have so long tyrannized over man; herein is the reason why monarchs turn pale in their palaces, and tremble on their seats of power; herein is the contest of the Protestant religion with Papacy; herein the struggle between freedom every where and arbitrary power. The thrones of despotism in political life, in religion, in science, have stood firm just so long as the maxim could be defended, that there were some points that were too sacred to be examined. Let it be maintained that there is one principle in science or religion, one doctrine of government or maxim of law, that may not be examined, that there is one tribunal of a court, be it the inquisition or the star-chamber, that may not be examined, one custom that may not be tested by reason and the Bible, or one mineral that may not be subjected to the crucible or the blow-pipe, and liberty is at an end; a wedge is entered that may be driven until the entire fabric shall be demolished. This doctrine, that all things may be subjected to free discussion, is the only thing that now spreads alarm over the despotism of the oriental world, and that now threatens to subvert the thrones of Europe. All literature and science, as well as liberty, suppose this."....."Mind is to meet mind; thought conflict with thought; the struggling powers are to come in collision with each other, and truth is to be elicited as the spark glows from the collision of the flint and the steel. And it is to be assumed in this nation, that if there is any thing in science, morals, or public sentiment, that can be proved to be wrong, it is to be abandoned forthwith; if any public custom can not be defended, it is to be laid aside; and if there be any thing, in reference to which it is maintained that it may not be investigated, be it in morals, in habits, or in religion, it is to be assumed that that must be wrong, and that it is known to be wrong."—An Address at Hamilton College, 1836, pp. 22, 23, 24.

These are glorious, sacred principles—such, for which, were it necessary, it would be very honorable to die. They are the forerunners of the most rapid advance of truth. For when mind has no persecution in its path; when it shall cease to be a sin to think freely and speak independently; when no interested parties shall mark out the boundaries of thought in religion; when intellect can range as free among all the truths of the Gospel, as the Gospel is free in its nature; when each and every person shall possess and be permitted to exercise unobstructed inquiry to find out what indeed constitutes the doctrine of Christ; then will the knowledge of the Lord cover the earth as the waters do the great deep. May the great Master of all mind so order it.

REV. A. L. BALCH.

Our Eastern papers duly announced to us the decease of this excellent brother, at Swanzey, Mass. The following account of his happy death has since been communicated to the Trumpet by Br. John Moore, who was an eyewitness thereof. A. B. G.

"His disease for the first few days was severe, that of a 'brain fever,' or as some thought, 'an affection of the heart,' bu tfor several of his last days he was not in much distress, and was perfectly sane, and conversed upon his departure with that calmness and composure, and even joy, which the faith and hope of the Gospel only, can give. Many of his friends called to see him, whom he exhorted to continue steadfast in the cause of truth, and go forward in building up the glorious cause in which they had been mutually engaged. His brother, William S. Balch, of Providence, who stood by him, to close his eyes in death, he exhorted to faithfulness in his calling as a minister of the Lord Jesus Christ. And after having said all that he could concerning his family (his wife and son), and given directions to his brother with regard to his burial, etc., and after taking an affectionate leave of all, he desired them to sing the hymn commencing,—

> 'Come thou fount of every blessing,
> Tune my heart to sing thy grace,
> Streams of mercy never ceasing,
> Call for songs of loudest praise.'

After which he desired to be moved so that he could see the sun, which, in all the loveliness of an autumnal sunset, was just receding from his view in more senses than one—he observed the beauty and glory of the scene and remarked, 'I shall soon behold a brighter sun'—and when the light of day went down, the lamp of life went out without the motion of a muscle, or the uttering of a groan, on Monday, November 4."

LOVE OF APPROBATION.

It is a settled point, I think, that he who is over anxious to please every body, runs a great risk of pleasing none. And this is as true with reference to religious opinions as to any other subject. He who entertains an opinion which he labors to conceal, because the majority are against it, provokes that majority to the supposition that he is ashamed of what he conceals yet cherishes. Hence their displeasure is at his obstinacy in clinging to that which he either knows to be wrong, or has not the moral courage to defend, and it is greater than it would be if he dared honestly to avow his disagreement.

I do not condemn the peace-maker, but I pity him who thinks to make peace at the expense of truth, for he will never, permanently, succeed. It is proper also that we should feel a desire to secure the approbation of those whom we esteem, provided we do not think to win it unjustly. The love of approbation properly instructed is a source of happiness. But many err with respect to its office, and think it can be justly gratified by conciliating where they should condemn. But let such try the experiment once. Let them make duty their principal object, and pay that deference to truth and justice which is due to those principles, and regard the approbation of man as less happifying than the approbation of the spirit of God, and though many may frown upon them and revile them, they will find that they have been the gainers, even in human approbation; they will see the difference in value between the approbation of the wise and the sympathy of the vicious, and prefer the former, rather than the latter, with a full conviction of the truth of the declaration of the Saviour; "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you, falsely, for my sake." A. R. B.

DISCONTINUANCES.

We hope there will be none of those who pay promptly, and that all others will remember to pay up "all arrearages" before they order a discontinuance.

All subscribers who have resolved to discontinue at the close of the present volume, and who have not already given notice to that effect, are requested to give us notice, free of postage, of their intention, so that we shall receive it before the close of the year. So many delay till the very last, that we do not learn their intentions until after we have sent them several numbers of the new volume, and thus we are put to a great and unnecessary expense, and have a number of files broken—for even if the numbers are returned, they are often soiled, or disfigured by writing on the margin. Now, economy is the order of the day—we must be saved this expense and loss, and discontinuers can do it. The law allows us to hold every one as a subscriber to the next volume, who will not pay up arrearages and give timely notice of their intention to discontinue—so let every one remember and perform his duty—if it is his duty to discontinue this paper—according to law, and equity, and moral right. NEW PREACHERS.

Rev. Wm. Jackson, of South Boston, a preacher in good standing in the Baptist church, has lately embraced and commenced preaching the doctrine of God's impartial and efficient grace. He has preached Partialism for 18 years—the last 3 in Boston.

Br. N. Holden, of Lynn, lately of the Christian church in that place, has also commenced preaching the "glad tidings of great joy, which shall be [glad tidings of great joy] to all people." It is said "he will make a profitable minister of the Lord Jesus."

Br. Oliver H. Quinby, of Sacarappa, Me., has also entered the ministry of reconciliation—making the fourth preacher from that pleasant village within as many years. Br. O. H. Quinby "brings to the work a well cultivated mind, and an ardent zeal for the Redeemer's cause," and "has ever sustained an unblemished moral and Christian character." A. B. G.

MORAL TEST IN SOCIETIES.

It has been twice stated in the Union, that no moral test for membership can legally be required in religious societies in this State. Br. Sawyer (for I believe he made the statement each time) is mistaken. The law does not state who shall or shall not be members of societies—it only says who shall be entitled to vote in the election of officers. Voters are those who contribute to the funds, and regularly attend the meetings of the societies. And, in my opinion, even if the law did (as it does not) declare that such shall be members of our societies, it would be far better for us to refuse the money of immoral men, and thus exclude them, than to introduce the custom of forming churches within, and separate from, societies—as distinct bodies. Such divisions, so far as I can judge from observation and information, tend more to divide than to unite. It is a practical operation on the Partialist plan of "we saints and you sinners," that, so far from gathering the truly moral into the church, often leaves them out, and sometimes drives them out of the society also—for "no moral test" renders the fellowship of a society a doubtful mark of either decency or Universalism. A. B. G.

POETRY.

From the United States Gazette.

BEAUTY.

Upon the land, or on the sea,
Midway or high in air,
When wings the monarch eagle free,
There's beauty every where!

That path of day where rolls the sun
His chariot wheels along,
Nor stays till all his course is run,
And evening pours her song;
Ye mild blue heavens! ye clouds of gold!
That float, like ships away;
Or, lingering each, their sails unfurled,
Hang round the coast of day;
There's beauty in your spreading wings—
A majesty, and might,
That moves the heart, through all her strings,
To praise the glorious sight.

In calm or storm, alike for thee,
There's grandeur in each wave—
A beauty in that quiet sea,
While yet no ripples lave.
Pathway of wonders mid the deep!
When lifts your billows high,
And all your floods to mountains leap,
Like warriors rushing by,
White plumed, and hast'ning to the fight,
With awe in every tread,
O'erpowering grandeur holds the sight,
And fills the soul with dread.

Old tree! a thousand storms hath tried,
And pour'd their strength in vain:
There's beauty in that waning pride,
That yields to age its gain;
The victory of a century's flow—
The fruits of many a year—
The blossoms that each summer's know—
Now droop'd alas! and sere.
The lightning hath not changed a bow,
Nor thunder-bolt disturbed
A leaf, and yet thy wailing now
The forest trees have heard.

Sweet music of the mountain streams!
Whose way is o'er the plain,
There's beauty in that gurgling theme,
A grandeur in thy strain—
A melody that stirs the soul—
A voice that spirits wake,
As onward hastening to the goal,
We each our journey take.

Ay! there's a beauty every where,
Where God hath placed his hand,
In heaven, or on the ambient air,
By sea or on the land;
The flowers that grow and yield their breath;
The leaves that clothe the tree;
The summer's glow, or autumn's death,
Alike have charms for me.

Repentance.—A chap up west, lately made up his mind that "this mortal coil," hung rather heavily upon him, and finally came to the determination to shake it off, by fixing another coil about his neck, and hanging up in his own barn; but just as he was going to give the fatal kick, he recollected that aunt Debby had told him that he would die an old bachelor. He resolved that no one should have that triumph over him, of prophecying so correctly, but declared to himself that he would immediately get married, give all his effects to his wife, and then take the fatal leap. True to his intent, he got married in just three weeks from that time, but upon rising next morning he found himself completely cured of his hanging mania, and went to work in good spirits, declaring that there was nothing like a woman for curing the heart burn. We are not sure that he won't have occasion to hang himself yet.

A Fright.—Many of the coast blockade seamen in Sussex, have lost their lives by walking over the cliffs during the dark or foggy nights; and upon one occasion two of their bodies were found dreadfully mangled, within a few yards of each other, having been precipitated from a height of at least three hundred feet. The circumstances gave rise to an opinion that they had been thrown over by the smugglers. Be this as it might, some time after an officer much disliked for his activity, having fallen into an ambuscade of smugglers, they seized, blindfolded him, and tied his feet together, crying, "throw him over the cliff!—throw him over the cliff!" Disregarding his entreaties for mercy, they bore him to the edge, and pushed him gradually over, feet foremost, till his arms and chin only remained above the brink, to which he clung, by digging his finger-nails into the grass, and in this cruel position they left him. He remained thus for above an hour, in agonies of terror, screaming for help and straining every sinew to maintain his hold, till at length the blood seemed to stagnate in his arms, his strength failed—his brain reeled at the thought of the depth beneath, and he was upon the point of letting go in despair, when as a last effort, he released one hand, tore the bandage from his eyes, turned his head with horror, beheld the bottom within a yard of his feet!—the smugglers having selected a shallow chalk pit for their purpose, upon the brink of which he had been so tormentingly suspended.—London Sun.

Master and Servants.—One important cause of breach of trust, in servants and others, is rarely adverted to—a want of sufficient vigilance and superintendance in masters. A young person of unestablished principles, put into a situation of trust, where the conduct of his employer shows plainly that there is scarce a possibility of his being detected if he should make a trespass, is not done justice to; and his error, if he do err, is in large part to be ascribed to his superior. Not that we would have the culprit too easily excused, but that we would have masters do their duty in watchfulness, do we make this remark. The master is bound in sincerity to exercise a proper degree of care over his concerns, in order that all hope of safe criminality may be forbidden in his subordinates; and if he fails in this duty, we hold that he is himself guilty of a very great offence against society—that of leading its members into temptation, and perilling their best interests, in a business from which he is to be the chief profiter.

Good humor is the clear blue sky of the soul, on which every star of talent will shine more clearly, and the sun of genius encounter no vapors in his passage. 'Tis the most exquisite beauty of a fine face; a redeeming grace in a homely one. It is like the green in the landscape, harmonizing with every color, mellowing the glories of the bright, and softening the hue of the dark; or like a flute in a full concert of instruments, a sound not at first discovered by the ear, yet filling up the breaks in the concord with its deep melody.

The original of most people's grief, is suffering their desires to wander after many things, most of which are not needful, and are only productive of an imaginable good.

DEATHS.

In Middlebury, Knox county, O., July 17th, 1839, Mrs. Thankful Ashley, relict of Zebulon Ashley deceased, and mother in law of Br. Truman Strong, in the 79th year of her age. Sister Ashley in the early part of her life became thoroughly convinced of the great truths of the Christian religion and united with the Baptist church in Orwell, Rutland county, Vermont. In the year 1802, she removed to Poultney, Vermont, and united with the Baptist church in that place together with her husband. They settled in Knox county, O., in 1812, and shortly after united with the Baptist church in its vicinity, and continued active and worthy members until about the year 1820, when Br. Ashley, by a careful and attentive study of the Holy Scriptures, became a firm believer in the salvation of the whole world from sin and death through a once crucified but now risen and triumphant Saviour. But he never felt at liberty to make his sentiments known until he declared before the church that he believed St. Paul wrote the truth when he said God would have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth. He died beloved and respected by all who knew him, a pattern of morality and virtue, in his 69th year, in 1836.—The change which took place in Br. Ashley's views on religious subjects operated powerfully on the mind of his consort, but for three years did she continue to oppose the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind; nor did she yield the point till she was constrained to say that God had revealed this great and glorious truth; and from that time to the day of her death she never manifested the least doubt in relation to the salvation of the world. She was by precept and example constantly saying: behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. In her last sickness she was resigned the will of God, and declared to all that she was willing to go or stay as it should best please her God, that to her death had no terrors. To her children she said, mourn not for me, live in peace as you have done. My greatest anxiety is that you may all walk in wisdom's ways, and that God will build up Zion and prosper the church in this place, (meaning the Universalist church, with which she had united last April,) thus she died as she had always lived, in peace with God and all mankind. By request of the children, the writer tendered the consolations of the Gospel to the mourning friends and neighbors who assembled on Thursday, the thirteenth of July, to pay the last tribute of respect to her mortal remains, from 2 Pet. iii: 18.

T. Strong.

In Franklinville, October 2d, after a severe illess of about four weeks, Mrs. Sabrina, wife of Jabes F. Whitney, aged 35 years. Mrs. W. fell a prey to death in full faith and hope in that God who is the Saviour of all men: to all her opposing friends, she testified that for her to live was Christ and to die was gain. About six years before her death, she came out a full believer in impartial grace, and it influenced her life and conversation so much, that her neighbors and friends acknowledged the goodness of her faith. She bade her friends a cheerful farewell, leaving a bereaved husband and a babe four weeks old, together with eight other children. The funeral was attended on the 3d of October, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to a large concourse of relatives and sympathising friends. May our Father in heaven bless all that mourn, especially the bereaved husband and affectionate children.

Justus Todd.

In Centerville, November 1st, Mrs. Anna Bingham, consort of Nathan Bingham, aged 63 years. She was a believer in the grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men, and heeded its glorious teachings, and lived soberly, righteously and godly in this present world. That faith which is as an anchor to the soul, enabled her to bear her last illness with Christian fortitude and resignation, and she yielded up her breath in full faith of a world's salvation. Our Presbyterian brethren in that place, manifested a spirit worthy of the foliowers of the Saviour, by opening their house for the occasion; and also by their assistance in singing, for which they have our sincere thanks. May the bereaved companion and friends of the deceased, resort to the same fountain that filled the soul of their departed friend with joy and gladness, and find a full supply to drown all their sorrow and care. Funeral on the 2d.

I. B. Sharp.

In Alden, September 21st, of the typhus fever, Mr. Richard P. McOmber, aged 33 years. The funeral was attended on the 22d, at the Presbyterian meeting-house in Alexder, circumstances connected with which, require a more extended notice than would be allowable here. See "Consolation to Mourners."

On the 12th ult., at the residence of his father, Ancil Case, aged 18 years. A diabetes was commissioned to call from an affectionate family circle, the subject of this notice. The shock occasioned by this dispensation, will be the more deeply felt by this truly afflicted family, from the fact that an older son lies at the point of death, and who was, but yesterday, considered the more dangerous of the two. We can not but drop a tear of sorrow, and mourn with those that mourn, at the loss of this blooming youth.

A FATHER'S TALES ABOUT THE EARLY CHRISTIANS.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

CHAPTER ONE.

"I have been reading lately," said Mr. Wheaton one evening, as his children were gathered about him, "of the trials and sufferings of the early Christians—how they were tortured in many ways, in order to make them forsake Christ and his dear cause. And now I am going to tell you, my children, something about what I have read: and I do it to show you the great value of a Saviour's religion, and how you should cling to it, and cherish it in all time to come.—And I shall first tell you about a young lady, who was persecuted, and tortured, and finally made to die a cruel death, because she was a follower of the blessed Redeémer, who shed his blood freely for the sins of the world."

THE FEMALE MARTYR.

It was during the reign of Marcus Aurelius, Emperor of Rome, that, among many others, a female, by the name of Blandina, was taken and thrown into prison, on account of her belief in the Son of God. Here she was visited by wicked and cruel men, and told that she must give up her belief in the Saviour, and bow down to, and worship their senseless pagan idols. This she could not, and would not do. She could die, but she could not deny her Redeemer. Seeing that words could not shake her constancy, they scourged her with whips, and applied red hot plates of brass to the most tender parts of her body. But still she would not renounce her belief in the Saviour and his Gospel. Her tormentors then left her, to prepare other, and more cruel tortures.

A few days after this, Blandina and others were taken to the theatre to be exposed to the wild beasts, for the sport of cruel men and women.—A great many people were there to see the Christians torn in pieces, and to laugh at their groans and agony. One after another was thrown to the fierce and hungry lions, and at last it came Blandina's turn. She might have wept, and she might have prayed for deliverance, for it was a cruel and fearful death to die: but still she was perfectly resigned, and she went forth firmly to suffer. She was taken up and thrown to the wild beasts, but, to the wonder and astonishment of all, not one of them offered to harm her, and she was taken out again unhurt. The God who had delivered his servant Daniel from the lion's mouth, had delivered her, his suffering child, and shown his power to save. But she was not set at liberty—she was yet to suffer even more than she had suffered—because of her strong attachment to the religion of our Saviour, she was yet to die a most cruel death. In a cold, dark, damp dungeon, she was shut up for many days, and then she was brought forth again to meet the scoffs of the enemies of the cross—to be exposed again in that place, where so many of her friends had bled and died—where so many Christians had been torn in pieces by wild beasts.

She was led into the arena, whose sands were red with innocent blood, and then put into a net. When this was done, a trumpet was sounded—a gate was thrown open, and in rushed a furious wild bull, which caught Blandina on his horns and threw her high in the air. And then the people shouted aloud, and some clapped their hands, as though witnessing some innocent and laughable play. The poor girl came down heavily upon the sands of the arena; and then she was caught up again on the horns of the furious animal, who continued to toss her up, and up—the people all the while shouting—until the blood gushed in streams from her mouth and nostrils!

A sign was now given by the Emperor, who was present, and the guards, who were in waiting, drove the bull from the arena. One of them then drew his sword, and at a blow, severed the head of the poor girl from her body. She was now freed from suffering, and her spirit had gone home to glory. She had indeed died a most cruel and horrid death, but she had now gone where no pain nor death can come. And she had died a martyr to the cause of Christ. No sufferings could cause her to give up her faith in the Redeemer's Gospel—no tortures compel her to bow down and worship the idol of the heathen.

"My story is now ended," said the father, "and I hope, my children, you will often think of the sufferings and death of Blandina, and that, like her, you will cling, as long as life lasts, to the precious belief that bears us up in all trials and sufferings, and enabled the soul to triumph in the dying hour!"

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

NUMBER XVII.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

EZEKIEL—Ezekiel was the author of the book called by his name. He was a priest carried captive by Nebucchadnezzar, and settled with many others of his nation at some place on the river Chebar, or Chaboras of the Greek, which runs into the Euphrates 200 miles from Babylon. He was cotemporary with Jeremiah who was at Jerusalem, and with Daniel who lived in Babylon; though he does not appear to have had any communication with either of them.

Ezek. xii: 16. "And they (the heathen) shall know that I am the Lord."

The great object of all the divine dispensations respecting the Jews, was the instruction of the rest of mankind. It was to be made apparent, not only to the Jews themselves, but to all the world, that they were to be expelled from their country, and dispersed among all nations, as a punishment for their idolatry, and their vices.—Accordingly we find that many of the heathen nations were strongly inclined to, and some of them actually did, acknowledge and worship the God of the Hebrews. Many converts were made by means of the conviction that was carried to their minds, on seeing God's dealings with the Jews, by which they were compelled to acknowledge the true God; and Titus when he overthrew Jerusalem, was constrained to say, that if God had not been against them, he could never have taken the city.

Ezek. xx: 25.—"Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live."

The meaning of this is, that God permitted the Jews to fall into idolatrous practices. And whatever takes place in the course of Providence is in the language of Scripture ascribed to the direct agency of God.

Ezek. xxx: 13. "And there shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt: and I will put a fear in the land of Egypt."

This prophecy has been most remarkably fulfilled. This country has in succession been subject to the Chaldeans, Persians, Macedonians, Romans, Arabs, Mamelukes and Turks; nor is there the least prospect of any native Egyptian reigning in the country, or of the people recovering their former consequence.

Ezek. xxxvii: 9.—"Then said he unto me, prophecy unto the wind; prophecy, son of man, and say to the wind, thus saith the Lord God; come from the four winds, O earth, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live."

Here we see that the difference between a dead man, and a living one, is nothing more than the property of breathing. Nothing is said about an immaterial, immortal soul, entering into them, or of any such thing having formerly belonged to them, and having been in some other place while the body was dead. Nor is any such thing said either in the Old or New Testament in relation to any individual who was literally raised from the dead. All that constitutes them or constitutes us living, thinking, animated beings, is the breath of life, which was imparted to them, and is imparted to us. And unless it can be shown that this principle of life possessed consciousness and identity before its connexion with the body, we can never admit that it possesses these qualities after the dissolution of the body. The life and immortality brought to light by the Gospel is grounded on the Bible doctrine of the resurrection from the dead; but if the doctrine of the soul's immortality be true, what necessity for the resurrection?

The 37th chapter of Ezekiel contains the celebrated vision of dry bones. And although this vision may have a reference to the doctrine of the resurrection, yet all that was meant by it was that the Jews were to be raised from a state of great degradation and moral death. Daniel has reference to the same thing in Dan. xii: 2, and Christ in John v: 8, 9.

CHRISTIANITY.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Christianity! What is it? A delightful theme; a beautiful theory—and may I not say—a theory, the principles of which are seldom, ay, too seldom, reduced to practice. What dark and mystical theories have been mistaken for that inculcated by the Redeemer of mankind? And how various the influence exerted by these several theories upon the minds of their votaries? An influence as mysterious as the theories themselves, and affecting the minds of their subjects in proportion as they are more or less dark and obscure. Ask that bright eyed dame who glances superstitiously on Nature's works, as she passes along, and she will answer that it consists only in confession, absolution, penance, and black lent. Ask that dark browed fanatic

> Who may be deemed as one,
> Whose spirit kindles only in the blaze
> Of deep excitement's sun;

and he will tell you that it is only found amid shouts and acclamations; and consists in taking heaven by storm, and in preparing ourselves for a blissful immortality beyond the grave, by disregarding the things of time. Nay, gentle reader, still ask that raging maniac, immured within the walls of yonder cell; tremble not at the crash of bolts, nor shrink affrighted from her rude, frantic shriek, but listen! Her own wild laugh will tell you that her reasoning powers are gone, while she will answer you that this dark hallucination is Christianity, and will prepare her for the reception of a crown of light and a robe of immortal glory, when life shall fade away.

But Christianity! What is it? A beautiful conception, descended from the courts of felicity, and born of purity and love—bright vision of holiness, sent from the bosom of our Father and our God, to light up the moral horizon of the universe with Heaven's own radiance—perfection of happiness in this life, conceived in infinite wisdom and love, and given to mankind to cheer them across life's uncertain ocean, and beguile them by its blandishment, while they linger on the shores of time, till by death they attain a holier state of being. All glorious and pervading excellence! Thy life-giving tones fall sweetly upon the ear of affliction, and thy office is to administer comfort to the disconsolate, peace to the troubled spirit, and hope to the sorrowing child!

Spirit of love and truth, reach every heart—disperse its gloom,
Till earth shall fade, and time shall make eternity its tomb.

INFALLIBILITY.

"My son, these maxims make a rule,
And lump them ay thegither—
The rigid righteous is a fool,
The rigid wise anither."

To think one's self perfect and infallible, is one thing; to have others think so, is another. The former, at the present day, would seem to be no uncommon occurrence; the latter will be found to be a very uncommon and rare one. We may be mistaken in these positions; nevertheless we think we have good and substantial reasons for laying down such propositions. Most of our knowledge of men is gained from their actions, teachings and demeanor. It is true, there is a science now making very rapid progress in the world, which promises to bring the study of human nature to a degree of perfection almost infinitely beyond that to which it has ever yet attained. This science, even now, would enable us to determine, from the confiuration of the brain—from the natural language of the sentiments, faculties and propensities of man—in a word, from a mere glance of the eye, whether a man was a self-conceited, proud, vain and foolish fellow—one who thought himself every thing, and every other person in the world nothing, or not.—But as this science, like all other new ones, is most strenuously opposed by those who know nothing about it, because it is new, and as the class we are speaking of, may reasonably be supposed to be ignorant of it, inasmuch as they generally are sensible of pretty much every thing else, we, of course, shall be compelled to follow the "good old way" at this time, and meet ignorance on its own ground.

We repeat, then, what we before stated, that most of our knowledge of men is gained from their actions, teachings and general demeanor. And when we see people acting as if they were the grand standard by which every body else is to be measured—teaching in a manner that would seem to indicate that they had made the whole circle of the sciences—that they knew every thing and something more, and moving with an air and dignity which could scarcely be equalled by his Holiness of Rome, we are almost irresistibly driven to the conclusion, that such people are, in their own estimation, perfectly infallible. That such things may be seen, and almost daily are seen, is an assertion that needs no proof. For every student of human nature knows it to be the case; and to no others do we wish to speak. No class of people is exempt from its infallible men. Such characters are hardly endurable any where. But among professional men and people, occupying high stations, they become truly odious and contemptible. Such people, in the social circle, are constantly descanting upon the faults and imperfections of others, and never seem to be happier than when they have found a subject upon which to display their astonishing and tremendous abilities. Any little impropriety, no matter how trivolous, or whether it is done designedly, ignorantly or accidentally, is immediately seized upon as a transcendent subject for some future gossip. Now all this may be, and doubtless is, a very noble and dignified employment for a small mind. But people of sense (by which I mean people who know enough to think of their own imperfections sometimes, as well as those of their neighbors) are never known to aspire to such laudable and praiseworthy callings. And the reason is obvious. They who examine themselves, find enough to do to keep their own "house in order:" and it may be laid down as a very good maxim, that they who do this—do keep their own "house swept and garnished"—will never be found in their neighbor's garret more than three-quarters of the time. For ourselves, we have not a very exalted opinion of a person who weeds all the gardens in town save his own; for, generally speaking, we have noticed that all these self-constituted infallible creatures are, in reality, "just no better than they should be," but are subject to as many, and more, of the imperfections, improprieties and frivolities which they harp so loudly upon, as any of those they condemn. And hence, if instead of spending all their time in examining their neighbors' affairs, they would turn their thoughts for a moment upon their own proper object, themselves—if they would but ——"Turn their eyes within,

Nor longer look abroad for sin," they would discover that their first business is,

To cast the beam that in them lies,
Before they scan their neighbor's eyes.

To see people thus constantly condemning others for things of which none are more frequently guilty than their own dear selves, and that, too, with a tone, air and demeanor becoming nothing but arrogant dictation and self-conceited infallibility, is, as I before stated, truly odious and contemptible. But among no class is it more so than among preachers of the Gospel. In fact, in them it is actually intolerable and unendurable. A follower of the meek and lowly Jesus—one called to minister at the altar of our Lord and Master, puffed up with self-esteem and love of praise, with pride and vanity, and so inflated with the idea of his own self-sufficiency, that he supposes no one else can be his equal, is, to speak charitably, disgusting and detestable in the extreme. But disgusting and detestable as it is, it is a lamentable fact, that such things do exist, even among this class. When some one is spoken well of in their presence, they give vent to the magnanimity of their souls in something like the following strain:—"He can preach two or three discourses very well, and then he has done: he shows off very well at first, but does not last long. If I had devoted eight or ten years to three or four discourses, I could tell a very good story too. He is not systematic at all—he commences at Genesis, and ends at Revelation, begins with consolations of the Gospel, and ends with the lamentations of Jeremiah." In one word, the first person singular, I, is the most conspicuous character in Christendom, and stands in its most bloated dimensions on the face of every sentence. And no one possesses piety and goodness of heart, originality and profundity of thought, power and strength of expression, united with an overpowering and irresistible eloquence, equal to that grand centre of all perfection, his own magnanimous and precious self. Now, what is said, may all be very well and very true, and if from a proper source, accompanied with proper motives, may all be very just and proper. But when such things come from the person who, of all others, is the very one to whom the remarks would be most applicable, and are accompanied with an air and haughtiness which would seem to imply infallibility, the disgusted hearer is almost constrained to rebuke him with that cutting irony of nature's poet,

"O ye wha are sae guid yoursel,
Sae pious and sae holy;
Ye've nought to do but mark and tell
Your neebor's faults and folly!"

but knowing, as he does, that it would only serve to exasperate him, he forbears. Now such people, there is scarcely any hope of reclaiming. A person intoxicated with the idea of his own greatness, is, of all others, the most incapable of being taught. And for this plain reason, there is, in their estimation, no one competent to teach them. All the powers that occupy that mighty "dome of thought," are brought to bear upon the imperfections of that little and insignificant character, "you," and the perfections of that august, all-pervading and all-absorbing personage, "I." And hence, the only thing you can do, is, to let them alone—let them exult in their own egotistic notions, till they learn by bitter experience, that "If a man thinks himself something when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself," not others.

In closing, we would simply observe, that the elements of infallibility, as exhibited to us at the present day, are pride, vanity, overweening conceit, arrogance and self-love. And consequently, our infallible people are the most fallible ones in the world. For these qualities never predominate in large and capacious minds. There is a magnanimity of soul to which they are total strangers. This magnanimity of soul is pained not at the prosperity of others, but having the good of mankind at heart, rejoices to see others doing well. And this is the spirit that should dictate exery one. It is small minds alone, then, that are wholly engrossed with themselves; and this is as it should be. There are a very few people, within the circle of my acquaintance at least, who are of sufficient importance to be made the all-engrossing subject of a large and expansive mind. Infallibility, then, has three distinguishing characteristics.—1st. It is composed not of the very best ingredients. 2d. It very seldom is found, only among narrow and contracted minds. 3d. Its object being self-aggrandizement, the exalting of itself at the expence of the good name of others, it consequently engages in business not of the most honorable kinds. Three considerations which are respectfully submitted to all those who have self-esteem predominantly developed.

I AM A PROFESSOR.

From the tradition of my fathers, together with the preaching which I had been accustomed to hear, my mind became early impressed with the truth of the doctrine of an endless hell. The most innocent amusements and recreations of my youthful days, as well as the most solemn and sincere devotions of riper years, even until past the meridian of life, had been, in a greater or less degree, poisoned with a fear of ultimately sliding into that horrible den! It was also early instilled into my mind, that Universalism was only a more plausible name for infidelity. For a while I tried to chase away my fears by cherishing a hope that I was one of God's elect, adopting the old doctrine of Calvinism. But the arrogance, selfishness and precariousness of this system would occasionally present themselves to my mind, and sap the foundation of my hopes. I would then square myself, and by the rectitude of my own conduct, conclude to take heaven by siege; but two insurmountable obstructions soon presented themselves, viz.—First, I found I had commenced altogether too late, for the whole of this transient life was none too long for the accomplishment of so vast an enterprise, and I then called in the grace of God to my assistance. But I found that this holy oil would not combine with the turbid waters of an impure fountain. Second: Evil being present with me, I would frequently say or do some indiscreet little thing, a retrospect of which would so sicken my heart as to strip me of my armor.

At length a friend of mine, residing at a distance, forwarded me a treatise on the atonement, by H. Ballou. Having been previously informed that this work was fraught with sophistical cunning, I dreaded it. I read it, however, and when I came to his criticism on Bard Milton's history of devils, I was astonished to find that notorious old romance no better sustained by Scripture authority. But on reading his notes on the parables, my mind was so far assisted and enlightened, that my old (formerly) dark Bible (the reading of which had frequently confused my mind like a mass of inexplicable contradictions) seemed to have changed gradually into a new, luminous and pleasant book, insomuch that the reading of the prophets, formerly a task, is now a source of pleasure. I no sooner became so far emancipated as to allow my Universalist books and papers to remain unconcealed on the stand alongside of the old family Bible, than I commenced reading and reasoning with all who deigned to hear me, maintaining that the same Gospel which was preached before unto Abraham, had long since been preached by the angel to the shepherds of Bethlehem, by Christ to his disciples, by Peter to the men of Israel, by Paul to the Gentiles, and still later, by Murray to the Americans.

In 1833, and in the 48th year of my age, I commenced erecting a heavy set of mills in a wilderness place, where I soon lost my health, having been for three years so severely afflicted with a disease of the hip and spine, as not to be raised up erect, to sit, stand, or turn myself in bed; and to this day I am unable to sit up and write. Since my severe illness, several of my Partialist neighbors (forgetting that even those eighteen on whom the tower of Siloam fell, were not sinners above all men) have, for months and for years, been frequently passing and repassing my door, without once calling in to see whether I was dead or alive. Yes, clergy and laity, making the highest pretensions to the love of souls—appraising them, on an average, equal in value to ten thousand such worlds as this—considering mine far more exposed than my body would be with my house on fire over my head, never once call in to pull me out of the fire! O religious hate, what a jewel thou art! But on reflection that I have not injured any of them, and knowing that I am ready and willing to do them all the good in my power, and also that when I was a prosperous sectarian, they were all friendly and sociable with me, I am well aware that the only cause of their hate is, that I am not angry, like themselves, because the Father has had compassion on his lost, but returning younger son, but regard a footstool at this feast as the summit of promotion, compared with the highest seat in the synagogue of the elder son. It is no marvel that the same spirit that persecuted the prophets that were before us, for preaching deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, should also persecute us for believing and proclaiming the same good news; and since the ancient Pharisees called the Master of the household Beelzebub, if the moderns do not call them of his household something quite as bad, their religion at least does not demonstrate the language—"Wo unto you when all men shall speak well of you!" CHANCE.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

What a wonder-working deity is chance! Our spirits bow in reverent adoration, when meditating upon the Being whom we worship as God; our souls arise on devotion's wing to Him, whom we regard as the fountain of all intelligence; from whom proceeds the vast ocean of thought, whose undulations, whether mild and gentle as the moonlit waves of the quiet lake, or wildly swelling like the wind-lashed billows of the heaving ocean, still shew forth the power and majesty of a superior being. And we are stigmatised as the victims of credulity, because we rest our hearts upon this uncreated, unchanging Being. "It is a mystery," says modern philosophy; "it is beyond our comprehension to suppose, that an infinite Intelligence presides over our destinies, and regulates the machinery of the universe. I, for one, have no evidence that man possesses a soul, or mind, any more than the brutes. It is only the agitated mass of matter, whose countless atoms are thrown together by chance; to-day, they exist in one form, to-morrow, in another; and we have no evidence to prove that the animating principle, that quickened the mortal frame, does not dwell in the rose tree that blooms above his grave."

Well, let us for once abandon our lofty chimera, and endeavor to learn to trust in a more mysterious, incomprehensible deity, than any which the heathen ever bowed down to. Let us enter into the secret, mystical chambers of the very temple of credulity, or we shall fail to convince ourselves of the wondrous doings of this being of shadows, and change, and mystery. Will any one say that we become too wise for credulity, by abandoning a belief in revelation? I must insist that the faith (if we may so call it) of the skeptic, far exceeds that of the Christian. The Christian's faith could never, by any possible extension, be made to grapple with such glaring inconsistencies as the freethinker writes in his creed.—For the skeptic owns a creed; yes, he bows down in spirit to a deity, and that deity is chance.

How wonderful! The wild vagaries of chance spread abroad the vast curtains of the sky, and through the illimitable regions of space, sent forth the shining myriads of spheres to wheel the circling dance; and, wondrous to relate! though no intelligence planned, nor wisdom guides their movements; yet for nearly six thousand years, they have traced their mystic orbits with the same order, the same regularity, as when they first met in the boundless halls of ether, and wove the voiceless harmonies of praise and glory, whose deepening tide of melody seems a meet offering at the shrine of Omnipresent Intellect. But I forget; there is no intelligence in the case. We have chosen for a moment the infidel's faith, which we assert is far more credulous than the Christian's. When the sun sets amid clouds and gloom, and the wild rolling pæans of the whirlwind and tempest seem hymning the requium of dissolving nature, does the skeptic hope for a coming morn of serenity and brightness? Most surely. When the green leaf has faded, and grown sere in the chill breath of Autumn; when the Summer's bloom has been swept away by the wild blast of desolation that moans among the naked branches, and the carol of the forest-choir has given place to the mournful dirge of the wintry wind; does not doubt and despair overshadow his bosom? Does he not fear that the fructifying beams of the vernal sun may never return to unlock the icy fetters of the meandering streams; awaken the germ of life in the delicately folded bud, and bid the silken leaf come forth in all its fringing beauty? Oh, no, he has no fears. He trusts in the fitful deity, chance, to bring again all these delightful alternations. Day and night, Summer and Winter, seed time and harvest, have chanced to succeed each other all his life, and he doubts not, the same rotation will continue. He looks forward to the beautiful season of gladness and bloom, when the hills shall put on their garments of green, and mead and vale array themselves in blushing flowers, filled with the varying and holy light that flashes forever in the fount of the rainbow; when the forest trees shall again assume their crown of waving green, and the southern breezes wake soft melody in the whispering bowers, and the pearly dew drops glisten in the vivifying sunbeam, where late the pendant icicle coldly gleamed. Now, what foundation has the infidel for his trust? None in the least, if his theory be true. What if by chance the hues from glory's urn have strayed to this dark earth, and slept in the fragile flower-cups, to soothe and elevate our mortal vision; shall we thence conclude that the same combination of matter and light will again be presented to us? It seems as if this would be asking too much of the fitful deity. And yet, it happens precisely thus. Stern Winter holds his chilly court over the desolated plains of Summer; the frost-king breathes from the gelid north, and adamantine chains imprison the crystal rills, and curb the undulating waves. Again, the gentle goddess strikes the lyre, and fans with her perfumed pinions the hoary brow of Winter. He retires to the northern caves, where the chill spirits of eternal frost pile up the towering icebergs; and leaf, and flower, and tender blade, wave in the bland and balmy breath of Spring. The glorious hue of Summer succeeds to the pale tints of Winter's skies, flowers and fruitage are scattered abroad in magnificent profusion, and Autumn's bounty fills the garners with plenty, and the hearts of men with gladness.—And can it be, that this is all the work of chance? How should the gifts of chance be so perfectly adapted to the wants of mankind? On what ground does the infidel hope for a continuation of those bounties, that have hitherto been his support? They are necessary to his happiness, but is that a good reason to hope for them? Is his God endowed with wisdom to understand his wants; and skill and care to provide for them? He will not allow this, and yet he has full faith, that all these things shall have a beneficial result, as if omnipresent intelligence were the God he worshipped. How much more credulous, then, is the infidel than the Christian? The latter believes that an all-wise, infinitely good Being, who created the universe, and gave law to nature, is ever mindful of the wants of his creatures. That he is competent to plan, and all-powerful to effect his designs, and he therefore rests with confidence upon his sustaining care. But the skeptic acknowledges no hiher power than himself, yet he rests as contentedly in hopes of the future provisions of nature's bounty, as if the hand of unchanging benevolence guided the wheels of the universe.

But "if nothing can never produce something," how are we to account for mind? Has matter, mere wasting, decaying, changing matter, in its chance evolutions through the realms of space, been able to bestow the god-like intellect? Is that mind which has measured the planetary orbs, and studied into the laws by which they are governed, dependent for its existence upon the form of matter? O strange infatuation! "How has the gold changed, and the fine gold become dim," when humanity can willingly barter the glorious principle of thought, for the instinct of the brute. When they can give up the hope of immortal life and glory, and contentedly take their stations with the beasts that perish.

SPECIALLY

To the Editor of the Methodist Zion's Herald, Boston, Massachusetts.

SIR—The writer of this has been, for several days past, afflicted with a very severe sore throat, and it has been with great difficulty that he has been able to talk. Now is it not possible, Br. Brown, that that "very pious young woman, Juliet B.," who spoiled Jesse Bushnell's voice, may not have had a hand in this matter? If Juliet has had a "finger in the pie," why I suppose that as a matter of course there will be no "virtue in medicine," and I may therefore consider myself a "gone case." Any facts or information that you or Br. Sprague may be able to communicate through Zion's Herald, concerning this matter, will be most thankfully received by your afflicted friend, W. R.

Utica, December 5, 1839.

Every thing which tends to discompose or agitate the mind, whether it be excessive sorrow, rage or fear, envy or revenge, love or despair—in short, whatever acts violently on our mental faculties, tends to injure the health.

If you must form harsh judgments, form them of yourself, not of others; and in general, begin by attending to your own deficiences first. If every one would sweep up his own walk, we should have very clean streets.

"AN UNDEVOUT ASTRONOMER IS MAD."

With what truth and justice this observation has been made, we may judge by taking a survey of the very magnificent and astonishing phenomena which are presented to the view of the astronomer and his disciples, within the range of the solar system alone—eighty millions of similar suns, doubtless, with accompanying systems of planets, being within the reach of his present telescopes.

In the sun, the centre of our system, the astronomer perceives a body of immense size, perhaps thirteen hundred thousand times the bulk of our earth, surrounded with a luminous element, the source of light and heat to all the numerous planets and comets which revolve around him.—The diameter of the real globe of the sun, independent of this luminous atmosphere with which it is surrounded, has been calculated at eight hundred and eighty-two thousand miles.* (Perhaps some of your young readers, Br. Grosh, would feel a good deal of pleasure in being able to make out, by calculations of their own, the comparative magnitude of the sun and earth, or any other of the planets. I judge so from my own early recollections; when the ability to perform such calculations, elevated the boy of a dozen years, almost to the dignity of a Newton, immersed in the intricacies of his own invented algebraic calculus. It had also this good effect; it gave me a much increased interest in the study of this sublime science. The rule, then, for finding the magnitude of any one of our planetary bodies relatively to any other is, to divide the cube of the diameter of the larger body by the cube of the diameter of the smaller. Thus, say in round numbers that the diameter of the sun is 890,000 miles; this sum multiplied by itself, and that product by the first sum, will give the cube of the sun's diameter. Again, say in round numbers that the diameter of the earth is 8,000 miles, this multiplied into itself three times, will give the cube of the earth's diameter. Divide the larger sum by the less, and the product will show to those who make these calculations, how many times larger than our earth is that immense body around which we are revolving yearly at the surprising velocity of (68,000) sixty-eight thousand miles an hour. You will excuse and insert this parenthesis, Mr. Editor, as I know you love to contribute to the rational and innocent gratification of the young.) How sublime must be the idea, how overpowering his conceptions of the Power which created and holds in motion and in order such immense masses of matter, when the astronomer has calculated the magnitudes of all the eleven planets by which this orb is surrounded, with all their eighteen moons or satellites, and the two rings of Saturn, and finds that although almost all the sister planets are larger than our earth—Jupiter fourteen hundred times larger—yet that were all these revolving planets, and moons, and rings fused into one body, the bulk of that body would hardly be one three-hundredth part of the magnitude of the sun.—(Your young readers may verify this statement for themselves, by making a calculation of the magnitudes of all the bodies whose diameters have been ascertained. I can give them the following data, which will, perhaps, furnish as many calculations as they may have patience to perform, and will approximate to the above result. Diameter of the Sun in round numbers, is 890,000; of the Moon 2,200; of Mercury 3,000; of Venus 9,300; of the Earth 8,000; of Mars 5,400; of Jupiter 94,000; of Saturn 78,000; of the Georgium Sidus or Herschel, 34,000.)

Not only are these immense magnitudes of the heavenly bodies sources of adoration and astonishment, but the surprising velocities with which these masses of matter move through space, are no less so. What and how great must that power be which sends Venus, a globe as large as our earth, whirling through space at the rate of seventy-six thousand miles in an hour, or more than a thousand miles in a minute—Mercury at the rate of one thousand seven hundred and fifty miles in a minute—Saturn with all his moons and rings, at the rate of twenty-two thousand miles in an hour—and some of the comets at a still more inconceivable velocity, or eight hundred thousand miles in an hour, when they are nearest the sun! With what awe must such power and irresistible energy impress the mind, familiar with these calculations and conceptions!! And if the emotions of awe and adoration, which these almost illimitable conceptions give rise to, could be increased, they must be so when the mind stretches away beyond this solar sphere, and imagines similar planets and similar revolutions around the eighty millions, or rather the countless host, of suns which the telescope has discovered. For it can not be admitted that these brilliant orbs—Sirius, the brightest and perhaps nearest of which, is conjectured by Dr. Wollaston to give as much light as fourteen suns each as large as ours—that these brilliant suns shed their light in vain, that they have not also their respective planets—their Mercuries, their Earths, their Jupiters and Saturns—to whose inhabitants they give light and joy, and equally grand and amazing conceptions of their omnipotent Creator.

The immense distance at which the bodies composing the solar system are placed from each other must, when the astronomer attempts to conceive of them, still further increase his impression of the might of that ever-extended Arm which placed and maintains them there. A cannon ball flying with a velocity of eight miles in a minute, would take more than twenty years to reach from the earth to the sun, and a horseman at eight miles an hour would take twelve hundred years to make out the same distance; and were our imaginary horseman, after reaching the sun, to set out on an expedition to Herschel, the most remote of the planets, he would not finish his journey in less than twenty-two thousand years. But all these distances are as nothing when compared with the distances of the fixed stars. Sirius, or the dog-star, supposed to be nearest, is at least—how much more can not be measured—20,159,665,000,000, or 20 billions of miles from the earth, so that our horseman would take at the same rate, about three hundred millions of years to reach it. What august conceptions must these facts give of Omnipresence and Omnipotence—of Him who is working, giving and supporting life, there and here at the same moment!

If every drop of water, every leaf of every tree, every foot of soil, is teeming with life, with animals and animalcules, as on this earth so on the millions of millions of worlds which revolve around the eighty millions of suns revealed to us by the telescope, how must the astronomer and his disciples be oppressed—how must the imagination stagger and be confounded,—

"Lost in wonder and amaze"

at the idea of such magnificent and overwhelming conceptions! If familiarity with such thoughts does not produce in the astronomer, the most humble and ardent devotion, then truly, in the words of our caption, he is senseless or mad.—And if our impressions, upon a view of these wonders, are not similar to those of David, expressed in the 8th Psalm, (which read) with what condemning or contemptuous epithets may not our names be loaded! A. S.

* Our young friends can easily make such calculations for their own pleasure and satisfaction, by finding in some elementary work the distance of any planet from the sun, multiplying this by 2 to ascertain the diameter of the orbit, and this product by 3.14 or 3 1-7 to ascertain the circumference of said orbit, and then dividing this by the annual period of the planet's revolution, in days, hours or minutes. The quotient will be the planet's rate of motion, in days, hours, or minutes.

DEDICATION AT CHURCHVILLE, N. Y.

On Wednesday A. M., the 20th of November, the beautiful and commodious meeting house, recently erected by our friends at Churchville, N. Y., was solemnly dedicated to the one true and living God. Dedicatory sermon by our excellent and zealous Br. J. M. Cook, pastor of the society at that place. Dedicatory prayer by Br. S. Miles. Br. N. Brown assisting in the services.

The singing was excellent. The sermon did high honor to the youthful pastor. It breathed a pure spirit, and was delivered in a fervent and an eloquent manner. The whole services were peculiarly interesting and highly satisfactory.—The congregation was good, although the weather was unpleasant, and the travelling bad.—Many of our Limitarian brethren were present, and seemed generally highly gratified with the services. We trust that their prejudices will, as the result, be softened and lessened not a little. The meeting house is well located in the pleasant little village of Churchville. Its dimensions are 35 by 45 feet—cost about $2100. There is a fair prospect of soon liquidating the whole debt.—Our friends in this place seem in good spirits and much encouraged. They have prospered much under the labors of Br. Cook. A little more than a year ago this society was in a cold and listless state. It has now, thank God, awakened from its slumberings, and has put on the strength of Zion. Br. C. preaches with this society one-half of the time, and the other half with the society at Chili. At Chili our friends are doing well, and feel much encouraged. At that place, also, our friends have a very convenient house of worship.

In the P. M. services were again held in the house at Churchville. Sermon by Br. S. Miles. Br. S. Barnes assisting in the services. In the evening a sermon was preached by Br. N. Brown. Notwithstanding the cry of alarm which has been raised by some fearful souls in regard to the "desolation" of our spiritual Zion in "western N. Y.," yet it must be acknowledged, that so far as the societies at Churchville and Chili are concerned, "Peace dwells within their walls, and prosperity within their palaces." N. BROWN.

MANLEY AND HOYT AGAIN.

Br. GROSH—From a recent number of your paper, I perceive that Mr. Hoyt, against whom I preferred certain charges touching his moral character, has offered to the public, in your columns, what he no doubt considers a sufficient vindication against the charges preferred. And it seems almost a pity to remove the veil with which he has attempted to cover over the deformity of his character. But the interests of the public call for an exposure. In his reply to my charges and remarks, he has exhibited all the cunning and deceit that belongs to his character. He offers what he pretends to be an answer to my charges against him, while in fact he has not touched those charges. The superficial observer and prejudiced friend of Mr. Hoyt, may suppose that he is innocent, and that he has proved himself such. But the candid and impartial reader will discover that he is now more censurable than he was before, inasmuch as he has added to falsehood and deception the dishonest attempt at concealing it. In the first place, he attempts to involve me in an error, and finding nothing better, or more to his purpose, he endeavors to prove that I substituted the word to in place of for, in a certain notice he gave; while the sense of that notice in fact remains the same in either case.—But what has this to do with my charges? The language he used in giving the notice, had nothing to do with the charges of falsehood and deception with which it was connected.

I accused him of saying to his congregation that he knew not why he happened to give the notice as he did, and afterwards saying that he gave it in that form to get a congregation, and that it was right to do so—that is, he gave a notice to preach, that was calculated, according to his own indirect acknowledgment, to excite the impression that he was going to preach against Universalism, in order to get a large congregation; and then, to satisfy the minds of his audience, telling them that he knew not why he happened to give the notice in that way, as he was not going to preach to the Universalists particularly, but to all present; and afterwards confessing that he gave the notice for a deceitful purpose, and justified himself in so doing. Now, what has he done to vindicate himself? Has he proved that he did not say he knew not why he happened to give the notice in that way? Or has he proved that he did not say that he gave it thus to get a congregation? Neither of these. True, he has proved that he said certain things in his apology, but none of them relate to the charge which I preferred. I admit the correctness, substantially, of what he has proved he said; but he said more. He said essentially what his witnesses affirm; but the only important item is omitted. But as Mr. Hoyt himself doubtless drew up the form of writing to which his witnesses subscribe, he knew what to insert and what to omit—and unfortunately for him, he has omitted the only thing that was of any consequence. Will the witnesses affirm that he did not say he knew not why he gave the notice as he did? We do not accuse him of not saying what he has proved he said, as Mr. Hoyt well knows, but we accuse h m of saying something more, which Mr. Hoyt well knows that he did say, and which his witnesses will not affirm he did not. The truth of the charge as it stands against him is proved by the following certificates.

"The undersigned were present at a certain meeting, at which the Rev. Mr. Hoyt officiated, and heard him make an apology respecting the notice he had given, and which, he said, might have excited an impression that he wished to correct. The apology was substantially the following, as we distinctly remember. "Some of my hearers may have got the impression from the notice I gave, that I was going to preach to the Universalists particularly; but I am not going to preach particularly to them, but to all. And why I happened to give the notice in the manner I did, I know not. And the reason why I am to preach to you, is that it is my business to preach." As to the words to or for, we are confident that the former was used in his reference to the notice he had given.

RUFUS WHITNEY, [M. D.]
HIRAM JORDAN,
ELISHA REYNOLDS,
AUGUSTUS B. CRAVATH,
NYRUM REYNOLDS, [ESQ.]
SAMUEL H. SHATTUCK."

"The undersigned certifies that he heard the following conversation, essentially, between Mr. Manley and Mr. Hoyt.

Mr. M. I am satisfied, Mr. Hoyt, that you gave the notice you were going to preach to the Universalists, either with the intention of preaching against Universalism and was advised not to do it, and made the apology you did to satisfy the minds of the people, or you gave it to get a congregation.

Mr. H. I had as lief tell you as not. I gave the notice to get a congregation.

Mr. M. The course was a deceitful one.

Mr. H. I think differently. If a man wishes to take that course to get a congregation, it is right to do so. LUMAN BARRETT."

Those parts of these certificates printed in italic, will show wherein the charge of falsehood and deception consists. And now let me ask why Mr. Hoyt has not noticed the charge by showing that he did not use such language?

We will now notice what Mr. Hoyt says respecting my second accusation. This he has treated with as much neglect as he has the former. He has indeed pretended to answer it, but what he says and proves is altogether irrelevant. I accused him of saying, in an abolition discussion at Warsaw, that, in certain remarks made by him, and which I deemed personal and abusive, he had no reference to me, and subsequently acknowledging that he did refer to me, and did not deny having such reference. Now, what has Mr. Hoyt done in answer to this charge? He has proved that he said, "He hoped the speaker (I) would not consider him as meaning to be personal in his remarks." That he said this is very probable; but he also said that he had no reference to me in those remarks. He also said he had reference to me, and did not deny it. Let the following testimony be introduced:

"This certifies that I was present at the abolitionist discussion in this place, about the first of March last, and heard some remarks from Mr. Manley and Mr. Hoyt. Mr. Manley stated in substance that he was not clear in his mind as to some of the measures of the abolitionists. This was embraced in his remarks. Mr. Hoyt made some remarks immediately after Mr. Manley had closed, and among other things, said, in substance, that any man who acknowledged himself ignorant on the subject of slavery, acknowledged himself guilty of a sin, (or something to that effect.)—Mr. Manley then arose and made some more remarks, explanatory of what he had before said, and intimated that Mr. Hoyt had referred to him. Mr. Hoyt then said that in his remarks he had no reference to the remarks made by Mr. Manley. This is according to the best of my recollection.

Warsaw, April 4, 1839. LEVI MASON."

"The undersigned coincide with the above statements.

D. L. MORRIS,
N. MORRIS,
L. M. MORRIS,
H. C. SMITH,
R. GOULD."

Again—"This certifies that I heard Mr. Hoyt say, that in the first part of his remarks made at the abolitionist discussion at Warsaw, he had reference to Mr. Manley, and did not deny having such reference—but that in the latter part of his remarks he did not refer to him.

LUMAN BARRETT."

From these certificates, the reader will see wherein my second charge consists, and that Mr. Hoyt, with all his parade, stands in the same position he did before the publication of his reply to my letter and remarks. He has pretended to answer certain charges; but has evaded instead of answering them.

After offering his certificates in reply to my charges, Mr. Hoyt draws to a close by endeavoring to prove that I have maliciously perverted his language. First, he thinks I perverted his meaning when I represented him as expressing the sentiment that my "charges had produced no new or forcible impressions." Now it is certain that he says he could not give me "credit for new or more forcible impressions," and does not say that he has reference to any particular part of my letter, as not producing such impressions. I had therefore reason to suppose that he referred by that remark to the letter at large—that is, to the charges preferred against him, as they constituted the burden of the letter.

Again; he thinks I misrepresented him by stating that my charges "belong to a class of things which he has long since learned to treat with perfect indifference," and ascribing to him this statement. Now, the way he has made this appear, is by incorrectly dividing my letter to him, and calling that the second paragraph which properly belongs to the first. He says that certain things in my second paragraph, he has learned to treat with indifference. I accordingly say, that my charges he has learned to treat with indifference. He replies that I misrepresent him, because my second paragraph contains no charges, understanding by my second paragraph, the latter part of the first as the most superficial observer will discover by looking at my letter, while it will be seen that my second paragraph does contain a part of my charges against him. I close this communication by expressing my sincere desire that Mr. Hoyt may ere long become an honest man.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 13 1839.

"BLESS AND CURSE NOT."

The Boston Traveller, in an excellent article on "Cruelty to Animals," winds up by dooming the cruel man to a fate most horrible and awful, as a cure for his cruelty, and a preventive of cruelty in others—just as if an exhibition of infinite cruelty in eternity, was calculated to imbue a heart on earth, with benevolence and compassion! And then, to cap the climax, after declaring that mercy never weeps when the cruel man suffers, he adds, that this is not too harsh language, for the Scriptures have harsher denunciations—the Bible declares, "God will laugh at their calamity." I should like to have a peep at the Traveller's Bible—no version I have ever seen, has any such declaration as that in it; especially in reference to the eternal state. Had he not better look again—perhaps he has not only misquoted the good Book, but also misapplied its declarations.

But to be plain. What but a spirit of cruelty and revenge, would doom even a cruel man to endless wretchedness and torment—to agonies that must, necessarily, be useless to the sufferer, because no period can ever succeed in which he will experience any benefit from them? And must not the exhibition of a spirit of revenge and cruelty in the infliction of such punishment, have a tendency to keep alive the same spirit in the punished? Yea, will it not aid him in justifying his own cruelty and malice, to know that God and his fellow-men are actuated by the same spirit in torturing him, that he was actuated by in maltreating his poor horse? Certainly—for like tends to produce like throughout the moral, as well as in the natural world. And if God, or those men who are looked to for examples, set us a copy of a revengeful and cruel character in their conduct, it is perfectly natural and reasonable that those who are affected thereby should imitate the copy set them. By how much that a man is better, or of more value than a horse—and by how much endless torments are greater than temporal blows and stripes—by so much is this writer in the Boston Traveller more cruel than the wretch he so severely reprobates—more brutal than the unfeeling drayman whose abuse of his horse has thus led this writer to clothe himself "with curses as with a garment!" This may seem severe censure, but it is returning the judgment wherewith he judged others, back into his own bosom, in a truly scriptural manner.

Now let me not be misunderstood. I most fervently abhor cruelty, whether to man or beast—whether by laying on blows with a whip, in time; or by dooming to the burnings of an endless hell, in eternity. Both are, alike, the offspring of fiend-like malignity, and useless—injurious cruelty. Both, alike, generate malice and revenge in those who frequently witness them, and in those on whom they are vented. Both, alike, deserve punishment—not vindictive tortures—in order to bring the offenders to a sense of their own wrong feelings and wrong doings, and to lead them to the practice of the benign and heavenly principles of forgiveness, compassion and love inculcated in the Gospel of Jesus. "Overcome evil with good," is the only true rule of practice by which cruelty can be rooted from the hearts of men. No man who cherishes the disposition to doom his fellow-sinner to endless agonies, (for cruelty to a horse, or for any other offence,) will hesitate in being himself a monster of cruelty to any animal that may rouse his wrathful disposition. Away, then, with cruelty and malignity, in every shape! Ascribe it not to God—for then his worshippers will imitate his supposed character. Write it not in your creeds—for then men will esteem it a religious duty. Breathe it not in curses on your fellow-men—for those you curse, and those who hear you curse them, will only be rendered more cruel by your example. Practice it not, even in thought, on any being—for wrath is blind, and its bitter waters, when set flowing regard not the objects they overflow and sweep away. A. B. G.

CONVERTED SOULS.

The world has occasion frequently to wonder at the surprising accounts which are blazoned forth to mankind, wherein are set forth divers almost supernatural visitations of God's spirit in the conversion of souls, professedly to holiness, and really to the belief in endless misery for such of their wicked neighbors "as they do not care much about—the Universalists, for instance.—Without stopping to inquire into the truth of these accounts, we must say there are certain circumstances connected with them which appear very wonderful even to us. Among these circumstances we may mention the fact, that in all these wonderful accounts, nothing is mentioned but what would agree, or appear to agree with the principles of philanthropy, while every thing is concealed which is calculated to undeceive the less excited multitude as to the real effects of modern evangelizing schemes.

Nearly two years ago, it will be recollected, this city was dishonored by what some called a protracted meeting. One of the individuals who managed the meeting, succeeded in obtaining a goodly quantity of jewels and trinkets from the ladies, all no doubt for very benevolent purposes, though we will not say that this feat was urged as a proof of his disinterested piety. However, one of the results of that campaign upon the minds of its friends, was that they boasted of between 6 and 7 hundred new born souls; and they pointed to the number as triumphant evidence that these were true and genuine apostolic conversions. Recently it appears, by a letter published in the Baptist Register, that the same individual who figured so largely here has been producing quite a stir in the city of Baltimore. There, among other wonders, he has very magnanimously converted a young Chinese to the belief that the 600,000,000 of his countrymen are "all going down to hell"—perhaps he will persuade the young heathen that he has now the power of doing what God never intended should be done—save some of his countrymen. Besides this, if we are to believe his letter, he has had the honor of preaching to congregations of about 3000 persons, of baptizing 80 persons, (50 at one time we think,) as the result of three weeks labor, and of being gazed at on baptismal occasions, by from 20 to 30 thousand persons. All of this is regarded as the work of God's spirit, similar to that it wrought on the day of Pentecost.

Now it seems to us no more than what justice or a proper regard for truth demands, that when a man boasts of having accomplished some great public improvement, he should present a fair statement of the cost of what he has accomplished. Otherwise he might go on from work to work, and from improvement to improvement, and we suppose by his one sided representations, that he was entitled to our confidence and respect, when at the same time he was guilty of the most prodigal and useless expenditure of the people's property. By this rule, if we wish to estimate the prosperity of our country through the progress of popular education, we would not rest content with a mere statement of the number of the educated; we would wish to know the strength of ignorance in the opposite balance; we would wish to know the number of uneducated which the system in operation does not and can not reach. By the same rule, also, we would expect a general, in giving an account of a battle, not only to state the number of prisoners taken, and the extent of the victory achieved, and the value of the acquisition in its every bearing, but also the number of the slain and wounded on both sides, so that we might judge whether he had benefitted the world more than he had injured and robbed it.

Now we question not the legal right of our partialist brethren to publish their proceedings to the world, and just so much of the effects of their proceedings as they please, but we do question the honesty of the course adopted. It does not enable the people to estimate the true nature of their labors. They convert 600 souls in Utica, and publish it to the world as so much gain to the cause of Christianity. After events show that the balance of moral influence arising from their labors, has been against the progress of Christianity, and against the peace and prosperity of the Christian churches that were. But this they do not publish. And this is followed up with another and another case of precisely the same import and nature, until we are notified of converts to such an extent, that if the whole of Christendom was converted over a dozen times within as many years, it would hardly furnish the pretended number. Now to prevent coming to such an inconsistent opinion as this, we propose that our Partialist friends put the boot on the other foot. Let them begin at Utica, if they please, or at any other place, and for the next two years bring up the unpublished portions of their account current, by showing us how many of those whom they once published to the world as converts, they have driven to despair, how many to infidelity, how many they have made more abandoned than ever, how many they have self-righteous, how many hypocritical, how many they have imbued with a spirit of hatred toward their neighbors, how many families they have divided, how many churches they have destroyed with strife and dissentions, and how many honest Christians they have disgusted with their conduct, and then they will tell us whether they have been a benefit or a curse to the world. A. R. B.

ENDLESS MISERY.

"Beware.. .of the doctrine of the Pharisees."—Matt. xvi: 12.

One doctrine which the Pharisees believed, was, that the souls of the wicked, "as soon as separated from their bodies, were transmitted into a state of everlasting wo, there to suffer the punishment of their sins to all eternity." Prideaux's Connexions, Vol. 3. p. 46. If the endless pain of the wicked is a doctrine brought to light in the New Testament, it is singular, that the Pharisees should have obtained it so long before the principles of Christianity were promulgated; for the Pharisees existed as a sect long before Christ came among men. And it is no less singular, admitting the opinion in question true, that Christ should warn his disciples against the doctrine of the Pharisees who held it, without any reservation whatever.

It is an interesting subject to inquire from what source the Pharisees obtained the doctrine of ceaseless wo.—We may be sure that they did not find it in the Old Testament. A celebrated writer says of the facts taught to the Jews in their covenant, "we have not authority, therefore, decidedly to say, that any other motives were held out to the ancient Hebrews to pursue the good and avoid the evil, than those which were derived from the rewards and punishments of this life." Jahn's Biblical Archæology, p. 398. And to this we may add the testimony of an eminent prophet, "The Lord will not cast off forever." Lam. iii: 31. These facts from among many others, prove that they did not find it in the Old Testament. And every person will perceive that they could not have obtained it from the New Testament, since it existed among them before Christ came on earth. Whence then did they procure it? A modern believer in the doctrine of endless misery will inform us—"From the time of the captivity, more especially from the time of the subjection of the Jews, first to the Macedonian empire, and afterwards to the Roman, as they (the Jews) had a closer intercourse with pagans, they insensibly imbibed many of their sentiments, particularly on those subjects whereon their law was silent." Campbell's Four Gospels, Vol. 1, p. 303. From this extract, it is evident that the Jews did imbibe some of their opinions from the heathen; especially those, concerning which, their law gave them no light. That their covenant was silent concerning the future condition of the people, is evident from what Dr. Campbell again says.—"It is plain that, in the Old Testament, the most profound silence is observed, in regard to the state of the deceased, their joys or sorrows, happiness or misery." Four Gospels, Vol. 1, p. 303. Connect with this fact the following declarations:—"As both Greeks and Romans had adopted the notion, that the ghosts of the departed were susceptible, both of enjoyment and of suffering; they were led to suppose a sort of retribution in that state, for their merit or demerit in the present. The Jews did not indeed adopt the pagan fables on this subject, nor did they express themselves, entirely, in the same manner; but the general train of thinking, in both, came pretty much to coincide." Four Gospels, Vol. 1, p. 304. Now observe three facts here set forth. 1. The Jews insensibly imbibed many of their opinions from the heathen, especially those upon which their law was silent. 2. Their law was silent concerning the happiness or misery of people in a future state. 3. The pagans did believe in future misery, and most of them, endless misery in some form or other. With these facts, the reader is left to decide the question, did not the Pharisees obtain the doctrine of endless misery from the pagans?

It has long been my conviction, that the doctrine is of pagan origin. And it is now my belief, that it will ultimately be consigned to oblivion along with its kindred pagan fables. G. W. M.

THE DEVIL'S DOCTRINE.....NO. II.

Reader, try and imagine yourself to be the devil—place yourself, in imagination, in his place, for a few moments—suppose your mind filled with the craftiest, subtlest cunning ever generated in an intellectual being, and your heart overflowing with the bitterest hatred toward God, and the cruellest malice toward man. Have you done it? Well—now invent a doctrine which shall best gratify your hatred of God; and by leading mankind to sin and transgression, shall best glut your malice toward man. Have you done it? What is your doctrine?

"1. That God is a capricious being—perfect in no attribute, complete in no perfection, and consummate in no plan or purpose. That he is by turns, cruel, severe, gloomy—then kind, indulgent, glorious—partial in loving a few favorites, not for their superior excellence, (for all are, alike, his children,) but for their flattery of him by compliance with a few non-essential particulars, which add neither to the virtues of the performers, nor the happiness of their race; and hating the rest of his children, among whom are the most moral and upright of mankind. That, however he may have designed the happiness of all, he has carelessly (or purposely) allowed the existence of means which will certainly eventuate in the interminable sin and wo of the great majority; and, so far from feeling himself dishonored by this cruel failure, he will glory in it, and will even compel the miserable and unfortunate victims of his carelessness (or cruelty), to praise him for it, while his saved few will imitate him, in rejoicing at the horrid result! This doctrine will certainly cast the darkest shades on God's character—cause the noblest minds he has created, to abhor him, and the most amiable, to shrink from him in terror and dismay; while only the servile and debased will pretend love for him, hoping thereby to win his partial favors, and escape his cruel wrath.

"2. Having made God the terror of man, and alienated the purest and best affections of the human soul from its Maker, the next thing to be done, is, to represent mankind as created totally depraved, that each one may shrink from his fellow in loathing and horror—and knowing, too, that the surest way of making a rouge is to treat the subject as one. Dislike to God may also be increased, by representing God as condemning his offspring to endless sin and wo, for the very depravity he has created them with. But having made men believe that they can not either think a good thought, or speak a good word, or perform a good action, they will despair of salvation; and more readily believe in the limitation of God's attributes and the changeability of his disposition, which will give them just hope enough to save some from forgetting their terrors in insanity; and to elevate others to the height of spiritual pride, when they will be as bigoted, selfish, hard hearted and intolerant as the devil could wish. Then, to complete the carricature of God's character, and finish the seduction, of man into hatred of God. and the violation of his laws, I would represent every thing God has forbidden to man, as most delightful and pleasant—and all that he has required of man, as most grievous and severe. I would represent his penalties as cruel, in proportion, as the thing forbidden was delightful; and to render the penalty inefficacious, I would put it afar off, and render it very uncertain. And lest the reward might seem too tempting, I would also put that afar off, and render it uncertain. And thus I would make earth a hell even to the saint; while, by leading the sinner into transgression, (under the delusive hope of finding it pleasant now, and of escaping its penalty hereafter,) I would render even my votary as miserable as man can be made. Thus would I lead man to hate God and his fellow-man—drive the temperate and moral into spiritual pride, and make the performance of his duty seem a drudgery—and lead the sinner into equal wretchedness under the name of pleasure. I can conceive of no scheme more cunning, and that would better indulge its author's hatred of God, and malice to his offspring."

Reader—you have answered correctly—such would be the devil's doctrine, undoubtedly, were he to frame one, and palm it off as divine truth. And now, please compare your devilish invention with the creeds of men and with Universalism, and see which it most resembles.

IS GOD A CHANGEABLE BEING?

Governor Seward has ordered the postponement of Miller's execution until the 20th inst., so that by the time our next paper shall have reached our subscribers, another victim to legalized murder will have been coolly hurried into eternity by his fellow-beings. The reason given by the Governor for this postponement, is that the unfortunate man may have time to "make his peace with his offended Creator." I do not suppose that it was designed that the proclamation should intimate that God was slower than man in being reconciled to his offending creatures. And it is new to me that our earthly magistrates are authorized to delegate to the people of this republic, the privilege of changing God, as they certainly do if they make him any more favorable to themselves to-day than he was yesterday. However, we are not disposed to find any fault with the intention of the Governor's proclamation. We only advise our Partialist friends to take knowledge of it. They have searched the Bible in hopes of finding some thing that would teach the idea that God needs changing before man could be saved, but they have failed. They have now a Governor's authority, and probably they had rather have that than none.

THE GOSPELS HARMONIZED AND EXPLAINED.

Under this title we have received a beginning to a very interesting series of articles, intended for our next volume, from the pen of Br. W. E. Manley. From a perusal of the nine sheets of Manuscript already received, we think it will prove a very interesting and useful work, in explaining the meaning of the Scripture phrases and peculiar idioms—in giving a continuous history of the Saviour in the language of the different Evangelists arranged in exact chronological order, and in reconciling apparent contradictions, and explaining the various discrepancies in their different accounts. Br. Manley is, emphatically, a student, and for a number of years has very industriously applied himself to the study of the original languages of the Bible, and to Biblical criticism, etc. He advertised, some months since, that he would receive some students who designed preparing for the ministry. I know not how many availed themselves of the offer; but think we have no preacher of Br. Manley's years, in Western New-York, who is as capable as he, of aiding a young man in studies pertaining to the ministerial profession. I hope a number of young men will test the correctness of my opinion—for preachers are needed to supply the drain of the East and West on New-York, as well as to improve the waste places in our own region.

But I did not intend to do more, when I commenced writing, than to notice the series of articles, named above, and to welcome their author as a regular contributor to our next volume.

ILLNESS OF PREACHERS.

We regret to have to say that Br. L. L. Sadler has been obliged to suspend his ministry on account of ill-health. He has been afflicted for some time past with an affection of the lungs which threatens consumption. He passed through this place a few days since on his way East. He keeps up good courage, and cherishes the hope that he will recover and be able to resume his labors after many days. If his health will admit, he expects to go on to Bangor, Me., agreeably to the notice published a few weeks since in this paper, where he wishes his letters and papers directed for the present.

Br. Wm. Andrews, of Wolcott, has discontinued his labors in the ministry for the present, also on account of the state of his health. He has been declining for a year past, though he has continued faithfully to discharge the duties of his station; but duty to himself, as well as continued future usefulness, demand a cessation of his public labors. May God bless our brethren, and permit them again to sound the Gospel trumpet to the waiting multitude.

PUBLISHERS, SUBSCRIBERS AND POSTMASTERS.

I have thought it might be useful to have at one view, the decisions of law in relation to the rights and duties of these persons—it may correct some errors, and prevent mistakes and losses to each party.

A. B. G.

1. Any person to whom a periodical is sent, is responsible for the payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case, is, not to take the paper from the office, or person with whom the paper is left, but to notify the publisher that he does not wish it.

2. If a subscriber to a periodical fails to notify the editor to discontinue the paper at the end of the time subscribed for, or pay up the arrearages, he is bound for another year.

3. Postoffice Regulations.—"In every instance in which papers that come to your office, are not taken out by the person to whom they are sent, you will give immediate notice of it to the publishers, adding the reason, if known; why the papers are not taken out." Instructions to Postmasters, p. 50, Sect. 118.

4. If papers are sent to a postoffice, store, tavern, or other place of deposite, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the postmaster, store or tavern keeper, etc., is responsible for the payment, until he returns the papers, or gives notice to the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

5. In all cases where postmasters render themselves liable for the subscription money for a paper, by a neglect to notify the publisher that it remains dead in the postoffice, the Postmaster General reserves the right to admonish the postmaster for his neglect, and require him to pay for the paper, or to turn him out of office.

6. "A postmaster may enclose money in a letter to the publishers of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter if written by himself; but if the letter be written by another person, the postmaster can not frank it."—Amos Kendall.

WHERE IS THE WRONG?—When you feel crabbed and out of humor—when every thing around you seems out of order, and to go wrong—when "bad luck" seems to follow all you do—just stop and ask yourself—"Where is the wrong?—is it in things external, or is it in myself?" And nine times out of ten, the answer will be, "The wrong is in myself—I see things through my own disturbed state of mind." Try it.

ANECDOTE.

A shrewd preacher of the restitution, as he was getting into his carriage, at a village where he had stopped to bait his horse, was accosted by an opposer, with—"Are you a Universalist preacher?" "Yes Sir."—"Well, what will you say of a man who died a few days ago in our town, and whose last words were a prayer to God to damn his soul to all eternity?" "Why, my dear friend," said the preacher with a humorous gravity, "You don't suppose that God would answer the prayers of such a wicked wretch as that, do you?" The objector turned on his heel, mortified that the very strength he put in his case made it too strong; and the preacher resumed his journey.

CORRECTION.

An error occurred in our religious notices last week, by which we made Br. C. S. Brown preach at Vestal, and Br. J. S. Kibbe in Colliersville, on the fourth Sunday inst. It should be on the fifth Sunday. Will our friends notice the correction?

The morning sun casts a different shadow from that made by the evening sun, observes some one. Truly—and as the "truth lies between two extremes," it is probable that he who sees the world at noon-day (middle age) sees it just about right!

REMOVAL.

Br. H. Belding has removed to Richfield Springs, where he preaches one-half the time. He requests that all letters and papers designed for him be directed to that place.

Those who do not choose to wait for the whole series, can be supplied with a good selection of other books, which together with the ten volumes will make a good library.

INFORMATION WANTED.

We wish to ascertain the present residence of Albert Wade, who recently absconded from Edinburg, Pa., indebted to this office $5.00. Can any one give us the desired information? Such a man ought to wade through affliction until he learns to be honest.

THE LONE TREE OF THE PRAIRIE.

BY MISS. E. ROUNSEVILLE.

Lone Tree of the prairie!—stern relic of time!
Unyielding old hero, what mystery is thine?
Keep secret no longer—thy tale we would know—
Its sunshine, its shadows, its pleasures, its wo!

Why standest thus lonely?—preferrest to be
Apart from thy fellows, thou isolate tree?
To live as some misanthrope, headstrong and blind,
E'er shunning and shunned by thy kin and thy kind?

I ween by that gentle and waving salute,
I judge thee unkindly, mysterious mute!—
Thou smilest a welcome!—no more I'll upbraid—
How cool, how refreshing thy thick leafy shade!

Ah! long have I sought thee!—full many an hour
I've seen thy proud head like some minaret tower;
Goliath thou seemest, with arms lifted high,
Arresting the gay sailing clouds of the sky.

But why thus deserted!—why destined to be Aloof from thy comrades, thou noble oak tree?—
In vain does my vision the circle command,
None else howe'er lowly or distant I scan.

What wild, ruthless foe with tyrannical sway,
Didst sweep all thy race unreservedly away?—
Did that subtle fluid, "electric" by name,
Convert them to dust in "an ocean of flame?"

Or was it the pouring of some mighty flood
That envious burst on the placid green wood?—
What was it?—if either of these was the foe,
Why west thou preserved—I, no tree, may we know?

When hushed was the strife at the close of the day,
And Cynthia was wending her star-spangled way,
Hath here the proud chief, with the scalps of the slain,
In glory returned, his dark maiden to claim?

Hath the old council fire on thy boughs ever shone—
Hast seen the wild war-dance and listen'd the song?—
And when the dire conflict of battle had ceased
Hast received from the pipe the rich perfume of peace?

All silent!—well—if thou a flap wilt not breathe,
From doubt and conjecture our minds to relieve;
We'll trust to the light which the future may bring,
And still meet as friends, while we warm-hearted sing:

Farewell!—noble tree with regret do we speed,
From thy constant protection, thou friend in our need!
Long, long may'st thou stay with thy green-leafy bower,
To screen the faint pilgrim from Sol's raging power.

MONEY NOT RICHES.

"I know thee rich, what would'st thou more,
Of all mine Heaven impart?
I know thee rich in mental lore,
And doubly rich in wealth of heart."

"Oh, mother, dear mother," cried Mary Cleaveland, entering the room much excited, "if we were only rich"—

"Rich, my dear!" returned Mrs. Cleaveland quietly, "I thought we were very rich."

"We rich, mother! Now don't fun; for I really wish I was as rich as Virginia Mason."

And Mary looked half surprised and half fretful, either at what her mother said, or something else.

"I was not fanning: to use your word, Mary, for I certainly think we are rich."

Mary did not speak, but she looked round on the plain floor, and the old oak chairs and table, almost with contempt.

"Are they not very comfortable, my child, and all quite clean?"

"O yes, mother, but"—

"Well then we are rich in cleanliness."

Mary laughed—

"I don't call that riches."

"I do, Mary, and it is a kind that I think Virginia Mason is rather poor in. And look at that basket, that you are handling so roughly; is it not very beautiful?—and those delicate shells your uncle brought from sea: observe the grace of their forms and the variation of their colors—and her book, how beauty is lavished on every side of us, if we have but the power to perceive it. Did you ever see Virginia pause to admire a flower, an insect, or a shell?"

"Oh no, mother; why she, when she has things so much richer?"

"I don't agree with you, Mary. Suppose you could have pearls and diamonds, gold and silver, as abundantly as if you had Aladdin's lamp; would you be willing to be so placed that you could never see the green earth, and the bright flowers, and hear the music of the birds, but only behold the glitter of jewels while you live?"

"Oh no, indeed, mother; I should be very, very wretched;" and the tears started to the eyes of the little girl.

"Then you think the trees, flowers, and birds would yield you the most pleasure. They are then the most valuable—and yet they cost us nothing.—They are to be found in every green grove, and by every way side, filling the air with music and perfume, and the hearts of intelligent creatures with happiness. Now Virginia has no eyes or heart for these things—and I think my own little girl is richer in that respect, for she has a taste to enjoy all the beautiful things that our Heavenly Father, has made—and that is a part of her riches. Virginia appears like a well-disposed little Miss, if she were properly instructed."

Mary put her arms about her mother's neck and whispered gently—

"I am rich, too, in such a mother."

Mrs. Cleaveland knew the tears were in Mary's eyes and she kissed her tenderly, but did not speak. At this moment the babe in the cradle pulled down the muslin screen with a quick motion, and lifted up its head, his eyes bright with health, and hair curling with moisture—and George came in from the fields with his hands full of wild flowers.

The children proceeded to place them in a glass of water, while Mrs. Cleaveland instructed them as to their names and properties, and taught them to observe the minutest shade of grace and loveliness. Mary selected some of the delicate blossoms of the blue-eyed grass, to amuse the infant with, till her mother could finish a coat she was mending for her husband. When it was done, the baby was duly caressed, to the great delight of George and Mary, who were close by.

"Mary there is another kind of wealth of which I would speak. Your father is intelligent, virtuous, and affectionate—are we not rich in him?"

"You, my dears, are treasures, richer than all the gold and silver jewels on earth. I feel that I am rich, very rich, while you are spared to me. And we are rich in love for each other."

"But, mother," said Mary, "when I spoke of riches, I was thinking of the beautiful dresses of Virginia Mason, and the grand party she was going to give. She is to have a satin frock, with lace and sash, on purpose to wear—and wine and cakes and nuts—and George and I are to be invited. When I wished we were rich, I was thinking I should have to stay at home, because I had no frock to wear."

Mary uttered all this with great rapidity, and with a look of great anxiety, totally different from her usual manner.

"A plain, white muslin frock, Mary, is quite as pretty, and far more proper for a little girl like you, than silks and satins could possibly be. I should feel, my dear, that you were poor indeed, should I detect in you a passion for finery. Did you ever think, Mary, why you like to visit Virginia?"

Mary shook her head silently.

"I know," said George. "It is because she is rich and has fine things; and Mary will put up with her airs, because she has more money than we have."

Mary looked hurt.

"You are too severe, George," said Mrs. Cleaveland. "Your mind is two years older than Mary's, and you ought to think more justly."

"But, Mary, do you find yourself happier for being with Virginia?"

"Oh no, indeed, mother. She talks so much of the fine grand company and fine dresses, and rich furniture, that it makes me feel very poor and little.—Now Jane Green is gentle, and talks of dolls and birds and flowers—and whenever I come home from there, I always feel quite cheerful and happy."

"Then she is the better playmate. I shall be sorry to see you willing to go most with a girl of vulgar taste, only because she happens to have a little more yellow dust than yourself, when you might have a companion so much more agreeable."

Mr. Cleaveland now entered, and the conversation was interrupted. While partaking of their evening meal, the father observed Mary was quite silent and thoughtful.

"Well, Mary," said he, "what wise project have you in your head? Let us know; perhaps we can help you a little."

Mary blushed.

"You can, indeed, but"—

George looked mischievous, and his sister for a moment was vexed.

"Let us know all, my daughter," said her father kindly.

"I was wanting to ask you, father, if I might have a party. Mother is quite willing."

"Certainly, then," said Mr. Cleaveland, with some surprise.

"And what shall I have for a treat?" Mary continued.

"Oh you must arrange that with your mother. She knows more about such matters than I do."—Here George laughed outright. "Why, Mary, one would think you were arranging the affairs of an empire, you look so serious."

"Mary," said Mrs. Cleaveland, gravely, "let us defer this conversation till you feel more happy. I thought you had more strength of mind than to let the vulgar pride of Virginia affect your spirits."

"I observed, this morning, the sweet peas were trailing on the ground after the shower. You and George had better lead them over the trellis."

The children obeyed with alacrity. As Mr. Cleaveland caressed the infant, while his wife removed the tea table, he remarked, "You better not let Mary go much with Virginia—her influence is bad upon one so pliant as Mary."

That evening, when Mary was in bed, Mrs. Cleaveland went into the room to offer up her prayers by the bedside of her daughter. As the excellent mother, in the fervency of a grateful and pious heart, enumerated the many blessings of her life, and poured out the heartfelt offering of thanks and praise. Mary listened with tears; and when her mother stooped to give her parting kiss she whispered gently, "Mother, I am very rich, I will try to want only the true riches."

DEATHS.

In Darien, November 9th, after a severe illness of about a week, JULIA A. NASH, only daughter of Franklin and Sarah I. Darrow, aged 13 months and 23 days. It was a beautiful and lovely, yet tender and delicate flower. The chilling blast of death has cut it down; the slender stalk has mouldered back to earth to mingle with its mother dust; while the undying germ has been transplanted to a more congenial soil, even to the paradise of God on high, to bloom forever amid the light and the glory of immortality. May this blessed truth serve to moderate the grief and calm the feelings of the sorrow stricken mourners. The funeral was attended on the 11th, and the consolations of the Gospel presented to the relatives and friends, and a truly sympathising concourse of neighbors by the writer. S. GOFF.

In this city, November 11th, Mr. ZACHARIAH COBURN, aged 28 years. This dispensation is an afflictive one, especially to those who were absent at the time of his decease, and thus deprived of the privilege of adding their feeble efforts to arrest the progress of the destroyer. Though called to endure a painful separation, may they remember that the time will come when there shall be no more death or crying, "neither shall there be any more pain;" and may their consolation be in him whose "hand is not shortened that it can not save," even from the last enemy. Funeral services by E. D. Cook. A. R. B.

At Otiskany Falls, on the 18th ult., Mrs. HANNAH GREEN, in the 42d year of her age. In life she enjoyed, and in death she possessed, the blessings of the Gospel of peace. Her funeral was attended on the 20th, and the consolation of that word which shall stand forever," was offered to the sorrowing by G. W. GAGE.

In Trenton township, Delaware county, Ohio, August 29th, 1839, Mr. CHARLES C. DURFEY, aged 28 years and 6 months, son of Manson Durfey, formerly of York. His wife died October 14th, 1837, aged 19 years. Thus early in life did the young pair bid adieu to all temporal things and soar away to endless day. The writer delivered a discourse to the friends and a large concourse of people, August 31st. T. STRONG.

"AN ETERNAL HEAVEN AND AN ETERNAL HELL, CARRY DIVINE FORCE AND POWER WITH THEM." WATTS ON THE MIND.

BY REV. J. GALLAGER.

The above assertion is often expressed, and in a variety of ways, by the advocates of endless punishment. It is resorted to as a strong argument against the soul-rejoicing, and heart-cheering sentiment of the reconciliation of all things to God, and in favor of the opposite, namely, of endless suffering for a portion of mankind. It is doubtless true that it is not as strongly enforced at the present day, as it was a number of years since. The times of the inquisition are past, the anathemas of the mother church fall harmless at the feet of thousands of professed Christians, and even the days of modern revivals, those besoms of destruction that swept over our fair land, like a blighting mildew, carrying ruin and despair in in their train, are to a very great extent past, and the measures then resorted to are consigned to the tombs of the Capulets. It was here the terrors of an angry God, and the fears of an imaginary hell, were pictured in all their horror, to induce men, women and children, to come out of the world and make a public profession of religion.—But how many can now be found who will contend that such preaching was productive of morality and virtue? Very few, we judge.

That kind of fear that leads or induces a person to hate evil is commendable, for it doubtless leads to virtue and good works; but that slavish fear which springs from a belief in endless punishment, and only induces a person to refrain from doing wrong through fear of the consequence, is certainly, to make the best of it, degrading. A person thus restrained, still loves the evil, and were he permitted, he would cling to it as something necessary to his happiness. But it remains to be proved that the fear of endless punishment is better calculated even to restrain men from sin, than other means that might and have been used.

The Rev. Dr. McCarty, formerly of New-York city, now of Port Carbon, Schuylkill county, a Presbyterian, a gentleman whose talents are of the highest order, delivered a lecture before the Lyceum of this place a few months since. His subject was the insufficiency of human laws to restrain crime. Among the various reasons he adduced were the two following: 1. "The punishments annexed to human laws are not certain. This point he argued with considerable force, and showed that it was the certainty, and not the amount of punishment that would restrain crime, and quoted the Marquis Beccaria in support of his position, who says, "Crimes are more effectually prevented by the certainty than the severity of punishments." 2. The hope of escape which human laws hold out to criminals, even after they are convicted and sentenced. Particular reference was had on this point to the pardoning power placed in the hand of executives. His arguments on these positions were pointed and conclusive, in many instances illustrated by facts. And I must acknowledge I never listened with more surprise, and at the same time pleasure, to a discourse from a preacher of the doctrine of endless punishment, than to this. To hear him sap the foundation of a doctrine which has for so many years been considered all-important, and the only curb to the vicious practices and propensities of man, was certainly a novelty. There were many of his congregation and others present, who did not approve of his lecture. And why? Were not the arguments good? Not a syllable by way of refutation could be heard. But it was not Orthodox. Here was the great objection.

But it is a fact that he is sustained by the most talented writers on criminal jurisprudence, in the positions he took. Beccaria says, "The certainty of a small punishment will make a stronger impression than the fear of one more severe, if attended with the hopes of escaping; for it is the nature of mankind to be terrified at the approach of the smallest inevitable evil, whilst hope, the best gift of Heaven, hath the power of dispelling the apprehensions of a greater, especially if supported by examples of impunity." p. 93.

The clergy may preach an "eternal hell" to a believer in it, and in a large majority of cases he will think, if he does not say, there is no certainty about it. Hope whispers in his ears, "Thou shalt not surely die. You can escape by timely repentance." And the prospect of heaven will have about the same influence upon him. For he will begin to think, "after all my toil and trouble for sixty or seventy years, I may by some unfortunate circumstance miss the object of my pursuit." We think, then, that it is the dictate of reason and common sense, as well as the Bible, if punishments are to be held out to sinners to make them better, it should be the fact that "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." "For God will by no means clear the guilty." But these means will not produce the fruit of the spirit which is love, joy, etc. "It is the goodness of God that leadeth to repentance." It is gratitude kindled in the heart from a consciousness that God has manifested his goodness toward us in a variety of ways, and on various occasions, and especially in the gift of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, through whom we have the assurance of a blessed immortality. Let these facts be fully impressed upon our hearts, and we will then love God, because he first loved us.

PRIDE.

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

When we look upon our dependent state, what shall we see to be proud of? What have we but such things as have been given us? What are we but the workmanship of him in whom we live, and move, and have our being? Strange! strange! that man in the brief hours of life, should assume the air which does not belong to him, in exchange for the humble appearance that exalts and ennobles him inwardly and outwardly! They who trade on such terms make poor bargains, as many have learned in the time of reverses and misfortunes. How little are the greatest before the power of death! Alexander and Bonaparte have been before him as the least of their followers.—Few are willing to learn until they must, the littleness of man, and the greatness of God. It is not often till man is about to go to his long home that he acknowledges

"This world is all a fleeting show,
For man's illusion given:
The smiles of joy, the tears of wo,
Deceitful shine, deceitful flow—
The e's nothing true but heaven!

"And false the light on glory's plume,
As fading hues of even;
And love, and hope, and beauty's bloom,
Are blossoms gather'd for the tomb—
There's nothing bright but heaven!

"Poor wanderers of a stormy day,
From wave to wave we're driven,
And fancy's flash, and reason's ray,
Serve but to light the troubled way—
There's nothing calm but heaven!"

THE LIFE AND LABOR OF CHRIST.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

It was ever the object of our blessed Lord and Master, in all his teachings, and in all his labors of love, to make men wiser, and better, and happier—to solemnly impress upon their minds a conviction of the duties they owed to God and their kindred nature, and of the weighty responsibilities that were resting upon them. It was to raise mankind from the abyss of moral depravity into which they had fallen, and to increase the sum of human happiness and human felicity, that he commanded them to obey his precepts, to walk in the paths he had pointed out and made plain, and live virtuous and godly lives. And it was because he loved man, that he gave for observance so many glorious precepts; it was because he was the friend of the sinner, that he commanded him to love and obey God; it was because he desired the happiness of the world, that he taught concerning the requirements of Heaven, and left behind so many holy examples for our imitation!

It was foretold of the Saviour, that he should be a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief; that he should be despised and rejected of men; that he should be brought forth as a lamb to the slaughter, and surrender up a life, which had been entirely devoted to the cause of humanity, in the midst of enemies to himself and his holy religion. And how exact was the fulfilment of these prophecies! From the commencement of his ministry, until its close, he enjoyed no outward peace. Wherever he went, all innocent as he was, he was surrounded by foes, and whichever way he turned, the arm of persecution was lifted up against him. And yet he had done nothing to merit a treatment like this. He had come into this world, the friend of sinful and degraded man. He came to be the Saviour of an alienated and lost world; to bring out the prisoners to the light of moral freedom; to comfort its mourners with the words of everlasting life; to unstop the ears of its deaf, to unseal the eyes of its blind, to raise its spiritually dead to life—and to pour a flood of light in upon the darkened soul! He continually went about doing good. And wherever we behold him, whether at the marriage feast, or at the pool of Siloam, or at the grave of a beloved Lazarus, or at the bier of the son of the widow of Nain—in every place, and every period—at all times, and under all circumstances, we ever find him the friend of man! He loved the world.—His kindness and compassion were universal, and in his affectionate desires were embraced a universe of human beings. It was for them he lived, and for them he died. And yet by them he was hated and despised. They shut their eyes to the light of his Gospel, and their ears to the pleadings of his mercy. They hardened their hearts against the calls of his love, and the cheering invitations of his compassion. They raised up against him a persecuting arm; they heaped indignities upon the head of this loving Saviour, and all holy and spotless as he was, they nailed him to the cross, and rejoiced in his agony!

And did not this man of sorrow cry to God for vengeance? Did he not petition Heaven to cut the guilty rebels down? and for an Almighty hand to crush in ruins a rebellious world? No! His love for man was stronger than death! and led him to pray for the forgiveness of his murderers, even in his dying moments. And yet, how seemingly regardless we are of a Saviour's compassion, and a Saviour's love! We read of his sufferings, and his tears, and his agonies, but we do not seem to feel as we ought to feel—our hearts remain cold, and we have no love for him who, with his own blood, purchased redemption for a guilty world. His holy precepts are not observed; his righteous commands are not obeyed, nor his glorious examples imitated.

And must it ever be thus? Shall we never wake up to a sense of duty? Shall we ever remain insensible to a Saviour's calls, and a Saviour's pleadings? Oh! let us feel on this subject as Christians should feel, and let us resolve, that from this day to the closing period of our lives, we will devote ourselves more entirely to the service of Christ, and cause of humanity!

CHRIST IN THE GARDEN.

BY REV. H. L. HAYWARD.

Who that has attentively perused the history of Christ's sufferings in the garden of Gethsemane, has not felt his heart swell with emotions of the deepest sympathy? The grand object of his mission was now about being accomplished, and the important work which the Father had given him to perform, he was now bringing to a close. He had passed through a series of trials, distresses and sufferings, which would have filled with emotions of dread and dismay, the heart of any but the Son of God. He had been reviled, scoffed at, [illegible] and spit upon, and he now saw but just before him, an ignorant and enraged multitude, gathered around the judgment seat of the Roman Governor, and tumultuously demanding the sacrifice of his life. A little farther in the distance, he beheld, in imagination, this same infuriated band moving up the steep ascent of Calvary's mount, where was erected the rugged and painful cross, upon which he was soon to be nailed—and there, in the company of murderers and thieves, breathe out his invaluable life, and resign his spirit into the hands of "God who gave it."

What more thrilling and interesting period ever occurred in the life of any individual, than at this time appeared in the life of the mild and benevolent Jesus! Those for whose benefit he had toiled and labored, for whose welfare and happiness he had suffered all manner of persecution and reproach, were now engaged in the unholy, the diabolical work of bringing about the death of their kindest and most devoted friend. Already had one from among the number of his chosen disciples, deserted the ranks of those whom he had selected to carry on the grand work himself had begun, and bribed by glittering gold, had agreed to betray him into the hands of his enemies. Full well he knew that soon the traitor Judas would return, followed by a murderous and blood-thirsty multitude, by whom he would be carried before the judgment seat of Roman justice, there to undergo a mock trial, compelled to bear up under the various indignities that would be heaped upon him, and at last suffer a lingering and painful death upon the cross.

Oh, what an example is here of filial obedience to our heavenly Father's will, and undoubting and implicit confidence in his wisdom and goodness! Where was ever manifested such God-like love, as was here displayed by the Saviour of mankind? Where was ever beheld an instance of such disinterested benevolence, such meekness and humility, such unflinching courage and resolution in a time of suffering and trial, as was displayed in the life and death of the Son of God?

With what feelings of tenderness and compassion did he address himself to his disciples, as he was now about to be taken from them. All the tender emotions of his soul, appear to have been brought into lively exercise, as he now delivered to them his last injunction, while he urged them in the strongest and most endearing language, to remain firm and undaunted amid the fierce tempests of persecution that were gathering around them, and to go fearlessly and courageously forth in carrying forward the important work he was then about to commit into their hands. He well knew that his chosen disciples were men "of like passions" with the rest of mankind; like others, they were liable to err; the eyes of a scrutinizing and gainsaying world were continually upon them; and every inducement would be made use of, and every means tried which human wit and ingenuity could invent, to lead them astray from the path they had chosen. Hence his earnest endeavor, in this his last conversation with them, to inspire their hearts with fortitude and courage, to console them in the prospect of their immediate separation from him, and to impress upon their minds the vast importance of paying due regard to the example he had left them, of living upon terms of peace, friendship and equanimity with each other, and thus to "let their light so shine before men, that others seeing their good works, might glorify their Father in heaven."

"This," said he, "is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you; for I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done unto you." "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one for another." "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love."

What tenderness and love—what anxiety and solicitude did he manifest for the welfare and happiness of his disciples! Here we behold the mighty workings of that love which had its origin at the fountain of Universal Benevolence.—Here we may behold the length, and breadth, and heighth, and depth of that "love which passeth knowledge," and learn the vast price which the Son of God has paid to purchase the salvation of the world from sin. May we duly appreciate the blessing, and ever live in strict accordance with the pure and holy precepts of the Gospel of Christ.

MENTAL SLAVERY.

"There," says the reader, "I have long expected that the exciting subject of slavery would find its way into the columns of the Magazine and Advocate, to throw confusion, discord and disunion into the ranks of Universalism."

Hold a little, gentle reader; be not too suddenly startled at the above caption. We would not disturb the unanimity of thy peace, or alarm the quiet repose of thy happy meditation with a glaring disquisition upon the fearful forebodings of Southern slavery—no, by no means; but in the spirit of kindness we would awake the tender emotions of thy kind attention, to the all-important subject of mental slavery—the slavery of habit—the slavery of vice and sin. This is the kind of slavery which claims our attention at this time.

And while we have cause to regret that slavery should exist in any form among the children of men, we also feel warranted in saying, that there are certain intolerant, unnecessary and slavish practices which have borne like a mountain's weight upon the cause of truth and righteousness, and which are still a weapon in the hands of the enemy, who never scruples to wield them to our disadvantage. Multiform and various as are our habits, perhaps there is none more useless in itself and pernicious in its character and influence, than the unwarrantable and slavish habit of profane swearing. That this habit is the result of long and habitual indulgence, is a truth which, to establish, requires but little proof.—If we but turn our attention to the society of little boys, it will be no difficult matter for the ordinary observer to hear the little urchin making use of profane language, ere he can scarcely lisp an audible sound. We do not mean to be understood that this is true in every instance; on the contrary, we are happy in knowing the fact is otherwise; but we do say, (and we feel that we speak the experience of many,) that it is by no means unfrequent.

Here the question naturally arises, how came they in possession of such language?—from what source do they derive their early information? This is a most reasonable inquiry, and it strikes at the foundation of this disgusting and disgraceful habit. To say that the forming hand of the all-wise Creator endowed their innocent hearts with an innate propensity, and gave them the use of language that they might speak the inordinate desires of their ill-directed minds, independent of the influence of example, or the aid of education, would be an impeachment both upon the character of Deity and the declaration of Jesus Christ; for we have the express and emphatic language of Jehovah, that when his work was finished, he pronounced it good; which was confirmed by the testimony of our Saviour, when speaking of the inherent virtue and goodness of the human heart before it became contaminated with sin. His language is, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." The charge has been made, and perhaps not without some foundation in truth, that the language of our Partialist preachers has been a most fruitful and prolific source of profanity. That this is true, to some extent, we admit, but that it is the immediate and legitimate cause, we deny. "Render unto Cesar the things which belong unto Cesar," is both a Christian and a republican principle. An eminent writer has justly said, "Show me the company you keep, and I will tell you your characters." Here it is that we find the true foundation of the power of example, and here rests the secret of the beginning of profane swearing; besides, the language speaks volumes of the great and important responsibility which devolves upon parents and guardians, of instilling the principles of Gospel truth into the young and tender mind in early life. Early impressions seldom become eradicated. The child listens to the language of those whom he looks up to as his superiors—he learns the words, and takes it for granted that he has an undoubted right to speak the language of those who should be his instructors both in theory and practice; and when absent from the immediate care and supervision of his parent or guardian, it is that our ears are filled with blasphemy and imprecations of the Most High! Indeed, such is the fallibility of human nature, that he even feels that a degree of honor is due him, that he dares take the name of God in vain. If there is any palliating circumstance to excuse the child for this lamentable practice, it is in the fact that he inconsiderately acquires the slavish habit from those whom he has a right to look up to for good examples. On the other hand, if there is any thing that is inexcusable, and which justly deserves the censure of public opinion, it is manifesting a total disregard of all moral obligation, by continuing in the practice of a vicious habit, without making a single effort to reform, and more especially after becoming convinced of its folly. With the child, the seed is sown in the tender mind, and like the seed sown upon a fertile soil, it will grow with his growth, and strengthen with his strength, and ere he is aware of his situation, the iron fetters are fastened upon his mental and moral powers, and he is nought but a perfect slave. If he makes the solemn resolve to reform, it is more than probable that his associates instead of aiding him with a word of encouragement, will set a trap that he may betray the virtue of his resolution. And I firmly believe that I am not going beyond the bounds of truth and justice, in averring that the parent is not unfrequently called to the painful duty of correcting his child for a slavish habit, which he himself has been instrumental in forming. And need we say, the evil stops not here. Is it not a truth that profanity too often defiles the lips of the professed believer in the glorious doctrine of God's impartial grace? And will it be denied that men of character, of wealth and influence, who have no mean opinion of themselves, will allow themselves to depart from the wholesome and reasonable requirements of the Gospel, which, so far as the word of mouth is concerned, they are extremely fastidious in defending, and yet, at the same time, descend to the degrading and slavish habit of invoking the damning curses of their heavenly Father upon a fellow-brother. And are they not aware that while they are thus taking the name of God in vain, others are making remarks greatly to the detriment of the cause of truth, and thereby bringing a stain and a reproach upon those who are spending their lives for its support. And may we not go still farther, and point out the fact, that the preacher is not unfrequently made to feel the awkwardness of his situation while listening to the profane language of those who are his professed friends—language, too, which is unbecoming the dignity and character of the Christian or the gentleman. Add to this the increased embarrassment he feels if the inquiry is made by an opposing brother, why the friends of Universalism thus indulge in a habit which is so repugnant to reason, so deleterious in its influence, so contradictory, and so diametrically opposed to the plain, the obvious and acknowledged requirements of the Gospel. To deny that such practices exist, is unwarrantable—to plead justification, is inconsistent—to excuse the matter, will put him to the blush—and if he seeks to extricate himself from a fault for which he is not responsible, it will only be putting the boot on the other foot, without answering the question, or mending the difficulty. It is contended that the theory of Universalism affords the only proper incentive to moral action. Now, admitting that this is the case, it is but reasonable that its moral claims should be answered by a practical demonstration, as much better than that of our opposing brethren, as our theory is more exalted.

"Swear not at all," is the language of our Saviour; "neither by the heaven, for it is God's throne, nor by the earth, for it is his footstool."

MODE OF PROMOTING CIVILIZATION, IMPROVEMENT, ETC.

It is much to be regretted, that the true source of happiness, etc., remains comparatively unknown, or is considered as a desideratum of little moment. An approximation, however, is, and for several years past, has been making towards a better appreciation of it—and if we may be warranted in judging of the future by the past, we may anticipate with pleasure, the time when men will acknowledge the principal sources of happiness to be augmented by the influence of that portion of the human family who have, in ages past, been considered and denominated by the humiliating title, "the weaker sex." This estimation of female intellect, I shall endeavor to show, is not only fallacious, but unjust, uncharitable, and incompatible with general observation.

Man, by nature, is a social being—he reasons and possesses intellectual faculties capable of improvement; and happiness, in proportion to the proper improvement of these faculties, invariably ensues. But the most direct and effectual mode of improving them, has for centuries been suppressed. The cultivation of the female mind, has been held up to scorn, contempt and ridicule. From an elevation of the moral and social condition of females, would result a promulgation of truths and sentiments, unsophisticated, and in a great degree calculated to promote the civilization and improvement of the rising as well as succeeding generations. The female is alone qualified, and it seems to be her special duty, to infuse into the minds of her offspring, principles that will conduct them through the various scenes of life, guiding the destinies of their country, and adorning it with virtues worthy of remembrance.

L. Aime-Martin, a French writer, has published two volumes on this subject. The work is entitled, De l'Education des Meres de Familles, ou de la Civilization du Genre Humain par les Femmes—"On the education of mothers of families, or the civilization of the human race by the instrumentality of woman." The author very ably argues, that the infant while in the cradle, is receiving an education either from the smiles or frowns of its mother. Her actions, and even her countenance, has an influence upon it. The author says, "Teachers enough will be found to impart learning: the mother alone can impart virtuous sentiments. A good mother will seize upon her child's heart, as her special field of activity. To be capable of this, is the great end of female education; to be capable of this, females must be taken out of their present narrow circle of acquirements, and introduced at once to what makes human beings better and happier." In conclusion he observes, "I have reached the end of my labors. I have shown that no universal agent of civilization exists but our mothers. Nature has placed our infancy and youth in their hands. To this one and acknowledged truth, I have been the first to declare the necessity of making them, by improved education, capable of fulfilling their natural mission. The love of God and man, is the basis of every system. In proportion as it prevails, national enmities will disappear; prejudices become extinguished; civilization spread itself far and wide; one great people cover the earth, and the reign of God be established. This reign of God is the happiness of man, secured by his increasing virtues, to be hastened by the watchful care of mothers over their offspring, from the cradle upwards."

Past experience teaches, that it is by associating with the virtuous, the amiable and intelligent, that corresponding characters are formed; and it is, as the pages of history abundantly testify, from intelligent and affectionate mothers, that the best and most eminent men who adorn the historic page, first received a proper direction of mind—a mind and energy of character, which can emanate but from the female heart. Many of the nations who have hitherto deemed the female mind as totally incapacitated for literary and scientific attainments, now see the gross errors which they have imbibed, and are dispelling from their minds those opinions of female intellect, which for centuries have formed a distinguished trait in their character. Surely "darkness covered the earth, and gross darkness the people." Europeans, with whom originated the blue stocking sarcasm, are now ready and compelled to admit, that the reasoning powers of the female can be cultivated and developed, even so as to compete with the most profound. In all ages, the female has met with strong and bitter opposition, which she has borne with meek submission, not remonstrating in the least against the almost infinite injustice done her. Had she been permitted to enjoy the privileges in common with the other sex, she would have been what she was originally intended for, viz., a help-meet, an assistant, a companion, a co adjutor of man in all the useful avocations, and consequently accelerating, instead of impeding the progress of civilization and improvement. But it is humiliating to reflect on the manner by which some nations treat her at the present day. Even in countries which pretend to have become the most enlightened, her privileges are limited.

Yet things have, in a measure, assumed quite a different aspect. Truth is mighty and will prevail. The roots of error must be turned to the sun of intelligence, and wither. Man has found, and will ever find, the female amiable and friendly—qualified as well as disposed to augment his felicity, and to elevate him in the scale of civilization. Consult those who have travelled through savage regions—suffering all the hardships incident to such an excursion—and who, I ask, administers most to their wants? I answer, it is the tender, humane and benevolent female. In whatever situation she may be placed, restricted and treated as she may be, one continual train of charitable acts adorns her noble character. But perhaps the reader will say, "it is useless to discuss this point, for all accede that the female is distinguished for these finer feelings; but she does not possess a mind adequate to grapple abstract questions." Very well. The fallacy of this position will plainly evince itself, on a perusal of several works now being published in England and France, to which reference is only necessary. I would also refer to the examinations in our own institutions, as abundantly testifying that females, yes, even females, possess great intellect. There are some people who, "convinced against their will, remain still in the same mind." If such peruse this article, I would further refer them to the dramatic writings of Miss Joanna Baillie—the astronomical labors and calculations of Mrs. Somerville—the works of Mrs. Marcet on chemistry and natural philosophy—Miss Martineau on political economy, and Mrs. Loudon on philanthropic economy—where they will find an exhibition of reasoning faculties, sufficiently strong to carry conviction to every unprejudiced mind, that the female mind, when cultivated, is capable of competing with a Kepler, a Brohe, a Gallileo, or a Newton. If this will not convince my reader, I must say that there are more hopes of a fool than of him. The truth is, the female has been compelled to remain in ignorance; and although disposed, she was not permitted to emerge from darkness. The following lines of the poet, may be very appropriately applied to females of past ages.

"But knowledge to their eyes her ample page,
Rich with the spoils of time, did ne'er unroll;
Chill *ignorance repressed their noble rage,
And froze the genial current of the soul.

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
The dark, unfathomed caves of ocean bear:
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air."

I might enumerate other females who have attained to eminence, but neither time nor occasion will allow. Suffice it to say, that upon the rolls of literary fame, are found female writers of whom we may be truly proud. And it is a truth, which will in due time be appreciated, that to promote civilization and improvement, attention must be bestowed on the culture of the female mind. It is to them, and to them alone, that the rising generation are to look for that proper direction of mind—the inculcation of those principles which can alone sustain our government and its institutions.

LIBERAL MEN.

Far, very far, am I from being a graduate in the school of human nature. Yet even my advantages, limited as they have been, enable me to state, with no small share of confidence, that "every thing is not gold that is called gold." It has been remarked, that people never undertake to counterfeit a bad article; and this remark is undoubtedly true: for rogues are very seldom fools. But this is not the only truth in the world. There is one more, at least, as true as this is; and that is, that good and bad articles should not all go by the same name—or, in other words, that counterfeit money should be called counterfeit money.

Now I wish to apply these remarks to men as well as things. The term liberality, by the persevering efforts of a few worthy and generous-hearted souls, has become quite a dignified appellation, and liberal men, at the present day, are of no small importance. The consequence is, that there is getting to be a great many liberal men in the world. The spurious coin is coming into market; and about every real, downright, iron-fisted, hollow-hearted miser in the country, is endeavoring to dignify himself with this honorable epithet, and is luxuriating himself most deliciously in the contemplation that he is a liberal man! If I mistake not, this epithet is now generally applied to all Universalists indiscriminately. Yet, for myself, I have never discovered the propriety of so doing. It is true, that as a body, Universalists have very liberal views; and if this were all that is meant by the term "liberal," then there would be no impropriety in applying it to all Universalists. But the word as it is now used, has a much wider range, and is understood to have a signification entirely different from that to which we have here alluded. In this sense it signifies, not merely a generous-headed man, but a generous-hearted one; not simply theoretical, but practical liberality; not barely a profession, but a heartfelt possession of an enlarged and expansive benevolence—a benevolence that shall prompt its possessor to do sometimes, and not to be eternally and everlastingly talking about doing. This is the meaning of the term "liberality," if I have a correct understanding of things. And in this sense it is no more applicable to some professed Universalists, than it is to a man made of beeswax with a cast iron soul.

It is true that all benevolent and philanthropic men must act from the fundamental principles of Universalism. But it is not true that all Universalists act from the fundamental principles of benevolence and philanthropy. From these considerations it will be seen that the epithet "liberal," though not applicable to all Universalists, is, notwithstanding this fact, decidedly and exclusively a Universalian term. For no one can be liberal in theory, without being a theoretical Universalist; no one can be liberal in practice, without being a practical Universalist; and no one can possibly unite the two, without being a Universalist in deed and in truth. Now the first of these, without the second, is like a body without a soul—dead: and I appeal to any reasonable man to say whether any dead thing should be called liberal.

Let, then, every thing be called by its proper name. Let there, at least, be some distinguishing characteristic between a shadow and a substance—between spurious and genuine liberality. We should hardly call a man "liberal" because he had an excellent treatise on liberality in his library; but a man's liberality may as well be in his book-case as in his head. There are, beyond all doubt, two distinct classes of liberal men. Justice requires that they should have two distinct appellations. And being a lover of justice myself, I have concluded in future to speak of Liberal-headed men and liberal-hearted men. Always understanding by the former, those who are forever talking about being "poor," "having a large and expensive family to support," "owing a great deal," "paying a large sum for preaching, building meeting-houses," etc.; and who, on an average, are not worth more than ten thousand dollars—own not over half a township—have a wife and one child to provide for—borrow all the Universalist newspapers in town, for their families to read, and pay twenty-five cents annually for preaching. And by the latter, understanding those who, whether poor or rich, are the "stay and the staff" of every society—whose generous souls are warmed by universal philanthropy, and one of whom, though he may not be worth a farthing in the world, will do more for the public benefit, more to alleviate the sorrows and promote the happiness of his fellow-men, than a million of the former. For one, I am heartily sick of the story, "We are poor." Why, in the name of common sense, not come out and tell the truth? "We adore Mammon in this place, and bow at the shrine of gold and silver. This we do with all our might, mind, soul and strength, and had much rather take two shillings out of the 'urn of poverty,' than to put one in!" But I am spinning out this subject to an unnecessary length. I will now propose three or four questions to the reader, and close.

Suppose that you were a preacher, and, if you please, a young one. And a very liberal-headed man, who would never hear any other denomination but his own—having had a friend die—should send twelve or fifteen miles for you to attend the funeral. You agree to go. The time arrives, and you, having no conveyance of your own, hire one. You go—attend to the services—receive a hearty thank you, Sir—return home through the rain—pay two dollars for your conveyance, and are sick a week in consequence of riding in the rain. How long would it take you to get rich at this rate, allowing you had such a call weekly? Add to this the fact, that you are employed at the same time by a society, that by way of encouragement to young preachers, agrees to give them about half as much as will sustain them; and after keeping them a year or two, and bestowing a large share of praise upon them, sends them off with an excellent prospect of not getting any thing under three or four years, and a tolerable good one of never getting any thing at all; add this, I say, to the former consideration, and how long would you be likely to live, provided you devoted the whole of your time to the clerical office?

And if such a circumstance should occur among the liberal class, what would you expect among the illiberal class? or, in other words, if liberal men would starve you to death, what would il-liberal men do?

Lastly: if you wished to build a small meeting house in your town, how many liberal-headed men, worth ten thousand dollars a piece, would it take to build it?—or, to come more immediately to the point, how many dead bodies would it take to make a living one?

Very respectfully, SIGMA.

AN OBJECTION CONSIDERED.

The remark has often been made, "that the doctrine of universal salvation may do to live by, but it will afford no support in the hour of death." Paradoxical as is this objection, there are many with this impression on their minds—and thus viewing the doctrine, are unwilling to examine, in a serious and candid manner, the evidence which its advocates adduce as proof of its harmony with the dictates of reason, the teachings of nature, and the voice of Divine Revelation.

It will be seen, that in order to present a strong and formidable objection, it is first granted that this much despised doctrine may do to live by; an admission strangely at variance with the many sermons and volumes which have been written to prove its licentious and demoralizing tendency! Universalism is good in life. It is based on the paternal character of God—the brotherhood of the human race—and who will deny that these doctrines are calculated to exert a happy influence on the human mind and heart? Wherever these shall prevail, tyranny and oppression shall cease—violence and wasting be no more known. Those to whom these tidings come, who shall be baptised into the spirit of these all-important truths, shall no more learn war; they shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning hooks; "the loftiness of man shall be bowed down, and the haughtiness of man shall be made low;" they shall "dwell together in unity;" "and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day."

But even should all this be allowed, in the opinion of the opposer, its sustaining power will utterly vanish in the hour of death! But upon what is this opinion founded? Can a single reason be given? Should Universalism prove false, will it be contended for a single moment, that an individual, who with true sincerity of soul regards it as the truth of Heaven, and who has adorned this doctrine "with a well-ordered life," will have reason to tremble in view of death? Will he be condemned in a future world, for honesty and sincerity in this? Or have those who have believed this doctrine, renounced it in a dying hour? Such instances we have heard "by the hearing of the ear," but under such circumstances, that we can but regard them as "idle tales." These renunciations have come from those who profess never to have believed the doctrine, and are entitled from this one consideration, to no weight whatever. On the contrary, thousands have died as they lived, cherishing this holy faith, inspired by its hopes, and blessed with its rich consolations. They have entered the "dark valley of shadows," not fearful and faithless, but in peace and with joy. "To die," was "to go home"—to exchange a world of imperfection and frailty for a state of perfect purity, fadeless glory and bliss—to dwell in the more immediate presence of their Father and God—to behold his glory "face to face," and unite in the ceaseless worship and adoration of heaven! They had borne the image of the earthy, and desired to be crowned with the radiant glory of the heavenly!

Let those who urge the objection we are considering, peruse the memoirs of Elhanan Winchester, of John Murray, or of the zealous and devoted Hanscom, and they will be compelled to acknowledge that Universalism has power to sustain and console in death!

"His faith sustains him in his final hour."

If this be denied, we ask where shall we find a faith which will yield comfort and support?—Shall we go to the Skeptic, who has pronounced death an eternal sleep? Will this give us the spirit of resignation and peace? Oh! can this satisfy the longing desires, the everlasting aspirations of the human soul? It can not be! The Father of our spirits hath opened the "fountain of living waters"—whosoever will, may come, and drink, and thirst no more forever.

The teachings of skepticism will not answer our wants. "To whom shall we go?" To him who believes that all shall be raised from the dead; yet, that to a great portion of our race, that resurrection shall be their everlasting curse?—Will this sustain and cheer us? Can we die in peace, cherishing the thought that a father, a beloved mother, our brothers and sisters, many loved and valued friends, shall be consigned to everlasting wo and despair? Nay! skepticism, horrible and revolting as it is, is far preferable to such a system as this. We cease to wonder at the prevalence of infidelity, when we reflect that this doctrine has long been considered the corner stone of the Christian temple!

We conclude this article by expressing our belief, that Universalism is the only doctrine which can rob death of its sting, and the grave of its victory. It gives us assurances of God's everlasting mercy and love! It teaches us that our existence is not bounded by the narrow limits of time. It whispers the joyous tidings of unfading life and everlasting glory and felicity. Its blessings are universal. It enables us, by the eye of faith, to behold the destruction of sin and death, the lost race of Adam cleansed from all impurity and evil, and crowned with immortal life and salvation! For this we love its teachings, and prize its consolations! H. R. N.

BIGOTRY—A FACT.

A short time since a lady of this place, a member of the German Methodist church, sent one of her children to the apothecary's to purchase a box of pills, and the child returned with a box labelled "Universal pills"—an article much used. As soon as the pious lady saw the name, that was sufficient for her, she instantly sent them back, saying, she was not going to have any Universalist pills in her house! Such is a sample of her opposition to the doctrine of God's impartial grace. We know not what virtue there is in the pills referred to above, but having had resource to the balm of Gilead, i. e., the doctrine of universal salvation, we feel confident in saying it is an excellent remedy for bigotry, and as such we can recommend it. REMARKS.

It is worthy of remark, praise and imitation, and matter of encouragement to others, that we had a full delegation from nearly all the societies within the limits of this Association. And the cheering news which they brought from the different parts of the heritage of the Lord, enables us to "thank God and take courage," feeling that "truth is mighty and will prevail." And while we hence feel that our "stakes are strengthened," and our strength renewed, our borders have been enlarged by the addition of one new society, organized within the past year. And we do most sincerely hope—and may we not confidently expect—that the few societies who neglected to send delegates, will, in view of their duty and interest, and the full and able representation which appeared in our council, "go and do likewise," that the Green Fields which have solicited their presence and communion another year, may not become dry, nor be disappointed.

It is true, we anticipate a good deal, and perhaps more than we have reason to, when we glance our minds forward to the next meeting of this body of disciples, and expect a full representation of every society within the limits of this Association. Brethren, this would tell well for your zeal and the prosperity of our common and glorious cause. Shall we see it?—the dead arise, the languishing arouse, the living and zealous confirmed, and the hopes of all thus renewed and strengthened? The cause in which we are engaged demands it, and may God in his infinite and changeless mercy grant it. Per order. J. A. Aspinwall.

NEW-YORK ASSOCIATION.

The New-York Association of Universalists held its annual meeting in North Salem, Westchester county, on Wednesday and Thursday, October 16th and 17th, and opened its session by uniting in prayer with Br. Le Fevre. Chose Hezekiah Scott, Esq., Moderator, and Br. S. J. Hillyer, Clerk.

The committee of discipline reported that no cause of complaint had come before it.

Appointed Brs. Le Fevre, Sawyer and Hillyer, a committee of discipline for the ensuing year.

Appointed Brs. Whittaker, Le Fevre and Sawyer, a committee on fellowship and ordination.

Whereas, this Association is well satisfied of the Scripture warrant for church organization, and the administration of the Lord's Supper; and whereas we consider these institutions as highly conducive to our spiritual growth and stability, therefore,

Resolved, That we affectionately but earnestly recommend to the several societies within our borders, that they take measures for such organization and the due administration of the ordinances of the Lord's house.

Whereas, this Association contemplates with heartfelt sorrow the deplorable evils produced by the use of ardent spirits, both on the civil, religious, and social condition of the community at large, therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend to the societies and to all individuals professing the faith of universal salvation, within our limits, to abstain from the use of intoxicating drinks, and as far as possible, to dissuade others from their use.

A request having been made by Samuel B. Brittan to receive the fellowship of this Association, and the same having been accompanied by the most satisfactory testimonials from the society in Newark, N. J., with which he is connected, we most cheerfully recommend him to the kind consideration of our Universalist brethren, but are restricted by a resolution passed at the last session of this body, in accordance with the recommendation of the State Convention, from granting letters of fellowship until the expiration of one year.

Appointed Brs. W. Whittaker and S. J. Hillyer, clerical, and Lewis Seymour and Hezekiah Scott, Esqrs., lay, delegates to the next session of the New-York State Convention, to be holden at Utica, on the last Wednesday and following Thursday of May, 1840.

Appointed Br. C. F. Le Fevre to deliver the Occasional Sermon at our next session.

Appointed Br. T. J. Sawyer to prepare the minutes of the proceedings of this session for publication, and accompany the same with a Circular Letter.

United in prayer with Br. Sawyer.

Adjourned to meet in Newark, N. J., on Wednesday and Thursday, October 7th and 8th, 1840.

HEZEKIAH SCOTT, Moderator.
S. J. HILLYER, Clerk.

Delegates Present.—Lewis Seymour, Second Society in New-York, Wm. Pirsson, Third Society, B. St. John, Newark, N. J., Lewis Rich and Hezekiah Scott, North Salem.

Clerical Brethren Present—S. J. Hillyer, No. Salem, C. F. Le Fevre and T. J. Sawyer, New-York. Brs. E. Hitchcock and Z. Cook, visitors.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

Brethren—Through the continual goodness of God we have been permitted to hold another session of the New York Association. We have to regret that so few of our societies were fully represented, and that three or four were not represented at all in this body, and sincerely hope that measures will be taken before another session, to remedy this evil. We are aware that several of the societies within this Association are unfortunately destitute of stated preaching, but we can not feel that this circumstance is a justification of the neglect which they evince. To preserve their corporate existence, is necessary that they should hold an annual meeting for the election of officers, and that time would afford a convenient season also for the appointment of delegates to the Association. Let us also enjoin upon societies the duty of appointing such individuals as will attend.

It will be seen by a reference to the minutes of our proceedings, that a resolution was passed recommending the organization of Churches within our several societies where they are not already formed, and the due administration of the Lord's Supper. According to the statute of the State under which all societies, as corporate bodies capable of holding property and legally transacting business, must be formed, any individual may become a member of the society by signifying his wishes to the Clerk, and contributing for the period of twelve months in the ordinary way to its support. Of course no Christian discipline is possible. Indeed, a society, as such, is not, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, a church. The Lord's Supper we can not but regard as an institution of the great Master's own appointment, and feel that it is an important means of Christian growth. Every disciple of Jesus, we are humbly of opinion, will be benefitted by celebrating the Lord's Supper—by eating and drinking of the symbols of the body and blood of Christ, in memory of him and in accordance with his own injunction: "This do in remembrance of me."

It will be gratifying to our friends to learn that one brother, well qualified as a preacher, and sustaining an irreproachable moral character, has applied to the Association for its fellowship. Acting under a resolution adopted at the last session of this body, in accordance with a recommendation of the State Convention, it was deemed improper to grant letters of fellowship till the expiration of one year, but the Association takes pleasure in expressing its entire satisfaction with the candidate's credentials, both as to talents and character, and in recommending him to the kindly attentions and countenance of the denomination.

The Association felt itself called upon once more to bear its testimony against intemperance, and the hope is entertained that the whole body within our borders will second and adopt the resolution here passed. It is indispensably necessary to the true well-being of society at large. We hope that the tremendous evil of intemperance does not rest upon us as a denomination, more heavily than upon other religious bodies, but the least of it is too much to be endured, and wherever the cause exists, the blighting curse must be expected to follow. Be sober, be vigilant.

Our late session, we trust, has been a profitable, as it certainly was an eminently happy one. The weather was delightfully fine, the audience large and highly attentive, and a most kindly feeling was manifest, both in the business of the council, and among the people generally. Seven discourses were delivered by Brs. Le Fevre, Hitchcock, Cook and Sawyer. By order of the Association. THOMAS J. SAWYER.

Experience teaches us that a certain degree of ceremony and etiquette is to be kept up, even between near relatives and intimate friends.

* Four lay delgates! did not our brethren know that but two are allowed by the Constitution of the Convention?

† The subject alluded to in this item of the minutes, has since been fully settled. The new committee and the parties have had an interview, and all, we are informed, has been satisfactorily explained. We suppose there will be an official notice of it, but have deemed it proper to append this note for the present information of those interested.

THE ORIGIN OF CURSING.

Mankind, it is said, are apt to believe what they wish to be true. Is it not also true that they frame their wishes according to their belief? Certain it is, that frequently the idea that their belief will prove true, gives a sort of joy to their minds. I will not analyze the cause—nor even the precise nature of the effect—it is sufficient for my purpose to establish the fact.

Have any of you ever attended a controversy between a Universalist and a Partialist? If you did, and observed the countenances of our Partialist brethren who were present at the discussion, you must have seen both positive and negative proof of my statement. While the Universalist was earnestly proving that all men, without exception, would certainly be finally made holy and happy—the Partialist countenances would grow sad and gloomy—they would grow uneasy, and look with anxious, wistful glances at each other, and at the advocate of Partialism, as if trying to gather some comfort—some hope that the doctrine of endless misery would yet be able to stand. Well, that was negative proof—proof that they had framed wishes in accordance with the teachings of their faith—wishes that triumphed for a time over the natural humanity and benevolence of their minds.

But they also afforded positive proof of the same fact. The advocate of Partialism came up to the defence of endless wo. The eyes of his fellow believers were fixed on him full of anxious, wistful expectation. He spoke of the ante-diluvian destruction, and brought what he deemed full proof of their endless wo. The eyes of Partialists sparkle. He speaks of the people of Sodom and Gomorrah. They exult. He speaks of the Jews—their sudden destruction—but instead of weeping over them as did Jesus over their temporal calamities, they rejoice with exceeding joy that the doctrine of endless misery for these poor beings, is a truth of revelation.—And every new proof, or attempt at proof, which he advances, increases their joy to rapture—almost to shouting and exultation.

Now can you believe that these people would thus rejoice, if they had not previously believed in the sentiment, and felt an interest in supporting it? Certainly not. They have the natural feelings of humanity as we have, and in all ordinary cases, they manifest their compassion and tenderness to even objects deserving much suffering and anguish. But oh, the hardening influence of a cruel creed! It infuses the spirit of cruelty and demoniac joy into the human heart—curdles the streams of affection and kindness into bitter coagulations, and freezes the heart to adamantine indifference. In such cases, a man becomes clothed in curses as with a garment. He utters the loud "amen," and "praise God" to the most awful curses on his fellow-beings, and rejoices with malignant cruelty in the prospective endless damnation of half the human race! Not that his feelings, but his creed requires it—not that he naturally hates them, but because he feels bound to hate what God hates, and to exult over those whom he believes God delights to punish!

I know also that these feelings are but temporary—and are only excited when his creed excites them. But habit rivets them more closely to his heart—and after a time they enter more familiarly into his every day thoughts. Rouse in such a man what phrenology calls combativeness, and destructiveness will be exercised warmly in conjunction with it and self-esteem, while every feeling of benevolence will be cold and lifeless. He will not oppose, or wish to oppose for the creature's good—but to destroy—to inflict anguish and wo without any prospect of benefit to the sufferer.

This was emphatically the case with the first advocate of endless misery in the Christian church—I mean Tertullian, the first Christian who ever asserted that the misery of the wicked would be equal in duration to the happiness of the saints. No earlier advocate of endless wo can be found in the Christian church. Tertullian flourished in the third century. His cruel, severe, gloomy and vehement passions were well suited to the doctrine he so delighted in advocating.

"You are fond of spectacles;" says he, in allusion to Pagan shows; "there are other spectacles: that day, disbelieved, derided by the nations, that last and eternal day of judgment, when all ages shall be swallowed up in one conflagration—what a variety of spectacles shall then appear! How shall I admire, how laugh, how rejoice, how exult, when I behold so many kings, worshipped as gods in heaven, together with Jove himself, groaning in the lowest abyss of darkness: so many magistrates who persecuted the name of the Lord, liquefying in fiercer flames than they ever kindled against Christians; so many sage philosophers blushing in raging fire, with their scholars whom they persuaded to despise God, and to disbelieve the resurrection; and so many poets shuddering before the tribunal, not of Rhadamanthus, not of Minos, but of the disbelieved Christ! Then shall we hear the tragedians more tuneful under their own sufferings; then shall we see the players far more sprightly amidst the flames; the charioteer all red hot in his burning car; and the wrestlers hurled, not upon the accustomed list, but on a plain of fire!" Such is the spirit and genius of endless wo—such the origin of cursing and cruelty. It is wit without benevolence—cruelty and self-esteem in active exercise, with no conscience to control, no goodness to soften it. May God in his tender mercy ever preserve us from such a spirit, and such a creed. The spirit and the creed are precisely those that now prompt the saying, at camp and revival meetings, when sinners laugh, "ah, you may laugh now, but the time is coming when you will weep! It will then be our turn to laugh—glory be to God!" I think you will agree with me, that in this spirit and its congenial creed we find the origin of cursing.

SECTARIAN SCHOOLS.

Among the schemes which party or sectarian zeal has put into operation, none have entered so fully into all the social, and political, and intellectual, and moral relations of mankind, none have been backed by so shameless a power, as those which have been and are designed to promote and perpetuate in the world the God-dishonoring theme of endless misery. Every plan which the ingenuity of mind could devise, and which could be made available to this purpose, has been seized upon and pushed to the utmost extreme. The complicated machinery of political government, the power of bigotry, the palsying influence of superstition, the maddening horrors of exhausted reason through religious fear, the power of prejudice awakened by wilful misrepresentation, have all been had in requisition to preserve this most abominable and barbarous relic of satan's kingdom.

But there are no means which require to be watched with a more indefatigable eye, than the schools of learning which are springing up all over our country, within the control of Partialists. Here it is, that may be seen the last efforts of religious policy to support error, by instilling it into the youthful mind. The doctrine of endless misery must be sustained, and there is no way of doing this so effectually, as by bringing the children of its opposers under the influence of sectarian teachers, and sectarian libraries, from which every thing opposed to the favorite dogma is excluded. We are decidedly opposed to the introduction of sectarism into our halls of education. We would not, however, exclude religious works from the libraries of the higher institutions; but we do say that it is not only dishonest, but that it is an insult upon community to introduce works into them, advocating any set of religious opinions, to the entire exclusion of others. And we warn Universalists and all who regard the welfare and happiness of the rising generation, to beware of sectarian schools, and above all, when the doctrine of endless misery is the prominent trait of that sectarism. Guardians, trust your charges to their care, and they will come forth from them casting imputations upon the name of the Most High, which would do dishonor to the meanest inhabitant of earth! Parents, trust your children to their influence, and they will teach them to call you outcasts from the mercy of Heaven, and to believe you justly deserving the curses of the eternal God!

The following incident, which occurred within the knowledge of the writer, gave rise to the necessity for this article, and shows what efforts the advocates of endless misery will use to bring their theory to the notice of the youthful student, and how fearful they are to have it viewed in contrast with that sentiment which "is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."

A few days since the Rev. Mr. Delevan called at the office of the Magazine and Advocate, and solicited a donation of books for the benefit of the library attached, or about to be attached, to the recently established Academy in Sherburne. Br. H. being willing to present our own publications, ascertained that the library already contained religious works, and among them many from the publications of the American Sunday School Union, and some from those of the American Tract Society. He therefore properly concluded that they ought not to object to such religious and moral works as he saw fit to present, and accordingly made up a package, which the Rev. gentleman accepted without examination. Among the books presented, were a Voice to Youth, Causes of Infidelity Removed, Life of Murray, and Ballou's Notes on the Parables. But, alas, the old adage of "Beggars must not be choosers," has become obsolete, and sectarian beggars not only choose what to read themselves, but dictate to the reading world! The sentiments which the gentleman wished to promulge through his library, were so destitute of reason and common sense, that he was afraid to trust them, even with only three small volumes in favor of Universalism. And so, ashamed of himself, or for some other reason, he returned the books, the same day on which he received them, by another person, with the message that he did so, not out of disrespect for the donor, but because he thought the trustees who had the management of the school, would not be willing to have them in the library!

Now, kind reader, think of this. These very magnanimous, pious and Christian people, will let you support their schools, if you will only let them teach the people to hate you for your faith. They will furnish a library for themselves at your expense, but you must consent that they may make tom-fools of you, by tainting every thing that comes in contact with them, with their heathen creeds. They will even have the impudence to call at your door, and solicit your aid, under the expectation of teaching your children, your friends, or your associates, that which you loathe and abominate.

Again, I say, beware of these truckling, one-sided, hot beds of sectarism.

P. S.—As the Clinton Liberal Institute is based upon unsectarian principles, affording to all the privilege of thinking conscientiously, and as it is desirous of placing the means of obtaining information upon all important subjects within the reach of its students, I venture to assure our good Limitarian friends, that not even donations of Partialist works will be excluded from its library.

ZELOTES FULLER.

The Gospel Banner, and the Evangelist and Watchman, have copied a notice of this man from the Philadelphia "Weekly Messenger," in which Mr. Fuller is declared to be "a man of talents, of generous and honorable feelings, irreproachable moral and ministerial character, and is universally respected and beloved by his acquaintance." In copying it, our brethren speak of him as a Universalist preacher, refer to his acquittal at his late trial for assaulting a married woman, and seem to endorse the laudatory language of the Philadelphia paper in reference to his character and standing—and the Evangelist and Watchman even invites the rest of our papers to copy the article.

For one, I could copy, but can not endorse that article; for I do not believe in the "honorable feelings" of Zelotes Fuller—I do not believe that his moral and ministerial character are irreproachable—and I am certain that he is not "universally respected and beloved by his acquaintances." Neither can I recognize as a Universalist preacher, one who has not been the pastor of any society, or even preached statedly any where, for more than three years—nor has, during that time, attended the meetings of the Association in which he resides, nor of the Pennsylvania State Convention.

In thus giving my opinion, and stating facts, I do not mean to cast discredit on the statement, that Z. Fuller is guiltless of the charges on which he was tried; for the jury pronounced him not guilty—but our friends abroad will do well to read the testimony given in at the trial, before they hazard their veracity in declaring him free from imprudence.

In conclusion—let our brethren of the press be a little cautious how they bite at any bait that may be thrown out to them, (they know not by whom,) in the secular press, nor hastily copy every article which, at first sight, may seem to favor our cause. Better wait, in all doubtful cases like the present, till those brethren nearest to, or best acquainted with, the person or place, endorse it, before they take it up, and so give it a weight it does not deserve. Brs. Price and Sawyer of the Universalist Union, and Br. Whittemore, of the Trumpet, will scarcely copy the article from the Philadelphia Weekly Messenger in an approbatory manner; for they know Zelotes Fuller, or, at least, his standing while a recognized preacher of the denomination, and since.

A. B. G.

N. B.—Rev. Savillion W. Fuller, at present, and for several years past, the pastor of the Callowhill-street Society of Universalists, must not be confounded with Zelotes Fuller, who was, a number of years ago, the pastor of the same Society. This confounding has been done a number of times, with great injustice to Br. S. W. Fuller, who is a universally recognized preacher of our order, and in good—uniformly good standing as such, and who is well beloved and highly esteemed wherever known, as a man of much intellectual and moral worth, and as an able preacher of the reconciliation. He has never been, and probably never will be subjected to the necessity of appealing to a jury of his country to be cleared from the charge of highly criminal and immoral conduct.

THE UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES REPOSITORY.

The December number of this beautiful and excellent periodical, has been read with much interest, for it contains three articles alluding to, or treating of, the departure of the Publisher's bosom companion; two by the Editors, who knew her well and loved her much, and a poetic article by the deceased, written on the first anniversary of her wedding day, when all was yet as bright, and glorious, and full of reasons for joy and gratitude to God, as when she plighted her faith to "one almost too dearly prized." There is another article by Miss M. A. Dodd, "The wife's farewell," so perfectly in unison with the last farewells of the deceased, as to warrant the belief that it had that event as its subject.—The remaining articles are usually well written, as well as those above noticed. Indeed, under the present Editors, the Repository has attained a height of excellence beyond which they will find it very difficult to go. It is almost, if not quite, as good as such a work can be made, and such is our confidence in the discernment of the fair sisterhood, that we do not believe they will need urging to induce them to support their periodical, not by merely subscribing for it, but by more substantial tokens of their approbation.

Theological Library.—By mistake I attributed the remarks of Br. Price of the Universalist Union, to his co-editor, Br. Sawyer. This correction may be necessary, as, I believe, co-editors are not always of the same mind on all subjects.

By-the-bye. Why do we not hear from the brethren in this Association—our preachers, trustees of societies, etc.—on this subject? Have they forgotten it? Or, are they yet engaged in collecting the requisite information? I hope it is the latter.

THE DISCUSSION WITH A. CAMPBELL.

The question is often asked by our friends and the public, whether my discussion with Rev. Alexander Campbell is to be published in a volume by itself, or not? Also, if published, when, on what terms, etc., etc. In answer to these inquiries I would here state that it is settled, that the work is to be published at this office as soon as all the necessary arrangements and preliminaries therefor can be settled, which indeed I had expected would have been settled before this time. I have exchanged several letters with Mr. C. on the subject. He seems backward in agreeing to what I deem fair and right in the premises. My last letter to him, written two months ago, still remains unanswered. Why, I can not imagine.

It will not be practicable now, after settling the preliminary arrangements, to get the work through the press and ready for the market before Spring—we hope to do so by that time.

We are not yet fully decided as to the form of the work, whether to publish in 12mo or 8vo; nor can we yet determine precisely what will be the price of the work when published. It will make a volume of from 300 to 500 pages, according to the form and type used in publishing; and it will be retailed at such a price as it can be afforded. The price will not be over $1,50, and may not much if any exceed $1. This will be determined on before the work is ready for delivery.—This much, however, we will state beforehand: any person subscribing and paying for five copies of the work, shall be entitled to the sixth copy gratis. Any of the agents or subscribers, therefore, for this paper, that choose to order one, six, or more copies of the Discussion, when published, can do so when they write to the publishers of the Magazine and Advocate relative to their papers, and their orders shall be attended to.

CORECTION.

Two weeks ago we made a mistake in our religious notices, by giving several notices for the fourth Sunday which should be for the fifth. Among them was one for Br. Gibson, (the rest were corrected last week,) which was not corrected, by reason that we were not certain of the mistake in his case. Let it be understood, therefore, that Br. Gibson preaches in Bridgewater on the fifth Sunday inst., instead of the fourth.

Br. Price—Send current Vol. Union, (octavo form,) to Jesse Richards, Binghampton, and credit him $2.00 Also, credit Freeman Temple, Binghampton, $3.00—Charge G. & H.

Br. Bazin—Send next Vol. Expositor to Rev. H. B. Soule, Fort Plain, N. Y.

ONE NUMBER MORE.

Money comes in slowly, and debts fall due rapidly, so that we are kept in continual want and trouble.—Can not our delinquents of more than one year's standing, quicken their motions a little more?

One number more closes this volume, and we fear there are some, whom, (if they would but pay what they have been owing for two, three and four years,) we would be glad to retain on our list, that we must strike off, and resort to legal means to collect our dues. We beg of them not to compel us to resort to such measures—yes, we beg them to save us from the necessity of discontinuing their papers for delay of payment.—We would be glad to have them as subscribers for many long years to come, if they will only give us yearly evidence that they deserve to be such.

POETRY.

[From the Metropolis.]

TAKE THE RUBY WINE AWAY.

Bring me forth the cup of gold,
Chased by Druid's hands of old,
Filled from yonder fountain's breast,
Where the waters are at rest;
This for me—in joyous hour,
This for me—in beauty's bower,
This for me—in manhood's prime,
This for me—in life's decline.

Bring me forth the humbler horn,
Filled by hunter's hand at morn,
From the crystal spring that flows
Underneath the blooming rose,
Where the violet loves to sip,
Where the lily cools her lip;
Bring me this—and I will say,
Take the ruby wine away!

Take away the damning draught,
By the bacchanalian quaffed!
Take away the liquid death—
Serpents nestle in its breath,
Terror rides upon its flood,
Vice surrounds its brim of blood,
Sorrow in its bosom stings,
Sorrow buoyed on pleasure's wings.

Dip the bucket in the well,
Where the trout delights to dwell—
Where the sparkling water sings,
As it bubbles from the springs—
Where the breezes whisper sweet,
Where the happy children meet,
Draw, and let the draught be mine—
Take away the rosy wine!

STANZAS.

O sweet was the dream of my own bright land,
Where the roses never die:
I saw the green banks where the hemlocks stand,
And the glad stream rushing by;
The ivy green on the garden wall;
The hills in their sunshine clad;
And the verdant leaves, that never fall,
To make the heart grow sad.

The voice of the dancing rills I heard,
The sigh of the evening breeze,
And the song of the merry mountain bird,
'Mong my native forest trees!
My tender mother kiss'd my cheek,
And my sister joyful came,
But tears gush'd forth ere her lips could speak,
To breathe her brother's name.

"Thou wilt go no more," at length she cried;
"Thou wilt part from us no more!
The tears of grief on our cheeks are dried,
And our fears for thee are o'er—
Thou'lt stay for the hearts that love thee here."
The pledge from my tongue had sped,
But the sentry's voice broke on my ear,
And my home, with the vision, fled.

I turned on my pallet—the waning moon
Looked dim through the broken cloud;
From the troubled lake the tempest tune
Came mournfully and loud.
To a day of toil burst the morning beam,
But lightly its labors fled:
For the home I saw in my morning dream
Its dew on my hopes had shed

WILLIAM PENN'S WAY OF GETTING WHAT HE WANTED.—Penn learned in 1698 that there was some very choice lands not included in his first purchase; and he sent to inquire of the Indians, if they would sell it.—They replied that they did not wish to part with the land where their fathers were resting, but to please their brother Onas—the name they gave the good man—they would sell him some of it. Accordingly, they agreed for a certain quantity of English goods, to sell such land, as one of his young men could walk round in a day, "beginning at the great river Cosquehanna, now Kensington, "and ending at the great river Neshaminy, now Bristol. This mode of measurement, which their own choice, did not in the end satisfy the Indians: for the young Englishman, chosen to walk off the tract of land, walked so fast and far as greatly to astonish and mortify them. The governor observed this dissatisfaction, and asked the cause. "The walker cheated us."

"Ah, how can it be?" said Penn; "did you not choose yourself to have the land measured in this way?"

"True," replied the Indians, "but white brother made a big walk."

Some of Penn's commissioners, waxing warm, said the bargain was a fair one, and insisted that the Indians ought to abide by it, and if not, should be compelled to it.

"Compelled!" exclaimed Penn; "how can you compel them without bloodshed? Don't you see this looks to murder?" Then turning with a benignant smile to the Indians, he said: "Well, brother, if you have given us too much land for the goods first agreed on, how much more will satisfy you?"

This proposal gratified them; and they mentioned the quantity of cloth, and number of fish hooks, with which they would be satisfied. These were cheerfully given; and the Indians, shaking hands with Penn, went away smiling.

After they were gone, the governor, looking round on his friends, exclaimed. "O how sweet and cheap a thing is charity! Some of you spoke just now, of compelling these poor creatures to stick to their bargain, that is, in plain English, to fight and kill them, and all about a little piece of land."—Adv. of Peace.

A QUEER SERMON.—Every number of the Sunday Morning Visiter, (published at New-York,) contains a sermon, but whether the preacher is a Christian, a Turk, or a Nothingarian, remains uncertain. He takes his text where he can find it. His last sermon is founded on a stanzas of Doctor Gridley, who died some years ago in this town:

"When a few more years are wasted,
When a few more springs are o'er,
When a few more griefs I've tasted,
I shall fail to bloom no more;"

and in moralizing thereupon, he urges parents to take special care of their children; to keep their sons from writing poetry till they can read the Testament; to give them a flogging when they need it, and let them go a fishing occasionally. As to the daughters, he thinks they should be disposed of in matrimonial market as early as convenient, because "soon after they are five and twenty, they 'fall to bloom no more;'" and he adds, with great emphasis, that "paint, gum, whalebone, hog's bristles and false hair, don't make a lovely girl of sixteen out of an old maid, by two-and-sixpence worth."—Exeter News Letter.

MARRIAGES.

DEATHS.

In Cooperstown, November 25th, WILLIAM GARNETT, youngest child of Rev. O. Whiston, aged 16 months.

"Though his eye hath brighten'd
Oft our weary way,
And his clear laugh lighten'd
Half our heart's disney;
Still in hope we give back what was given,
Yielding up the beautiful to Heaven." W.

In Richland, October 6th, 1838, of billious fever, Miss ESTHER ANDRUS DOOLITTLE, daughter of Hezekiah Doolittle, Esq., aged 20 years. She died as she had lived, in the full assurance of the blessed immortality of a ransomed world.

In Hartford township, Licking county, Ohio, August 21st, 1839, Mr. THOMAS ROSS, aged 70 years and 1 month. He died reconciled to his faith, in the full belief of the salvation of all men from sin and death. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning friends and a large collection, on the 22d, by the writer. T. STRONG.

In this city, on the 14th inst., after a long illness, Mrs. [illegible] wife of [illegible], in the 60th year of her age. [illegible] was spended in [illegible] and in death by all who knew her. Knowing the power of human love and goodness to overcome her evil, she felt a strong hope that, ultimately, all evil would be overcome by the boundless, endless and more efficacious love of God manifested in Christ Jesus, and taught by his spirit in the strong desires of the Christian soul. Thus dealing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with his God, he was cheered and sustained in his decline, while reason and language were left to him, by pleasing recollections of the past, by consciousness of present peace with God and man, and by the hope of purer bliss to come. May the blessing of Heaven rest on, and its consolations sustain the bereaved family and friends.

On the following Monday, after services at his late residence by Br. Skinner and the writer, his remains were taken to the Friends' meeting house in New-Hartford, followed by a long train of mourners and sympathising friends, who were there ably and feelingly addressed by Friend Nicholas Hallock, of this city. A. B. G.

In Cortland village, October 17th, Mrs. ELIZA FORD, aged 33 years. Sister Ford had long been a believer in the doctrine which teaches the ultimate holiness and happiness of all mankind, and her belief was to her an unfailing source of consolation. It supported her during a tedious illness, and enabled her to triumph in the dying hour. She lived universally respected by a large circle of friends and acquaintances, and her death was lamented by them all. May they be comforted by the assurance that the separation will be but short, and that they shall soon unite with her, in a heavenly home, in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb.

Her funeral was attended on the 18th, by Rev. Mr. Rowe, (Methodist,)—and on the 4th Sabbath of the same month, by request a discourse was delivered to the bereaved friends, and a respectable congregation, in the Universalist church, by the writer. A. C. B.

In Cortland, November 8th, Col. HEZEKIAH NEWCOMBE, aged 45 years. Col. Newcombe was formerly a resident of Massachusetts, and for several years a member of her legislature, enjoying the confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens, because of his strict, moral, upright deportment, his honesty and integrity.

For about four years previous to his death, Col. N. was a resident of this town, and as a man and a Christian, aught can not be said against him. In faith and practice he was a Universalist—he lived and died one. The report which has gone abroad, that he renounced his sentiments while on a death bed, is false as perjury. He clung to Universalism as his only support, when heart and flesh were failing, and like an angel of mercy, it did not desert him in the dying hour. He found it good to live by, and to die by. His funeral was attended on the following Sunday, and a discourse appropriate to the occasion delivered by the undersigned. May the God of all grace, comfort the widow and her fatherless children, and all who have by this dispensation of his providence been called to mourn. A. C. B.

FOLLY.

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

Around us there is a great deal of weakness of intellect, of castle building in the heavens, and bubble blowing! The first is in such as proclaim the pleasures of sin; the second, in such as convert the world without moving hand or foot; and the third, in such as are full of words and wind, sans order or wisdom. But the greatest folly I have met with, was that of Xerxes. This prince (the reader must remember he was a Persian, who commenced his reign 485 years before Christ) "was extravagant enough to believe, that all nature and the very elements were under his command." When he was on the point of entering Greece, at the head of an army of over two millions of men, he "wrote a letter to mount Athos, in the following terms: 'Athos, thou proud and aspiring mountain, that liftest up thy head unto the heavens, I advise thee not to be so audacious as to put rocks and stones which can not be cut, in the way of my workmen. If thou givest them that opposition, I will cut thee entirely down, and throw thee headlong into the sea.'" And again, when a violent storm arose and broke down the bridge which had been erected over the Hellespont, he "fell into a transport of rage; and in order to avenge himself for so cruel an affront, commanded two pair of chains to be thrown into the sea, as if he meant to shackle and confine it, and his men to give it three hundred strokes of a whip, addressing it in this manner: 'Thou troublesome and unhappy element, thus does thy master chastise thee, for having affronted him without reason. Know, that Xerxes will easily find means to pass over thy waters, in spite of all thy billows and resistance.'" Xerxes was called a great man, but if indeed he was so, his greatness must have been in something else than intellect or goodness, for there was neither in such conduct as this. Many men are called great, who, if put in the balance, would be found wanting. In my humble opinion, he is the greatest man that does the most for the dissemination of virtue and religion; and he the least, who lives against them. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; and to fear the Lord, is to keep his commandments.

HUMAN ERRORS.

BY REV. I. B. SHARP.

How evident it is, that a large class of community are so completely under the control of those who say that they are sent by God to teach mankind how to escape endless misery, that they do not stop to examine the sentiments of their teachers and compare them with the doctrine of Christ and his apostles! It is very frequently announced to mankind that they have violated the law of God, and that the penalty is eternal torment, which they justly deserve for so heinous an offence, but if they will comply with certain conditions prescribed by these would be wise men, they shall be acquitted from the penalty of the law, and made eternally happy. Now we ask if these sentiments do not encourage immorality? Is it not virtually saying that there is no difference between the most trivial, and the most outrageous offences?—that the man who is convicted of theft, is equally guilty with the unfortunate one who has committed murder? As both are a violation of the law of God, if we admit that the penalty is endless, would not the former transgressor come to the conclusion, that if he must receive it, the latter could receive no more, and thus be induced to go on in sin until his hands are polluted with blood, and his locks whitened with age? Again, does it not encourage immorality to place the judgment afar off as is done by men, even in the immortal world, and then represent the punishment as depending wholly upon the sinner's not complying with certain conditions before he is called to pass through the dark valley of the shadow of death? Do we not frequently hear people say that they have repented, and God has forgiven them the punishment which they so justly deserved—endless death—and that he will eventually crown them with immortal happiness, and that others can do the same if they will? To confirm this, we frequently hear them say that before they repented, they promised God that if he would spare their lives until a certain period arrived, they would get religion; but when the time came they were not ready, and made another promise to God that at some future time they certainly would forsake their wickedness and become Christians?

Now we ask if this confession does not prove that they indulge themselves in sin longer than they would have done, if they had not believed that the judgment of God was afar off, and they could repent at some future time, and escape the penalty of his law? We think that all who are not under the control of others, and have examined for themselves, must see that it does. Is it not important then that all should think for themselves, and that, when they are convinced of the truth, they sell it not. But we have said, and we think justly too, that many have not compared the sentiments advanced by their teachers with the doctrine of Christ and his apostles; and this is evident from the fact that many of the modern divines proclaim to the world that the greatest sinner can repent and escape the punishment which he justly deserves; and thousands believe it to be true, notwithstanding the apostle has left on record that "he who doeth wrong shall (not may) receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons." Now is it not evident that if the apostle has written the truth, faith, repentance or regeneration can not save the transgressor from receiving for the wrong which he hath done? The foregoing queries and suggestions are submitted to the consideration of the candid in hope that their minds may be enlightened, and the truth advanced among the children of men.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN A UNIVERSALIST AND NEGATIVE PARTIALIST.

BY A TYRO.

UNIVERSALIST. Good morning, neighbor Negative Partialist. How did you like Br. S. last Sabbath?

NEGATIVE PARTIALIST. Extremely well, Sir, he gave the brimstone characters a d—l of a peeling, and I was glad to hear it.

U. But are you sure that you liked him?—did you believe him throughout?

N. P. Every word of it from beginning to end.

U. But I am quite sure you did not like, or believe his preaching; indeed, I know you did not.

N. P. You must be in bright business laying me in a lie. What reason have you to suppose that I did not both believe and like his preaching?

U. (Rebuke them sharply, says Paul.) Bright business or not, you do absolutely lie, and you know you do, and I can prove it to your satisfaction.

N. P. Well, try then.

U. I will; but first, I wish to know whether you make it a practice of doing, every day, what you know is wrong?

N. P. No, never.

U. But did not the preacher hit you pretty severely with some of his lashes?

N. P. Not that I recollect of.

U. But did he not utterly protest against cursing and swearing?—did he not dwell long and pointedly against the immoral and degrading tendency of profanity of every description?

N. P. I believe he did, come to think of it.

U. Well, have I not heard you cursing and swearing about your premises every day this week, damning your neighbors or your neighbor's hogs, your balky horse, or something else that was not just right? Have you not been guilty of uttering some of the most blasphemous oaths that can fall from the lips of those that are refined in wickedness?

N. P. Perhaps it is so, but I was provoked to it.

U. Well, supposing you was provoked, does that justify your conduct?

N. P. I can not say that it does.

U. The case, then, stands thus: you heard Br. S. preach decidedly against profanity, showing its debasing tendency and immoral influence on the mind. You heard him point out the way to obtain true and lasting enjoyment, yet you gave no heed to his admonitions and instructions; therefore you did not believe them, for any rational man that believes a certain course of conduct will promote his happiness, will surely pursue it instead of running headlong in an opposite direction. You are much mistaken, Sir, about Br. S. giving his opposers generally a severe peeling. He respectfully pointed out what he believed to be erroneous in their doctrine, as every friend of truth should do, and reserved his lashes for the back of him that deserved them. Exit.

TOTAL DEPRAVITY.

That man's moral nature is evil of itself—his affections wholly averse to all that is religious and noble; is a doctrine which has long, too long, been believed by the Christian church. It took its origin in ignorance, and has been for centuries suppported by bigotry and the priesthood. Man did not study his own nature. The noble powers which a God of infinite goodness had bestowed upon him, were ignorantly regarded as the vilest and most debased of all the works of the omnipotent Creator. The seeds of sin are planted in the young child's soul. The deadly scorpion of moral evil, the serpent, whose very breath sends a destructive blight over the germs of virtue and happiness, lies hidden in its foul but fair bosom.

But as the parent takes the infant blossom into his arms, nature's fondest feeling, paternal love, spontaneously rises in his soul, and he rejoices that Heaven has granted him such a boon. Joy, deep and thrilling, penetrates his heart. The natural aspiration of his soul is, that the object of his tender love may ever remain as innocent and pure as it now is. Its blameless countenance reflects naught but love; its smiles rob him of his troubles. While the fond father is giving free vent to nature's finest feelings, with his mind soaring on the wings of adoration to God for his bountiful beneficence, a huge monster (for such it is) appears to his view. It is the Calvinistic creed. Mark his pale, ghastly, lengthened visage. He assumes the appearance of sobriety, though his garments are stained with the blood of Servetus. He points to the angelic infant, and coldly says, "there is total, moral depravity." He takes it in his arms and declares "of such is the empire of hell," "not a thought, not a wish, not a desire, but is morally corrupt." The father, bound by the strongest ties of his nature to love his child, revolts, his blood is chilled, the air about him sickens, and the silken cords of affection are almost ready to break, when reason resumes her throne. "Oh my God! hast thou given me an object which the very constitution of my nature compels me to love, yet not one particle of good does that object possess! The natural laws, the laws of God, compel me to love my child; but Calvinism declares 'that the spiritual law requires me to hate it;' for evil itself can not be worthy of love." Reader, which should he obey, Calvinism or the law of his nature? ANGELO.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1839.

THE CLOSING YEAR

Carries the mind back to its commencement, and brings to view the joys and sorrows, the hopes and fears which then agitated our bosoms—the prospects that then were extended before us, and the friends by whom we were surrounded. What a contrast to the present does such a view present! How few of those joys remain—how many of those sorrows have been displaced by others still greater! Those hopes—have they been realized? Those fears—were they not succeeded, again and again, by others as real and dark as they? The prospects then before us, are now in the past—oh, how differently does the setting sun cast its lights and shadows on what it enlightened when it rose! And the friends around us during the beginning of the year—where are they? Death—intervening distances—even changes in feelings and in worth tell us they are gone, perhaps for life! Such are a few of the reflections which are as applicable for a majority of our readers as for ourselves; for they tell but general changes of life—the common lot of humanity.

But there are changes in our own little department that come home to our hearts with double force for being felt alone. Our well tried and faithful partner in publishing this paper, wearied out with the cares and labors which the long continued neglect of subscribers and pecuniary reverses, heaped upon him, leaves us, to pursue our course with an other partner, and devotes himself wholly to the Book selling and publishing business.—May the blessing of Heaven, and the custom of a liberal and promptly paying public, go with him!

Here, too, we pause to shake the parting hand of a few of our oldest and best supporters—why will they give us such pain? Others, (some perhaps, very responsible men,) here receive a discontinuance from us, after we have waited in vain for a testimonial from them, that they should be retained. And others still—recent friends, but good ones—after a few years communion, also bid us good bye. We part from all in sorrow—from the good, with a regret mingled with fervent gratitude for their justice to our claims and their generosity to our wants—from the bad, (including the neglectful,) with sorrow that they have not warranted our confidence in their honor and honesty, in time to save us from cutting them off; for it is a cause of deep grief, to find that men are less worthy than we believed they were. And we will not deny that it would give us much pleasure to find many of these neglectful ones repenting of their conduct, and worthy of being reinstated in our good graces.

For myself, I am sensible—deeply and sorrowfully sensible of many failures and errors in my editorial duties during the past year—although an inward consciousness tells me my labors have excelled the pay received from a majority of our readers. But their neglect of duty can not excuse mine—nor mine, theirs. I am resolved to endeavor discharging my duties more faithfully during the next volume; and in this resolution, I say to all, let us atone, as far as we can, for our past neglect of duty, and avoid them in future—so shall both editors and subscribers be pleased and prospered. And now, to one and to all, we give the hearty wishes of this joyous season—to all from whom we now part, we bid the cordial, regretful farewell—may they do well, and they will certainly fare well. A. B. G.

PROPOSED CHANGES.

In order that all whom we now strike off for neglect of payment, may see the necessity which exists for the speedy settlement of their accounts, and for the information of all others interested in the matter, we announce, before hand, the following contemplated changes and arrangements for the coming year.

1. After the close of the present volume, the partnership now existing between A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson will be dissolved by mutual consent.

2. O. Hutchinson will take, and continue the Bookstore and the publication of the books, heretofore owned by the firm.

3. A. B. Grosh will take his brother, C. C. P. Grosh as the business partner instead of O. Hutchinson, and the publication of the Magazine and Advocate will be continued by the new firm of A. B. and C. C. P. Grosh. The Editor and co-Editors of the paper will remain the same as heretofore.

4. C. C. P. Grosh will continue the printing business in his own name, as heretofore.

5. All debts due to the establishment under the old firm—whether for books or subscriptions—must be paid to Grosh and Hutchinson at the earliest day possible, that they may pay all demands against them, and thus release each other, and their mutual securities, from the obligations now resting on them.

6. All debts for books contracted on or after the first day of January next, must be settled with the sole proprietor thereof, Mr. Hutchinson.

7. All subscriptions for volumes after the present volume, must be paid to the new firm of A. B. & C. C. P. Grosh.

8. All these changes and arrangements are and will be made in good faith, by mutual consent, and with unabated good will, confidence and respect among all the parties—and a continuance of patronage to all is respectfully solicited.

A. B. GROSH,
O. HUTCHINSON,
C. C. P. GROSH.

N. B.—All persons making remittances may direct to either firm or party, but will please state to whom made, and in what proportions (if any) they are to be applied on the old or on the new accounts; and this, too, whether the letters are directed to the old or the new firms, or to either of the persons composing the same. ☞ Please be particular in this matter.

A WORD TO UNIVERSALISTS.

By the above notice you will perceive that I shall no longer be connected with the publication of this paper. Being nothing more than a business partner in the establishment, I suppose I might with propriety withdraw silently from it, but as I have no idea of ceasing to apply my humble abilities to the promotion, as far as I am capable, of the heart cheering doctrine of Universalism, I think proper to say a few words in relation to my future course.

For more than a year after Br. Grosh and myself commenced publishing the paper, the only means of obtaining Universalist books in this vicinity were afforded by Br. Grosh, who kept a few on commission. But as commission books could not be furnished at such a price as to enable those to purchase who wished to sell again, we saw the necessity of enlarging the business so as to purchase and sell by the quantity.

We accordingly established a bookstore in the Spring of 1837, the business of which has continued to increase up to this time. Whether it has been for the benefit of the establishment or not, it has certainly been the means of disseminating much light which our Booksellers would gladly have smothered.

But as Br. Grosh's time is necessarily occupied with his editorial and clerical duties, this increase of business renders it impossible for me to do justice both to the business department of the paper, and Bookstore, and believing that the Bookstore, properly managed, may be made nearly if not quite as useful as the paper, I, with Br. Grosh's consent and approbation, have concluded to withdraw from the former, and devote my whole attention to the latter. I do this the more cheerfully as I have the fullest confidence in the business qualifications of Mr. C. C. P. Grosh, who will hereafter manage the business department of the paper.

To the real friends of the paper who have proved themselves so by their works, I tender my heartfelt thanks, with my best wishes that they and the future publishers may long continue to derive mutual benefit from each other.

But shall I succeed with the Bookstore? There are other questions to be answered in order to furnish answers to this. The first is, will those indebted to the old firm pay up, so as to furnish me capital to start with after paying debts which the firm is now owing? Another is, shall I so manage as to deserve the encouragement of the friends of liberal Christianity? And the last is, shall I receive that encouragement? Hope, the organ of which I happen to have pretty large, says yes, and I will not now anticipate any thing to the contrary; for justice as well as policy requires that all our old accounts should be settled up, and our debtors as well as ourselves released from further trouble with them, and as the hope of doing good, as well as self-interest will stimulate me to use every exertion to deserve patronage, I am sure that so far as I do deserve I shall receive it. I ask nothing more.

My principal care will be to keep a constant supply of the best Universalist, Phrenological, Sunday school and School Library books. I shall also endeavor to keep a good supply of the most approved school and classical books, together with a good variety of standard and miscellaneous works comprising the best of the new publications. Will liberal men reflect on the necessity of such an establishment, and act accordingly?

O. HUTCHINSON.

RELIGION IS CHEERING.

In many persons the loud laugh bespeaks a vacant mind, and in many others, it is as the crackling of thorns in a fire, a sound calculated to deceive the observer, and hide the roaring of the consuming flame. These facts, perhaps, but more probably the gloomy, appalling and heart-crushing doctrines of men, which have been mistaken for the pure Gospel of the blessed God, have created a wide spread and too common belief, that the gay, the cheerful, and the merry hearted are not (indeed, can not be) religious—that the reception of religion into the understanding and the affections, necessarily fills the former with a heavy weight of thought, and the latter with a saddening gloom of melancholy seriousness.—That it may give weight to the thoughts and seriousness to the feelings of many—of a majority of our race—is not denied; but when it is remembered that a full reception of religion implies reconciliation to God; and peace with man, it must be seen at once that there can be nothing in pure religion that is necessarily saddening, gloomy and melancholy. On the contrary, an entire reconciliation to the will, dispensations and purposes of our heavenly Father—an entire trust and confidence in all he does and purposes to do—and an unfeigned love to him and to all mankind, must, in its very nature be cheering to the soul—must impart heavenly joy and peace, even joy unspeakable—peace that passeth understanding, and gladness that is full of the hope of glory.

And there are those whose lives have passed in such general innocency and affection—whose sun rose so clear and ever shone brightly—whose mental and moral constitutions are in such perfect harmony with the gay, and bright, and beautiful and cheering in nature around them, that not to smile and look pleased in all ordinary circumstances, and to laugh heartily and merrily in seasons of joy and rejoicing, were for them the rankest hypocrisy. The cheerful smile and the heartfelt laugh of such innocency of soul, is their hymn of gratitude and praise to their heavenly Benefactor—they are not only at peace with mankind and reconciled to God, but they are highly pleased with the world around them, and supremely happy in the dispensations of Providence in which they live and move.

These reflections have been awakened by reading the sermon of Br. Henry Bacon on the death of Mrs. Lucy Ann Tompkins, the wife of Br. Abel Tompkins, whose departure we noticed a few weeks since. Those who err respecting the cheering nature of religion would have been apt to misjudge sister Tompkins—for she seemed ever gay and cheerful, and her frank and hearty laugh, when much pleased, was truly infectious—so from the heart—so easy—so unstudied! Alas, that laugh is hushed in death!—But, when the tale of sorrow or misfortune met her ear—when the look of pain or mental sorrow met her eye—you could see a shade of sympathy gather on her features, and the subdued voice—the quick expression of alarm or surprise—the eager inquiry showed that her laugh was not that of a vacant mind, or worn as the veil of a deceptious heart. Like many I have known, her feelings evinced themselves spontaneously and immediately—she rejoiced with the rejoicing and sympathised deeply with the sorrowing—her laugh was no less the result of deep and earnest feeling than were her expressions of alarm or sorrow. But, excuse me, reader, I did not mean to dwell on the character of the individual, but of the class—but my feelings run away with my thoughts sometimes, and as my only atonement, I will no longer keep you from the following beautiful extracts from the aforesaid sermon, copied from the Trumpet of the 14th inst. A. B. G.

Indeed, the first deep impression in respect to the Saviour's character made on the studious mind, is, His spirituality. Here is the cause why the severe religionists of the age deemed our Lord devoid of true religion and treated him as a sinner. He was too social and cheerful; the spirituality of his thoughts and feelings gave him a truly generous temper, led him to be always free, and kind, and courteous, and removed far from him all the austerity of deportment, or severity of manners. And it is so among mortals now. A rich and full fountain of religious feelings exists often where many are free to opine there is a barren waste, without a single spring of spirituality, because they forget how the waters of spiritual life may run silently and pure in the heart, while the form of gaiety and pleasantness, and the voice of vivacity and gladness, seem to them to betoken the absence of serious feelings and impressions.

Have you not, when you have been abroad in the Summer fields, had your attention attracted by a line of unusual fertility and richness, where the wandering vine, the creeping tendrils, the beautiful wild flowers, and the pensive branches of the willow, intermingled to make lovely the range, and when you had bent down to pluck the sweet flowers, found that silently and purely there were running the waters that gave the life and richness that first drew your admiration there? It may be so with mortals. The uncommon pleasantness and vivacity of many may take its rise from the ever flowing and pure waters of religion in the soul, so silent and hidden as to elude the sense of hearing or sight, but nevertheless as active and good as the waters of the babbling brook, that is ever telling where it dwells, lest it should be unnoticed. This will be found to have a full application to her whose departure has filled our hearts with grief, who in her healthful days was a being of gaiety and pleasantness, and whose last hours told of the depth and fulness of her religious feelings and affections.

* * * * * * * * *

And to the true believer, the approach of death is but as the visitation of sleep after a weary day. He can lie down willingly on the pillow on which his Lord hath lain, and trust that his waking will be to strength that will never fail, brightness that will never fade, and joys that know no shadows. It was thus with one whose departure has touched a tender chord in the hearts of many, that vibrates now painfully indeed, and that can only be tuned in harmony with the spirit of joy by the power of Christianity. I allude, as all probably are aware, to Mrs. Lucy Ann Tompkins, who was while living a being of peculiar pleasantness, and is now before our vision as a spirit of joy in the heaven she loved. I would lead you to the scene of her last days and hours—but I shrink from the task, for language is too feeble to convey to your minds the right ideas, and the strong feelings awakened by her departure, and by sympathy with the bereaved, deprive me of my usual command of thought. But the cause of truth, and the sanctifying influence of a happy, Christian death, demand the effort to be made. Consider one surrounded with all the heart could wish, of love, friendship, and outward comforts. The dreaded season of trial arrives; a babe is born, drawing out the deepest and purest affections into more active exercise; days pass on bringing vigor and hope, and bright and lovely fancies begin to flit, and then to stay before the imagination, filling the heart with joy and rapture, by the dreams that took hold on the earthly future. But amid all this a change takes place; soon the fearful sight to the sick of the consuming physicians is seen; the result is desired by her in true faithfulness from her husband—he tells her they decided that her case is very critical, though there still was hope. Should you not expect that the thought of so sudden a departure would have caused a shuddering—a shrinking as from thought in that gay and truly happy creature? Blessed be the Spirit that whispereth to the soul of better things than earth's! there was nought of this. "If it be my heavenly Father's will, I am ready and willing to die," was the sentiment of her heart, and she expressed the like. She could, by the power of her warm faith in the Gospel of a Father's universal and eternal love, part with the charms and attractions of this existence without a murmur, feeling that soon—O how soon! was her language—she should meet the dear of earth in the spirit-home.

"LET GOOD OFFICES GO ROUND."

The sage Benjamin Franklin once exhibited great attention and kindness to an unhealthy young clergyman, who boarded with him for some time. After the clergyman left Franklin's house, he returned to him a letter of warm thanks. In the reply which Franklin made to that letter, we find the following passage:—

"As to the kindness you mention, I wish it could have been of more service to you; but if it had, the only thanks I should desire, is, that you may always be equally ready to serve any other person that may need your assistance, and so, let good offices go round, for mankind are all of a family."

The practice here manifested, is but one link of the great chain of kindred feeling, which, if exhibited by every member of the human family, would universally test the law of the Christian statutes, "overcome evil with good." The spirit of the extract from Franklin's letter, is very touchingly set forth in low life, by the following fact which occurred during the life of the comedian, Charles Matthews.

"Matthews had a great dislike to carry money about him, and this often exposed him to trifling annoyances. On one occasion, when in Wales, on arriving at Briton Ferry, on horseback, having ridden on in advance of his friends, he was obliged to wait their arrival, not having a shilling to pay the ferryman. Just at this moment an Irish beggar, in the most miserable plight, came up, and poured forth all that lamentable cant of alleged destitution which it is their vocation to impress upon the tinder-hearted, and which seldom fails to draw forth sparks of compassion. My husband, however, assured the applicant, that he had not even a farthing to offer him. It was in vain; the wretched, almost naked creature importuned him. At last he was told by him he supplicated, with some impatience at the tiresome and senseless perseverance, after this explanation, that so far from being able to bestow alms, he was himself at that moment in a situation to require assistance; actually, cold and damp as is was, (November,) compelled to remain at the water's edge till some friend came up who would frank him across the ferry. The man's quick, bright eye surveyed the speaker with some doubt for a second; but upon a reiteration of Mr. Matthew's assurance that he was detained against his will for want of a shilling, adding, that he was lame and unable to walk home from the other side of the ferry, or otherwise he might leave his horse behind as security—the beggar's face brightened up, and he exclaimed, 'Then, your honor, I'll lend you the money!' 'What, you! you who have been telling me of your poverty and misery for want of money!' 'It's all true,' eagerly interrupted the man; 'it's all true; I'm as poor as I said I was—there's no lie in it. I'm begging my way back to my country, where I've friends; and there's a vessel ready, I'm told, that sails from Swansea to-night. I've got some money, but I want more to pay my passage before I go, and I'm starving myself for that raison; but is it for me to see another worse off than myself, and deny him relafe? Your honor's lame; now, I've got my legs any how, and that's a comfort sure!'—Then taking a dirty rag out of his pocket, and showing about two shillings' worth of coppers, he counted out twelve pence, and proffered them to Mr. Matthews who, wishing to put the man's sincerity of intention to the proof, held out his hand for the money, at the same time inquiring, 'How, if I borrow this, shall I be able to return it? My house is several miles on the other side of the ferry, and you say you are in haste to proceed. I shall not be able to send a messenger back here for several hours, and you will then have sailed.' 'Oh, thin, may be, when your honor meets another of my poor district countrymen, you'll pay him the twelve pence; sure it's the same in the end.' Mr. Matthews was affected at the poor fellow's evident sincerity; but desirous to put the matter to the fullest test, he thanked his ragged benefactor, and wished him a safe journey back to his country.

"The man took his leave with 'Long life to your honor,' trudged off, and was soon out of sight. Matthews waited until his friends arrived, then rode after and repaid the borrowed money with interest; but it was only on producing good evidence of his prosperous condition, that the poor fellow could be prevailed on to take it."—The Albion, No. 45, for 1839.

This instance of "let good offices go round," though on a humble scale, is worthy of all praise, for the poor fellow gave away nearly half of his money, with the consolation, "sure it's the same in the end."

POETRY.

[From the United States Gazette.]

THE NORTH WIND.

It moans o'er the Prairie:
It sighs through the brake;
It roars in the forest;
It howls on the lake;
'Tis laden with sorrow—
Pale poverty's sigh;
And the groan of the houseless
It bears through the sky.

It scatters the brown leaves
That Autumn hath shed;
It laughs through the branches
That wave o'er the dead;
It shakes the low cabin,
Where burns the pale light,
To cheer her who watcheth
The tempest to-night.

The pride of her bosom
Is out on the deep,
And the far dashing billow
Forbids her to sleep,
For the blast to her slumber
Its wrath would impart;
And the cry of the shipwreck'd
Would ring to her heart.

Howl on!—for the sinful
Thy voice hath a charm,
And thy spirit inciteth
The murderer's arm;
No whisper of conscience—
No terror of God,
As he moveth in silence
And darkness abroad.

Thou'rt now at the altar;
And now stealing in
Where the felon lies fettered
In iron and sin;
Now high on the mountain;
Now down in the vale;
And the mad ocean heareth
Thy desolate wail.

We owe thee—Our Father!
We know 'tis Thy hand
That guideth the tempest
O'er ocean and land;
Then why should we tremble?
Why shrink at thy might?
When we know whatsoever
Thou doest is right.

MYSTERY, REASON AND FAITH.

Taken from an Essay by the Rev. E. Peabody, of New-Bedford:—

Night comes over a ship at sea, and a passenger lingers hour after hour alone on the deck. The waters plunge and welter, and glide away beneath the keel. Above, the sails tower up in darkness, almost to the sky, and their shadow falls as it were a burden on the deck below. In the clouded night no star is to be seen, and as the ship changes her course the passenger knows not which way is east or west, or north or south. What island, what sunken rocks may be on her course—or what that course is, or where they are, he knows not. All around him is Mystery; he bows down in the submission of utter ignorance.

But men of science have read the laws of the sky. And the next day this passenger beholds the captain looking at a clock, and taking note of the place of the sun, and with the aid of a couple of books composed of rules and mathematical tables, making calculations.—And when he has completed them, he is able to point almost within a hand's breadth to the place at which, after unnumbered windings, he has arrived in the midst of the seas. Storms may have beat and currents drifted, but he knows where they are, and the precise point where, a hundred leagues over the water lies his native shore. Here is Reason appreciating and making use of the revelations (if we may so call them) of science.

Night again shuts down over the waste of the waves, and the passenger beholds a seaman stand at the wheel, and watch hour after hour, as it vibrates beneath a lamp, a little needle, which points ever, as if it were a living finger at the steady pole.

This man knows nothing of the rules of navigation, nothing of the course of the sky. But reason and experience have given him Faith in the commanding officer of the ship—faith in the laws that control her course—faith in the unerring integrity of the little guide before him. And so, without a single doubt, he steers his ship on according to the prescribed direction, through night and the waves. And that faith is not disappointed.—With the morning sun, he beholds far away the summits of the gray and misty highlands, rising like a cloud on the horizon; and as he nears them, the hills appear, and the light house at the entrance of the harbor, and (sight of joy) the spires of the churches, and the shining roofs, among which he strives to detect his own.

LEARNING A TRADE.

There are many people who dislike the name of mechanic, and would rather than put their children to a trade, tug hard at their business and live sparingly, for the sake of giving their children a college education.—They think meanly of him who wears a leather apron, and is not dressed up in finery show. This we believe is the reason why there are so many pettifoggers and vagabonds in the world. Many a son has been sent to college, with the expectations of his parents highly excited—but like the fable of the mountain, had only produced a mouse. We think highly of our college institutions and rejoice to see them prosper; but we are more pleased to see an individual's mind turned in the right current. There are hundreds of lawyers who would have made better mechanics, and obtained a more comfortable livelihood, and there are no doubt, mechanics who would stand high at the bar had they been blessed with a more liberal education. But if a child has talents they will not remain hid; and no matter what his profession is they will sooner or later burst forth. There are many distinguished individuals in the world who are bred to mechanical trades. Many of the editors of our best Journals were mechanics, and do credit to the station they occupy. And our mechanics, too, generally speaking, are the most industrious part of the community. They are almost always busily employed. But it is apt to be otherwise with professional men.—They are well informed, because they spend much of their time in reading; but this is unprofitable business, unless we have something definite in view.

MARRIAGES.

In Livingston, Tuesday, December 10th, by Rev. J. H. Vanlagner, Mr. C. H. Carpenter, of New-York, to Miss LAVINIA, daughter of Henry Baker, Esq., of Livingston.

In Clinton, Sunday, December 8th, by Rev. T. Clowes, Mr. JOSEPH WHEELER, to Miss LUCRETIA CORBETT.

DEATHS.

In Detroit, Mich., December 7th, of inflammation on the bowels, HORATIO BARNUM, son of Levi Barnum, of this city, in the 23d year of his age.

In North Bloomfield, December 4th, after an illness of about one week, with canker rash, THOMAS MILTON, youngest child of Rev. T. J. Smith. This is the third child Br. and sister Smith have followed to the grave; but the God of peace has blessed them with faith in his goodness. Funeral on the 5th.

In Clinton, December 3d, Mr. PHILO NORTHROP, aged 75 years; a very devoted friend to the doctrine of God's impartial grace, the belief of which rendered death a welcome messenger. The funeral was attended on the 5th, and a sermon was preached on Job xiv: 14, by the writer.
T. CLOWES.

In Lyons, on the 29th of April last, Mrs. LOCKEY HECOX, wife of Eli Hecox, aged 79 years. The deceased was formerly a member of the Methodist denomination, and for more than 30 years a member of that church. For the last four years she had been a joyful believer in the restitution. This faith sustained her in life, it cheered her in her departure hence, and enebled her to come off conqueror and more than conqueror. She has left a bereaved husband and 7 children to mourn her loss. May they all experience the consolations of the same blessed faith. K. TOWNSEND.

Also, on the 26th, after a short illness of eight days MARGARET, consort of Wm. Walrath, aged 62 years, 11 months, and 10 days. In the death of this amiable woman, society has lost a worthy and exemplary member, nine children have been deprived of a kind and doting mother, and a husband has been deprived of an affectionate companion; supported by faith in the everlasting Gospel which portrays to the vision the glories of that world where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.

Mrs. Walrath was perfectly resigned, and called her family to her side, first shook hands with her husband, and then with her children, and bade them all farewell. She met death with a smile, and quietly fell asleep in the arms of Jesus. May that faith which she so highly adorned in life, and which cheered her in death, give peace to the minds of her bereaved companion and all her surviving relatives. May they find peace in believing, and joy in the blessed anticipation of meeting her in the spirit land where partings are no more. Mr. and Mrs. Walrath were formerly from Openheim, Montgomery county, and removed to Morristown about two years ago. O. L.

In Arkwright, on the 8th inst., Mr. ALVIN BRAINARD, aged 21 years and 6 months. The circumstances which caused the death of this amiable young man, are of a singular character. A few mornings previous to his decease, in company with two other young men, he started in pursuit of game which they had the day before confined in a burrow. The ground being frozen, a light fall of snow rendered it very slippery. In descending a steep hill, his feet slipped, and being large and fleshy, he was precipitated with great force down the declivity. After sliding about 30 feet, he came in contact with a hemlock limb, which penetrated his thigh seven or eight inches. Before the deep wound could be made to discharge freely, mortification set in, and although his parents felt conscious that every thing was done which could be done, all proved unavailing. He was resigned to the will of that great Being who is the sovereign arbiter of every event. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered by Rev. T. C. Eaton to the mourners and a large congregation of friends and neighbors, who assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to the deceased, and to mingle their heartfelt sympathies with the afflicted family.—Fredonia Censor.

At Harford, November 18th, MORRIS GALARD, aged 52 years. Br. Galard's faith in the impartial goodness of God, resulting in the salvation of the world, was to him a source of deep resignation in the solemn hour of dissolution, and his surviving widow and orphan children derived great consolation from the consideration that though their loss is perhaps irreparable, to him it is infinite gain. Agreeably to his request, his funeral was attended by the writer.
W. BULLARD.

At Caroline, December 8th, Mrs. ABAGAIL STEARNS, consort of Mr. John Stearns, aged 36 years. Br. Stearns was formerly from Mass., married his wife in Oxbridge, and removed to this State and settled at Caroline some 15 years ago, since which they have been prominent supporters of the cause of the Redeemer, ornamenting the Universalist society there with well ordered lives and godly conversation. Sister Stearns was one of the excellent ones of the earth—beloved in life by all who knew her, her early departure is deeply felt and lamented. We fear her place in her family and in society will not soon be filled. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners by the writer in presence of an unusually large and attentive congregation. W. BULLARD.

Trumpet please copy.

In Morristown, November 16th, LUCY ELIZABETH, daughter of Benjamin and Sarah Walrath, aged one year and eight months. Thus ere the bud had become a flower, it was strip from the parent stalk to bloom in heaven. May the mourners find their consolation in the Gospel.
